its having seen what great improvements had taken place in the position of the medical officers, what additional facilities were given to the poor to gain access to medical relief, and that at the time this matter was being investigated, the poor were treated better than they ever had been before. I cannot say that that is an excuse for the system which exists now, for I cannot deny that the present system is very defective. But, in justification of that Committee, I must say that at the time they were pursuing their inquiry the arrangements in respect of medical relief were better than they had been at any previous period. The Committee of 1854 recommended that the medical officers should be made independent by being elected for life instead of annually, and that any suggestion of theirs respecting the poor should be complied with by the guardians. Now, that was a very important change in the position of the medical officers who became independent of the will and caprice of the guardians. The Committee of 1861 found likewise that the salaries of the medical officers had been increased, that their districts had been diminished, and that more officers had been appointed. They also looked to the regulations which the Poor Law Board had framed with a view to the guardians and medical officers attending the poor in the workhouses, and I believe that had much to do in leading the Committee to express their satisfaction with the arrangements made for the medical treatment of the poor. The regulations to which I am referring were drawn up by some of the wisest and ablest men who ever acted in connection with the Poor Law Board—namely, Sir George Nichol, Sir George Lewis, and Sir Edmund Head. They devoted much of their time to the subject, and drew up orders for the general relief of the poor, giving especial attention to the relief of the sick poor. In their orders they required that the medical officer should be a competent person—that is to say, that there should be no longer any competition by tender, as was formerly the practice, and that no person should be appointed who had not received a diploma, or certificate from some University or other competent institution, declaring that he was a fit person to practise medicine and surgery throughout the United Kingdom. They next decided that his salary should be fixed, and that he should be as much aware of the circumstances of his position as any clergyman or curate should be before he accepted a pre-ferment. They then empowered the medical officer to call upon the guardians to provide everything which could conduce to the comfort, health, and recovery of the patient. There was another thing which was directed by the Commissioners of that time. They made a regulation which was for the future to be binding upon every medical officer to prevent improper crowding, and they state in their Report that they felt it desirable to take such precautions as would render it difficult for any overcrowding of inmates to occur again. They made it a part of the duty of the medical officer to report in writing to the guardians any defect in diet, ventilation, warming, or any other arrangement of the workhouses, and any excess in the number of inmates which would be detrimental to the health of the inmates. That is one of the regulations which every medical officer is acquainted with when he accepts his office. But the Commissioners were not satisfied with this direction to the medical officers. They provided likewise that the guardians should appoint a certain number of their body for the purpose of forming a visiting committee, and the persons so named or told off by the guardians for this purpose were called upon to visit every sick ward, to see every sick patient, and to make an entry in writing of the condition in which they found each person. And not only were they called upon to make these entries in a book, but that book was to be printed and brought before the Board of Guardians every week, in order that its contents might be taken into consideration. Looking at the fact that the management of every workhouse is vested in the guardians by law, that they have complete control over every department, and that every person connected with these establishments is employed by them, it would appear that if these directions were attended to cases like those which have been lately made public could not occur. The Committee of 1861 undoubtedly expressed their satisfaction at the manner in which the Poor Law Board had carried out the recommendations of former Committees; but if the regulations of the Poor Law Board are not attended to by the guardians abuses and irregularities of every kind are certain to occur. It was only a few months after the Report of that Committee was published that the unfortunate case of the man Gibson, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred the other night, occurred in the

Bloomsbury Workhouse. That is precisely a case in point, for the observance of the Poor Law regulations would have prevented the neglect and the abuses which are said to have occurred. At the coroner's inquest which took place in reference to this event the jury found that, although the unfortunate man must have died in any case from the effects of serum on the brain, yet that his death was accelerated by the neglect of all the officers of the workhouse, including the master, the doctor, the visiting committee, and the attendants upon the patients. This neglect occurred in a very wealthy and important district, and not only had these very guardians received a copy of the regulations, but proceedings had been instituted against them in the Court of Queen's Bench by the Poor Law Board. In these proceedings, however, the Poor Law Board had been unsuccessful, as the guardians were protected by a local Act, which gave them the entire and independent management of their poor. On that occasion I had an interview with the Board of Guardians of that district, and I declare I never saw a more highly-respectable body of gentlemen than those who were associated in that office, and one would have thought that it would have been impossible to select any persons to fulfil such an office who would have been more likely to be attentive to their duties. I do not doubt that no persons were more shocked at the disclosures that took place than those who formed that Board; but they knew nothing about the matter. Every regulation which had been made, every precaution which had been directed had been neglected. The doctor had not attended the man. The visiting committee had not examined the wards. There had been no report made as to the doctor's request for the improvement of the wards. There was no evidence of the mismanagement that was going on to be found in the books, or in the entries made by the direction of the Poor Law Board. No doubt the public were greatly shocked at the disclosures that were made. That case, however, had the effect of awakening the feelings of a great many intelligent and benevolent persons relative to the manner in which these infirmaries were conducted and how the sick poor were treated, and no doubt this unfortunate case has tended more than anything else to change public opinion with reference to the Poor Law Board, and to the necessity of giving additional powers to the Board rather than to deprive them of any. After this case was brought before the public numerous communications were received by the Poor Law Board with regard to other unions, and a very general impression appeared to prevail that the unfortunate sick were greatly neglected in the workhouses. Among other communications which reached the Board was one from Miss Nightingale, who pressed upon them the great importance of training those who attended upon the sick in the workhouse infirmaries; and I believe that lady almost went so far as to say that the attendance of trained nurses upon these unfortunate people was of even more importance than the attendance of doctors or the administration of medicine. The case also gave rise to that very important and interesting inquiry which was conducted by three well-known medical gentlemen—Dr. Hart, Dr. Farre, and Dr. Anstie—who, after visiting every workhouse infirmary in London, came to the conclusion that these workhouse infirmaries, judging them by the standard of our public hospitals, were in every way unfit for the treatment of the sick poor. Their evidence was well supported by the very intelligent and able report drawn up by Dr. Smith and Mr. Farnall, and again by the gentleman appointed for the purpose by the right hon. Gentleman. These inquiries have produced a great effect on the country, and thus the matter has been brought to such a point as to be ripe for legislation. The question for the decision of the House is a very important one. A vast number of sick and destitute people have claims for relief upon the State, and from the benevolent feelings which have been manifested, both in and out of this House, it is evidently the universal desire that these people, numerous as they are, should be relieved and treated in a manner most conducive to their comfort and their recovery. Having this object in view, we have to judge of the measure which has been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman. In the face of our past experience no doubt can exist as to the principle that the sick poor must be treated distinctly and separately from other descriptions of paupers who have to be provided for in the workhouses. That I take to be the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman and of the public generally. The right hon. Gentleman has made certain admissions with regard to the treatment of these unfortunate persons which have excited great interest and, perhaps, appre-

hension on the part of the public. He has made the admission clearly and distinctly that these persons form a charge upon the metropolis generally; that they should no longer constitute a local burden upon its various districts, inasmuch as their health and recovery are a matter of general and not of local concern; and that, therefore, the charge incurred in their behalf should be borne by the general property of the metropolis. This principle is one which has been contended for by individuals in this House for many years past. I have always considered it to be just, and that the time would come when it would be admitted. The right hon. Gentleman, however, goes somewhat further when he says that this is a class of expenditure connected with the Poor Law which may be regarded as ascertained and fixed—to use his own expression—as not liable to be jobbed. Expenses connected with the nursing of the sick are not likely to be increased by any want of judgment or want of principle on the part of the persons who have the control over them, and therefore it is perfectly fair to extend the limits of the area over which the charge is imposed. This is a very important principle, and the right hon. Gentleman believes himself to be supported in the course he has taken with regard to this point by the sanction of Sir Robert Peel, when he relieved the local property of the country from the charge of medical officers and placed it on the Consolidated Fund. I do not doubt that he is right in the view he takes of the matter, inasmuch as I believe that it is quite right to fix a charge of this kind, if possible, upon the whole property of the country. The charge for the poor is as much a national charge as the interest on the National Debt, and it is perfectly right when we can fix a charge on the whole property of the country to do so. The country has hitherto been reluctant to view it in this light; but, in my opinion, nothing can be more capricious or unfair than the charge of the poor rate. The State undertakes to support the destitute poor of this country, and it does seem—it always seems to me—that there is very considerable injustice and something like caprice in saying that persons only are liable to support the poor whose property is local and visible. That might be right when the Poor Law originated, because there was then little property that was not tangible and visible; but I do think it monstrously unjust that people possessed of such a variety of pro-

erty should not contribute in proportion to that property to this national charge. And it is very unfortunate indeed that a large class of that expenditure which cannot be increased by bad judgment, jobbery, or maladministration, cannot be fixed on the property of the country; for it seems to me that the same principle which casts these charges on the common fund of the metropolis points, also to the Consolidated Fund. I do not complain of the reasoning of the right hon. Gentleman—I hail it with some satisfaction, but that is the way of carrying out this very legitimate principle to its proper consequences. I do not express that opinion for the first time. I was acting on the original Committee appointed to inquire into the Poor Law, and I was struck in that inquiry by seeing the extraordinary unfairness in which the charge for the poor fell in different parts of the country, and on different persons, and the vast number who were totally exempt from a charge which is national, and ought to fall on every man with the means of contributing to it. This shows the importance that ought to be attached to the measure now before us. Certainly, I should be the last person, seeing what a fortunate and happy commencement of a better system this Bill offers to the country, to throw any impediment in its way. Though I certainly will not offer the smallest opposition to the principle of the Bill, and though I should hope it may be carried for the sake of the great consequences I see likely to flow from it, I think the right hon. Gentleman must expect to meet with some, I will not say opposition, but some questioning as to the manner in which he has applied his principle. It seems to me that application is hardly sufficient. Considering the admissions he has made, I hardly think his principles are fully carried out by the Bill he has introduced. So far as I understood him—I certainly was not present when he delivered it, but I have read his speech in the newspapers—I collected that he was going to cast the sick poor of the metropolis on the property of the metropolis. In looking at the Bill, I find there are exceptions to be made in that respect, and he will, I think, be required to state his reasons for drawing the line where he has as to the class of sick to be supported by the common fund and those still to be a local charge. As I understand, all the sick that are to be charged upon the general fund are those who are visited with scarlet fever, with small pox, and madness. All other sick are to be supported by the local fund. Now, I cannot quite understand the reason of this. I think it a very fair thing to say that this class will not stimulate diseases in that category for the purpose of getting on the general fund. I believe I am right in saying that the right hon. Gentleman intends to erect asylums for particular diseases. Acting on the principle of separating the sick from the other paupers, he intends to place them in asylums or infirmaries he is to build, and these are to be the receptacles of people afflicted with those painful maladies. Then, I want him to tell me why if persons with scarlet fever, small pox, and madness are to be placed in these infirmaries and thrown on the common fund—those with cancers, syphilis, and bronchitis are not to go on the general fund. Surely these diseases would not be simulated any more than fever or small pox. Indeed, I cannot understand why the sick in general in the workhouses should not be placed on the general fund. If they are maintained as sick in the infirmaries, why should they not be transferred to the general fund? Then, looking to the great conclusion we have come to from the inquiries we have made, I do not quite see that the guardians are exactly the persons to be placed at the head of medical establishments. The general belief that has hitherto existed is, that because guardians took one view and the doctors another as to what might be necessary for the treatment of their patients, the guardians, considering it to be their duty to their constituents to curtail the expenditure, the poor, in consequence of this difference of opinion, have not been properly treated, and the regulations of the Poor Law Board, which required harmonious action between the guardians and doctors, have not been successful. The doctors have called for more ventilation, more attendants, and some change in the structure of the house, but they have met with refusal from the guardians on the ground of expense—not because the guardians do not appreciate the present requirements for the treatment of the sick—not because they are chargeable with any want of humanity, but because they are persons whose previous experience and sense of duty lead them to look rather to expenditure than the importance of sanitary regulations, and object to what the doctors require on the score of increased expense. The doctors go on remonstrating, but the places remain ill-

ventilated, the attendance is insufficient, and the consequence is that disclosures take place. Under these circumstances, I cannot but draw the conclusion that these poor people should be treated as in hospitals, and superintended by persons whose interests may not be at variance with their proper treatment. Having seen so much as to the incompetence of the guardians superintending medical establishments, I do not quite understand why the right hon. Gentleman, in providing these establishments, should place guardians at their head. Is not this tantamount to the continuance of the system which has already failed? It is true the right hon. Gentleman proposes to prevent them from repeating the mischief they have already done by associating nominees of his own with them in the proportion of one-third. Their qualification for the office is to be rateable value. That is certainly a questionable qualification for persons who are to have the superintendence of medical establishments, and I should rather have thought that the best persons to associate with the guardians would have been persons who would have lost something if they did not properly discharge their duties. What we want is competency in those appointed to this office—persons who feel themselves bound to fulfil the duties imposed on them, and for which they should be properly remunerated. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will direct his attention to this point, because, as far as I have heard, some of the criticisms on his Bill are very much founded on the question of nominees. With respect to the provision for the better treatment of the sick poor, I must say that it will certainly be incomplete if we do not deal with that portion of the case which is not much mentioned in the Bill, but which, perhaps, is more important than any other—I mean the treatment of the outdoor poor. They exceed the indoor sick poor, and, of course, if their cases are not properly attended to, the spread of illness is much more likely to occur than in the case of the indoor sick. The outdoor cases of acute disease are more numerous than the chronic cases, and this again shows the necessity for dealing with this point, as these poor people are even more dangerous to the public health than those within the union. Consequently, one regards with interest the provisions of the Bill which proposes to establish dispensaries. I think that the right hon. Gentleman said that he took the idea of establishing them from the experience of similar institutions in Ireland, and certainly it meets to a certain extent the case of the outdoor poor. At present nobody knows how they are treated, or what becomes of them; whereas, in the case of deaths occurring among the indoor sick, very often a coroner's inquest is held, and great sensation is produced. As far as I understand, there will be with the establishment of these dispensaries more attention paid by the medical officers to the outdoor sick, care will be taken that proper medicines are administered, the prescriptions are to be written by the medical men, and, I presume, recorded. That is, no doubt, a great improvement, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman has, as far as necessary, inquired into the case of some dispensaries at present existing, because it is said that great frauds exist, and that a great number of persons not entitled to be relieved at the public expense, yet obtain medical relief at the cost of the country. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the assistance he received in providing for this system very strongly recommended it to me, because I have such confidence in the acuteness and industry of the gentleman whom he consulted, and who went to Ireland, that I am sure the whole matter has been carefully considered. All I can say is that I think this part of the Bill introduces a most substantial improvement in the present system. What is not so easy to understand at present is why the expense of these dispensaries, and of all the persons relieved by them, though they may be persons without any specific maladies, is to be cast on the common fund, while the general indoor sick are thrown upon the local fund. If a medical officer should think more nutritious diet was required by a patient, the expense would be cast upon the union; but if he thought medicine was necessary, then the charge would be borne by the general fund. Why should there be a difference in dealing with the relief given, in mutton or medicine? There seems something like capriciousness in this arrangement, and it appears to me that the charge for persons applying to the dispensaries might be thrown on the local fund. There will, however, be an opportunity of discussing these various matters in Committee, and I admit that nothing can be better than the purposes and principle of the Bill, if thoroughly carried out. In the last clause there is a provision which ought long since to have been established, and which ought to be more extended, for I am favourable to the extension of the authority of the Poor Law Board. The clause I refer to provides that, in case of an asylum or dispensary, or Board of Guardians failing on the requisition of the Poor Law Board to appoint to a vacancy any officer whom they are by law required to appoint, the Poor Law Board may nominate a fit person to be such officer. I am sorry, however, since the right hon. Gentleman has looked to the practice of Ireland, that he has not gone further, and adopted another provision to the effect that, in case the local authorities refuse to carry out the regulations of the Poor Law Board, the latter shall have the power of superseding them, and of appointing an officer of their own to administer the law in the place of those local authorities. I am informed that it has very rarely happened that the guardians in Ireland, who know that such a power exists, have refused to carry out the regulations of the Central Commission. I think a similar power ought to be possessed by the Poor Law Board in this country. At present there is a divided jurisdiction. There is the power technically given by the Poor Law Act to the Poor Law Board, and yet there exist no practical means of enforcing it. The Poor Law Board is very apt to be blamed for matters in respect to which that Board has practically no authority over the local Boards. If there is to be a central authority with responsibility it should not be allowed to be trifled with by the local authorities. The Board ought to have larger powers, and be fixed with the responsibility which attends the exercise of them. This question ought now to be decided, for at present it is most difficult to know who is in some cases to blame. It is said the time had come when the Board should be made a permanent establishment, but that will not be sufficient unless it is invested with sufficient power. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to some extent to increase the power of the Board, and I shall certainly support that part of the Bill—the only question with me is whether he has gone far enough. The Board ought to be responsible for the manner in which the poor are treated, and I believe they are better treated where the regulations of the Board have been fully carried out. This is a point which I trust the right hon. Gentleman will consider.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that as the representative of a large and populous metropolitan district, he had to express his satisfaction at the improvement effected by the Bill in respect to the distribution of burdens connected with the relief of the poor, but he wished the improvement had been carried still further. He would direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the propriety of making large public establishments, such as existed in Greenwich, Woolwich, and Deptford—in which parishes there was now great distress—contribute their fair proportion towards the expense for the relief of the poor.

MR. AYRTON said, that he fully appreciated the labours of the right hon. Gentleman who recently addressed the House (Mr. C. P. Villiers). He presided three years over the Committee which had brought out in evidence the full operations of Poor Law administration, and had passed the measure for union chargeability, which was in fact the foundation of this Bill, therefore the right hon. Gentleman need not defend his Poor Law administration against imaginary charges. He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman thought that the present Bill was likely to lead the House into entertaining a proposal for a national poor rate. Whatever principle of charge might be adopted for the relief of the poor, the metropolis would have to be made an exception; and the reason why the Report of the Committee was so general was that those who took an interest in the matter were not prepared, and did not desire, to submit a definite scheme for the metropolis. They thought it better that there should be a distinct recognition of the broad principle, and that it should be left to the Poor Law Board to develop the principle in details as time and circumstances would permit. The Committee, however, did recommend that the charge for casual poor should be thrown on the whole metropolis; but that decision was come to under the pressure of then recent circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board had heard some criticisms upon his Bill, and he saw that there was a general concurrence of opinion upon two points—as to the charge for inmates of asylums upon the general fund, and the manner in which the common fund should be raised and administered. If it were right to impose on the common fund the charge for the maintenance of asylums, it would be equally right to put upon it the charge for their erection; and that view seemed so reasonable that on reconsideration he believed the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) would be disposed to adopt it. If any justification were needed for the introduction of a limited Bill, it was to be found in the speech just delivered, in the statement that there was an amount of antagonism to the Poor Law Board which rendered it difficult for the President to adopt a vigorous course. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman had deferred to some extent to the traditions of the office; but traditions must give way, and the President must not be alarmed by the long words "centralization" and "equalization," abstract terms which were used with very different meanings. In raising a common fund the great point was to consider how it could be usefully, economically, and efficiently administered. When it was proposed that the casual poor should be a charge on the whole metropolis it was also proposed that, instead of being raised by a Metropolitan Board and administered by guardians, it should be raised and administered by one authority, so that there might be uniformity in the relief and treatment. But a traditional measure was passed, and the guardians had been allowed to trifle with the question of the relief of the casual poor, which was one of great practical importance, and which required to be dealt with on large considerations and general principles. Guided by the experience which had been gained, let the right hon. Gentleman consider the objections to the form of his Bill, and see if he could not simplify it and provide for a more efficient administration of the fund. The Bill dealt with a great question of justice between the different parts of the metropolis, and it was the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to hold the scales and to ask for the decision of the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton had gone far beyond his (Mr. Ayrton's) expectations, and with his assistance the President of the Poor Law Board could have no hesitation in dealing with the difficulties which surrounded this serious question.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I tender my best thanks to the hon. Members who have taken part in this discussion for the courteous, kind, and generous manner in which they have received the Bill. They have given me credit for laying down a principle which may lead to a satisfactory solution of a great difficulty, and I feel certain that with the assistance of the House we shall succeed in carrying a Bill which shall alter and materially improve the management of the workhouses of the metropolis. I make no complaint of any speech delivered in the course of this debate; but I wish that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers) had been here when I first addressed the House upon this subject; for from the report of my speech, or from something he may have heard from others, he seems to have misconceived its spirit and misinterpreted its intentions. I sedulously abstained from reflecting upon anything that had been done in past times by the Poor Law Board, or upon the conduct of the Committee who sat upon the subject of Poor Relief under his Presidency. On the contrary, I gave the highest credit to the Committee for the manner in which it had conducted its investigations; and upon the result of its inquiries as laid down in its Resolutions, I founded some of the main provisions of my Bill. I therefore heard with surprise the answer which the right hon. Gentleman made to the supposed attack upon his administration and the Committee, because there was nothing like accusation in the language I used with reference to the one or the other. Sir, the question now before the House is a very simple one—it is whether or not you have come to the conclusion that the administration of the Poor Law in the metropolis—and I put the metropolis for this purpose separate from the rest of the country—is carried out in a manner which is just to those who find the funds, and merciful to those who receive relief, or whether it has not been both indoors and out of doors, conducted on a system which has been almost the reverse. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Finsbury (Mr. Alderman Lusk), who spoke in a temperate and good-humoured manner, said he would speak a good word for the guardians. I think he will do me the justice to admit that I abstained from saying anything against them. I feel their difficulties—I sympathize with them. At the same time, when gentlemen have come to me, as some of them have, and expressed themselves in the highest terms of their own capacity, and of the ability with which they have administered the workhouses and infirmaries committed to their charge, and when at that very moment I had lying on my table reports which were directly the reverse, I am obliged to say that the system has failed under their management, and must be improved. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton to speak of the excellent rules and orders laid down by the Poor Law Board. I fully admit it. Upon turning my attention to the orders, and particularly the general consolidated orders, I must say they reflect the highest credit upon those who framed them. But it is not of the slightest use to make orders or lay down rules unless you are in a position to carry them out and enforce them if they are not complied with. It is of the utmost necessity that any Board, and above all the Poor Law Board, should have eyes and ears multiplied; so multiplied, that day by day and hour by hour it may see and hear what is going on in the workhouses of this metropolis. The present mode of inspection does not suffice for the necessities of the case. Unless inspection is carried out with a firmness, minuteness, and care which it is impossible for one inspector to exhibit—unless there be some means found by which inspection can be supplied constantly and minutely, you will fail, whatever regulations you pass, or rules or orders you lay down. When you come to the guardians, you find among them men of intelligence, kindness, and a desire to do well; but not understanding fully the business they have taken in hand, being engaged in business of another kind, and not having an appreciation of the difficulties with which they have to cope, they fail in what they have undertaken to carry out. I do not believe they are unmanageable bodies if sufficient power is given to those who have to rule and regulate them. I am bound to say that when treated with firmness, combined with conciliation and a desire to do them justice, they are in most cases ready to yield to the wishes of the Board. There are instances, however, not so much of steady resistance as of what is worse than resistance—of considering, of continually deferring, of putting off, of hoping that something will turn up which will save them from the necessity of complying. These are the Boards of Guardians which are most troublesome, because if they resisted you could coerce them, but while they are considering you can do nothing. These are the people most difficult to manage, and they are what I believe to be among the most recalcitrant bodies in the whole metropolis. And that brings me to the part that has been taken in this debate by the hon. Members for Marylebone. These hon. Gentlemen represent two great parishes governed by guardians who are elected by vestries. But while I can speak well to a certain extent of one of those parishes, the other, as hon. Gentlemen may have seen from accounts in the public press, has not done well. In that parish there has been a failure. Their management has broken down, and their workhouse has not been carried on in the way they claim to have conducted it, because they have not been able to look minutely into the business which they have taken in hand. With respect to these local Boards, I was very glad to hear my gallant Friend (Colonel Hogg) state that his parish, St. George's, Hanover Square, would not oppose the clause which I propose directed against their local Acts. These local Acts have been among the greatest impediments with which the Poor Law Board have to contend. The Board has constantly been liable to be tripped up in Courts of Law, for if a notice were sent to the directors it was held that it ought to have been sent to the vestry, and vice versa. Everything went wrong in consequence of this double government. I cannot, therefore, consent to the representations of the hon. Members for Marylebone on that point. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Villiers) spoke of something which had fallen from me on a former occasion with reference to my shrinking from collision with the guardians last autumn. The time was not then ripe for collision. The inspectors were working almost day and night in examining the entire management and discipline of workhouses, and the number of visits they had to make was very large. Hon. Members, indeed, are hardly aware what enormous establishments they are, some of them more like small towns than institutions which can be looked over in a cursory way. In St. Pancras Workhouse, for instance, there are more than 2,000 persons, and to make a minute investigation into the treatment of each class of inmates requires great acumen and intelligence—qualities which I am bound to say the inspectors have shown—in order to frame their reports so that the guardians might fully understand what improvements were required. That investigation was going on from the time I entered office. It would have been unwise if I had, at the moment when Parliament was about to meet, come into collision with the Boards of Guardians instead of coming to the House and saying, "I am willing to be responsible for the condition of the workhouses, if I have, and only if I have, power to enforce obedience to any orders I may issue." Unless this be done the responsibility of the Poor Law Board must be a myth, and their interference with Boards of Guardians useless. I do not wish to detain the House after so long a discussion, which has not, however, been upon the principle of the Bill. I do not pretend that the measure is a perfect one, and in the interval between the second reading and the Committee I shall direct my attention to those points to which hon. Members have referred, and see to what extent I can meet their views and adopt their suggestions. There are, however, certain misapprehensions which I think it well at once to correct. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, speaking of the proposed dispensaries, and warning me of the frauds which have been committed in Ireland, has objected to a distinction which he thinks is proposed in the Bill between the indoor and outdoor sick, and he asks why the former as well as the latter should not be charged to the common fund. I propose to charge on the common fund the salaries of the medical officers of workhouses, as well as of nurses and other officials, and the cost of drugs, so that, as far as medical relief and management are concerned, no difference is made between the indoor and the outdoor sick. The right hon. Gentleman, however, asks why I do not charge all the sick on the common fund, instead of cases of fever, small pox, and lunacy only. I explained this point on a former occasion; but as the right hon. Gentleman and also the hon. Baronet (Sir Harry Verney) have adverted to it, the House will allow me to repeat what I then said. I am unable to distinguish in principle the outdoor sick from the indoor sick; those who are not necessarily transferred to the hospitals from those who are in the infirmaries. For that reason I thought it advisable to take only those classes of disease which could clearly be separated from the rest, and which affected the health of the whole metropolis—namely, fever and small pox. The hon. Baronet will, I am sure, admit that these classes ought to be treated separately from other patients, in order to prevent the spread of fever and small pox throughout the metropolis. I propose, therefore, to charge these upon the common fund, and to make the hospitals for their reception common to the whole metropolis. As to

lunatics the noble Lord (Viscount Enfield) has asked me what distinction there is between the asylums proposed in this Bill and the county asylums. The distinction is one with which the Commissioners in Lunacy are quite familiar. The lunatics detained in workhouses are perfectly inoffensive, and require none of the restraints nor the luxuries and advantages which are provided for the other and more dangerous class in county asylums. The asylums for lunatics and the hospitals for fever and small pox being placed upon the common fund, it will be necessary to have a Central Board to manage them. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) urged that the expenses of these buildings should be thrown on the whole metropolis, and I may tell him that this will be done, because it is for the public advantage that if a hospital in one part is full patients should be transferred to another. All these buildings, therefore, will be charged on the metropolitan rate. With respect to the number of different Boards which will be created under this Bill, and on which much remark has been made, I admit that this has been one of the difficulties that have dwelt in my own mind. What, however, does the fact of the existence of these several Boards amount to? Take the case of the dispensaries. There will be a dispensary committee composed of guardians, who in almost all instances will manage their affairs. Suppose that five parishes or unions are united for all purposes, though that is not at all a necessary thing, because under the Bill there may be districts for one purpose and not for another, just as is already the case with district schools. I may remark here that nothing has worked so well as the district school committees, the guardians having elected persons who take a deep interest in the schools, and who, being elected for three years, are able to give new members all the advantage of their information and experience. The guardians generally, indeed, take a great pride and interest in these schools, though in some points they are still open to improvement. But supposing, I say, a case where there are five workhouses; one of them, perhaps, may serve admirably for a hospital for the sick, another may be suited for the infirm, and another for able-bodied paupers, with every appliance for making it what the workhouse system was originally intended to be—namely, a deterrent system, so that able-bodied persons should shrink from applying for admission unless they were really compelled to do so. You might also separate the sexes, and separate the moral from the immoral. What I desire by this arrangement is to utilize in every possible way existing materials, and to make the most of the appliances we already have in hand, so as not to incur needless expense in building establishments which, though they would be on a much grander scale, and would be much more striking in appearance, would be no more efficient than existing erections. This brings me to the question of expense, and I wish the House to bear in mind that, even if this Bill had not been introduced, a considerable outlay would still have been made, because certain workhouses required additional space, and many of them had already plans for enlargement in hand. They were called on to enlarge the buildings they at present have, and I thought that for me, or whoever might be in my place, it would be an object to economize as much as possible. This is a practical matter, and if with the guidance of the scientific gentlemen whom I have selected, and the assistance of the inspectors who have given me such valuable aid, I can arrive at the same result by utilizing the present workhouses, I feel that I shall be carrying out what I am sure are the intentions of this House—namely, that there should be no unnecessary expenditure, at the same time that every justice should be done to the poor. One word as to the nominees. I have said that I felt deeply and strongly that you never can have an efficient system of relief for the poor unless you have a system of inspection. I am still of that opinion. I have fixed the number of nominees whom the Poor Law Board may appoint at one-third that of the elected guardians, but that is not because I contemplate that there shall be that number in all cases. Neither do I make this proposition with any intention that the Poor Law or the nominated guardians should come into collision with the general body of the guardians. The object is to make some persons responsible who might be volunteers, and who could be removed if they did not discharge the duty which they had undertaken. There are persons in the metropolis—an abundance of them—who would willingly volunteer for this duty. I have been blamed because I did not bring in a Bill to enforce the performance of the duties which would be undertaken by volunteers; but if I can secure by this Bill men of influence and also of mind and heart—men who from their exertions in connection with Societies for the relief of destitution, I find taking the deepest interest in the poor, not only without payment, but guaranteeing the whole expenses of those Societies, and not letting a penny go into the pocket of any one but those for whom the money has been subscribed—I feel that if I can secure the services of such men, they may do an enormous amount of good. But, to enable them to do it we must be in a position to say to them, “You have a right to go in and see every poor person; no one can stand in your way; no Board of Guardians can say (as has been the case in some instances), ‘You have given information we don’t like, and we will have you in this workhouse no more.’” Let us have persons to whom no such thing as that can be said by any Board of Guardians—persons who will have responsibilities towards the Poor Law Board, persons who will enter into some undertaking to do the duties imposed on them by the Poor Law Board. With respect to the ratepaying value I may observe that as far as my Department is concerned I do not care whether the nominated guardians pay a farthing of rates; but if I had not inserted the £100 qualification it would have been said, “You are putting persons on the Board of a lower qualification than that possessed by the elected members. You ought to have inserted a provision that they should be rated at a high sum.” My own belief is that you could find persons in the metropolis not rated at all who would do those duties most efficiently; and if this House should think fit to strike out this £100 qualification condition, and leave the nomination to the Poor Law Board, they could not gratify me more than by so doing. In reply to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman, that I have laid down a principle which tends towards a national rate, [Mr. C. P. VILLIERS: No!] I must say that I object very strongly to having a mere verbally logical view cast upon everything proposed in the House. A deputation of gentlemen waited on me yesterday. They declared that I was one of the most revolutionary persons who had appeared in public life for a long time. They said I was trying to subvert everything, including local government. What will they say when they read the speech of the right hon. Gentleman? The right hon. Gentleman says that in preserving so much of local government as I do I fail to secure the poor against the recurrence of evils now complained of. I submit that in this House we must legislate practically. I knew that if I had come to this House with the strongest possible opinions on the subject—and I confess I have not those strong opinions—if I had arrived at the conclusion that the rates of the whole of the metropolis should be equalized, I should have been met with an opposition which would have defeated any Bill which I might have brought in. I am certain of that from communications I have had with hon. Gentlemen within the House, and from others without. It has been said by many of them, "I should have opposed you if you had brought in a Bill for equalizing the rates over the whole metropolis; but you have only gone the extent of charging on the common fund expenditure in which there can be no jobbing, and thus a check is provided." Had the Bill been of a more wholesale character, instead of the few holes that have been picked in it, there would have been seventy-eight holes, the number of the clauses. Great stress has been laid on the evils which will result from placing those charges on the common fund, owing to there being no system of uniform valuation in the metropolis. I feel that point, and consequently I have endeavoured to meet the difficulty by Clause 62—

"The Poor Law Board shall from time to time assess on the several unions and parishes in the metropolis the amounts of their respective contributions to the Common Poor Fund in proportion to the annual rateable value of the property therein comprised, to be determined according to the valuation lists, or, where there are none, according to the latest poor rate for the time being for the union or parish, or otherwise, as the Poor Law Board from time to time direct."

It is quite true that we do not always know on what system a union or parish is assessed for Poor Law purposes; but the assessments for the Metropolitan Board and for the police rate we know are on the best available basis; and the Poor Law Board, in making an assessment, will be able to do as is done in counties. Though the assessments in the various unions of a county may be on different systems, the counties levy a rate on their own assessment, which is made on a uniform system throughout the whole county. So far, therefore, as it can be done, we have endeavoured to meet that objection by a clause in the Bill; but I propose to do more. My hon. Friend the Secretary for the Treasury (Mr. Hunt) has brought in a Bill to provide a uniform scheme of assessment for the whole country, with the exception of the metropolis. I will wait to see what is done with that Bill; but I have sketched a Bill for the metropolis, which I propose to introduce if my hon. Friend's should receive the sanction of Parliament. By the Bill to which I refer I propose that for Imperial taxation and all rates the metropolis shall be uniformly assessed. I have now only to repeat my thanks to the House for the reception given to the measure under discussion. I ask them to examine it in no hostile spirit—indeed, I know they will not—but to regard it as what it purports to be, a Bill introduced for the better management of the indoor poor of the metropolis, and for affording assistance to the outdoor poor also. If they approach it in the spirit which they have shown on its introduction and during the debate on the second reading, I, for my part, will be ready to receive any suggestion which may be put forward for its amendment. Should I be so fortunate as to receive the assistance of the House in that spirit when we go into Committee on this day fortnight, I have little doubt that our united efforts will bring the matter to a successful issue.

DUTY ON DOGS BILL—[BILL 36.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hunt.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he hoped it was intended to enforce in every case the payment of the Excise licence of 5s. Dogs in towns were, for the most part, a very great nuisance. In every town there were a number of people who could not keep themselves, yet who kept a dog, and who at present evaded the duty. Many cases had come before him as a magistrate in which the dogs of such persons had bitten poor children, and he only regretted that the owners belonged to a class who could not be made to give compensation. Only a little while ago the child of a poor widow had come before him with a badly lacerated leg, the result of the bite of a dog. If the new duty of 5s. were rigidly enforced in every case, it would be a great protection to the poor.

Mr. BARROW hoped there would be no exemption in the case of puppies.

Mr. READ said, he was gratified to elicit from the Secretary to the Treasury the other night that no exemption would be allowed. The farmers were quite willing to give up the exemption they at present enjoyed for shepherds' dogs. He was only sorrow that ladies' lap-dogs and sporting dogs were to be kept at the same rate as the more useful class of shepherds' dogs and rat-catchers' dogs.

RAILWAY DEBENTURE HOLDERS BILL.

(Mr. Watkin, Mr. Alderman Salomons,
Mr. Laing.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WATKIN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, repeated the explanation of the circumstances which had rendered it necessary which he made when he introduced it; and stated that it was with his consent about to be referred to a Select Committee. The question was whether they ought not to remove the alarm and difficulty which now existed in regard to debentures, upon which the welfare of so important a branch of the carrying trade depended. It might be said that the proposed measure was bad for the shareholders. That while £450,000,000 were invested in railways, the debenture-debt only amounted to £120,000,000; therefore, it was unfair to legislate in favour of the debenture-holders as against the shareholders. They might, however, remember that the debentures were the core of the railway system, and whatever made the security of the debentures more perfect would enable the companies to borrow at a less amount of interest, and therefore leave a larger amount of money to divide among both the preference and ordinary shareholders. At present a mortgage was given to the debenture-holders on what was termed the general undertaking, and tolls, which meant the fixed property and the tolls. This Bill would also give them a lien on the engines, carriages, and plant movable and immovable, of the company. It would not have any retrospective action, and would, therefore, not affect existing engagements, applying only to the debentures issued after its passing. It might be said that by passing the Bill they would prevent the railway companies who chose to do so from borrowing upon the present security, but he had no objection to insert a clause in Committee to enable the companies to do so. Thus the power would be optional, though he had no doubt it would be universally availed of. On the other hand, if any company wished to make its securities perfect, surely the House ought not to refuse facilities for such a purpose. With regard to the objection that they would deprive the trade creditor of his security, he denied that that was so; but even if it did affect his security he contended that inasmuch as the bulk of the revenue was received in cash, railway companies ought to pay cash for stores, materials, and labour, and not get into debt on their account. There was, however, in fact, a large amount of property left untouched by the Bill which could be seized for trade debts, such as surplus lands and a mass of floating property not absolutely required for the working of the line. There were three classes of claims specially excepted from the operation of the Bill—rates and taxes, compensation for personal injuries, and for loss and damage to property in transitu, and chief rents recoverable by distress. The measure had been submitted to and approved by the highest authorities of the London and North Western, the Midland, the South Eastern, and other railway companies, and also to a noble Lord in "another place" who had given railway questions his especial attention in Parliament, and who considered the measure well worthy the attention of the House, and that its principle was sound. He denied that he had introduced the Bill because he was connected with certain railways, and was anxious to get them out of their difficulties. In point of fact, the capital of the whole of the railway companies in difficulties did not amount to more than £24,000,000, and the debentures to £6,600,000, or about $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the whole capital so invested; and if they excepted the London, Chatham, and Dover, which had introduced a special Bill of its own, the proportion of the capital of railways in difficulty would be reduced to $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the whole. In reference to the complaint that the established railway companies had laid out more capital than they ought to have done, he would simply observe that the returns to the twelve principal railway companies on the increased capital laid out during six years past amounted to no less than 6½ per cent per annum, which he contended was a perfect justification on their part. He thought that, considering the class of people who held railway debentures, and the alarm felt by them on the subject, the House ought to support a measure which would put this class of security, good as even at present in most cases it was, on a footing of undeniable and unchallengable security and safety.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Watkin.)

MR. GOLDNEY pointed out that the third clause of the Bill gave debenture-holders an unwarrantable advantage over all other creditors of a railway company, with the single exception of the tax-gatherer. He could imagine the case of a contractor engaged in constructing a line and desiring payment when the line was finished, but if the railway company had issued debentures the contractor would be unable to put in an execution for payment. The contractor for casual repairs, too, would be in the same predicament under similar circumstances. Instead, then, of calling the measure a Railway Debenture Holders' Bill, he thought it would be more properly described by the title Railway Companies Creditors' Defence Bill. Hitherto the Legislature had endeavoured to protect such of the public as were creditors against railway companies, but this Bill proposed to remove such protection and nullify all past legislation in this respect.

MR. AYRTON pointed out that passing the Bill in its present state would be attended with several peculiar consequences. He regretted that the Law Officers of the Crown were not present to give the House the benefit of their experience in considering this complicated legal question. There was no misapprehension on the part of Parliament in its railway legislation. It was competent to make a permanent mortgage of landed estate, and a railway was landed estate earning money by tolls, which afforded the permanent security when a mortgage was made. But one could not well mortgage permanently a fluctuating property. The Bill proposed to add to the legal mortgage of the land estate all the personal property that might happen to be upon it, but if the change were adopted a railway company would not be able to deal with property with a view of taking it off the land. The effect of this would be to place railways in a position of great embarrassment, for that would destroy their credit. He hoped the President of the Board of Trade would consider this Bill on the part of the public, and that the Law Officers would take care that it should have a due regard to the protection of the public interests. He hoped it would be understood that the House in reading the Bill a second time did not thereby assent to the principle of the Bill, but only read it a second time as a matter of form, as they were not yet sufficiently advised as to the measure.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS admitted that the Bill as it at present stood was crude, but in the interest of capitalists and others who had invested their money in railways as well as in the interests of the travelling public, he assented to the principle that the plant ought not to be removed. The credit of the company would be best maintained, and the convenience of the public insured, by keeping the rolling stock upon the line, and that was the best security for the debenture-holders, who were the first mortgagees.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought the thanks of the House were due to the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) for introducing the Bill, and on the understanding that it was to go to a Select Committee, and that they were not pledged to any of its details, he hoped the House would pass the second reading. The hon. Member was not quite accurate, he thought, in some of his statements. It was true that at present a debenture-holder could only come in, as such, through a receiver, but, as a creditor of the company for the amount represented by his bond, he could get judgment and seize the rolling-stock. The general principle the hon. Member had laid down was a sound one—namely, that it was very much against the public convenience that the rolling-stock of the company should be liable, as now, to be taken in execution by individual creditors, whether for works, supplies, or debentures, thereby destroying the reasonable security of the debenture-holder, who was the first creditor. But the great cause of all the mischief about railway securities was the legislation of Parliament itself. We had merely copied the provisions of the old

Mr. Watkin

Canal Bills, without noticing the difference between the securities they issued and those of railways; and without weighing the consequence of so large an amount of permanent works being provided by a floating instead of a fixed debt. Under Canal Bills the loans raised were precisely like mortgages of any other landed estates, and were usually for seven or fourteen years, and the total amount was small. Under Railway Bills altogether £120,000,000 had been taken from the floating capital of the country under much shorter dated securities, which were not mortgages in the usual sense, and could not even be held by many trustees. The result of this had been that in times of pressure, and when doubts arose as to the security of debentures, large claims were made upon the companies on account of these loans, and though they might be in a solvent condition, they were placed in considerable financial embarrassment. France had adopted a much wiser course in this respect, making the loan capital of its railways raised for very long terms, and redeemable by a sinking fund. He thought that the great mistake had been to prescribe in what way companies should raise their money. We had laid down rules derived from the obsolete legislation of last century; whereas, if our railway companies had been allowed to raise their capital as they chose under the provisions of the Joint Stock Acts much of the present difficulty might have been obviated; at least, no one would have been responsible for it but themselves. One great source of mischief was that railway companies which had found themselves in an unsatisfactory position in raising their capital had, as it was called, "financed" their income, and attempted to apply their current income to capital charges; and he would suggest whether it might not be desirable in some way to compel railway companies in future to keep their capital and income monies separate. In recent debates much had been said about the defective accounts of great national establishments, and he could not help now observing it might also be found that there were weak points in the accounts of great railway companies.

MR. LAING, as the Bill was to be referred to a Select Committee, wished merely to confirm what had been said as to the extent to which Parliament was responsible for the state of things which had arisen with reference to railway debentures. The present difficulty was mainly owing to a mistaken view taken by Parliament originally on the introduction of railways, as to the nature of railway property. It then thought that a railway, like a canal or a turnpike road, was to be open to all the world; that the company was not to have a monopoly of the carrying business, but that everybody might bring their own engines and carriages on to the line, and run them along it, on condition that they paid the company certain tolls for the privilege. The Legislature gave in that case on the tolls what it then considered to be as good security as a mortgage on a landed estate. That view had since, however, turned out to be entirely erroneous, and he had no hesitation in stating that, if the present state of things had been known to Parliament when it originally dealt with the subject, the mortgages in question would have been made to cover not only the line of railway and the tolls, but also the rolling-stock. The cardinal policy of Parliament, indeed, he thought, had been to make the debenture capital of railways a secure investment, because it went out of its way to impose restrictions on the amount of such capital which could be raised. He could also corroborate the statement that the other restrictions which had been imposed on railway companies in the issue of debentures furnished the main reason why the Continental system—which would have placed the debenture-debt on a much sounder footing—had not been adopted in this country. That system consisted in issuing debentures at long dates with a sinking fund to redeem them, and it was a mode of proceeding which was the safest for all the parties concerned. It was a mode of proceeding, however, which legislation in this country prevented, and we therefore stood in the position of having £120,000,000 of property which had been held out by Parliament as being a security in which trust funds might be invested, while it now, after the lapse of several years, appeared that the legal effect of that security was not what Parliament had contemplated. Such was the pass to which things had been brought by an unexpected legal decision, and it was, he thought, but a simple matter of good faith that all parties should be placed in the position in which they believed they stood when the money was advanced. To the fact that the recent decision, however good it might be in point of law, was totally unexpected he could bear the strongest testimony, but the question was one in dealing with which the public interests must be looked to, and their interest, he maintained, clearly demanded that a railway should by no possibility be shut up by the severance from it of the rolling-stock. That principle the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had very properly laid down a few evenings before, and if the rolling-stock and the line were to go together it would be equally for the advantage of the public and the debenture-holders. The only question then would be how the comparatively small class of other creditors was to be provided for? Tradesmen's bills for current expenses ought never, he contended, to be allowed to exceed two or three months' earnings of a railway, and it would, he thought, be bad policy to declare that £120,000,000 of property should be kept in jeopardy because some persons, with due warning and with their eyes open, chose to go beyond the legitimate credit of a company for its current expenses. That, however, was a point which might be considered in Committee, and it would, no doubt, be deemed right that those creditors also should be duly protected. He looked upon it as impossible, he might add, to overrate the importance of such a Bill as that before the House, because when interest to the amount of $\frac{1}{2}$ or 1 per cent higher than ought to be paid according to the natural state of the money-market was charged on the large sum involved in debentures, it became of the utmost consequence to take care that railways which were now solvent might not fall into a position of insolvency. He hoped that the House would, under the circumstances, not hesitate to agree to the second reading of the Bill, and that it would without delay be referred to a Select Committee.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought the discussion in which the House was engaged a very useful one, and expressed himself as perfectly convinced that hon. Members would act wisely in following the advice with respect to the passing of the Bill which had just been given. He should not, he might add, attempt to argue with his hon. Friend (Mr. Laing) as to how far everybody had been taken by surprise by the recent decision to which he had adverted. He might, however, state that he had heard in several quarters that persons who had paid attention to the subject were quite prepared for the view of the law which was there laid down. There was little doubt, at the same time, that it was not in accordance with the popular impression, and he quite concurred with his hon. Friend in thinking that Parliament should support, as far as lay in its power, the credit of the great security which he mentioned. It was, in fact, impossible to overrate its importance, and he must express his sincere regret if he had said anything which would give rise to the impression that he held a contrary opinion. He could not, however, see that he had uttered a syllable or inserted a single provision in the Bill which was calculated to have that effect. He at the same time fully admitted that in a case like the present it was extremely difficult to control, or even to reason with, a feeling of panic, and that it was highly necessary that hon. Members should be very careful as to anything which might fall from them, or any course which they might take, affecting, or appearing to affect, the security of the debenture-holders. It was a sense of that responsibility which chiefly prompted him to agree to the course proposed of reading the Bill a second time and then referring it to a Select Committee. He thought it was of the utmost importance that the House should assert the principle laid down in the Bill—that rolling-stock should not be separated from the line—and he could not help feeling that in the present feverish state of the public mind in some quarters any attempt to oppose a measure of the kind might conduce to the spread of panic, and to create the impression that Parliament was not anxious to do everything it could to strengthen the position of debenture-holders. He thought, however, that they ought to legislate upon a subject of such delicacy with great care, and not to allow a Bill dealing only with one point to pass, under the impression that so crude a measure dealt with the whole question. He felt that he ought to inform the House of the views of the Government upon the subject. From the end of last Session, when the question was mooted in various forms in both Houses of Parliament, it was evident that the time was coming when some legislation must take place on the subject, with a view to the proper ascertainment of priorities amongst different classes of people interested. The chief point was to prevent any one class of creditors from injuring the public, and others who were interested in the property, by seizing the rolling-stock, and so stopping the working of the line. It was to prevent such an injury being committed that a noble Lord, who had already been referred to, introduced last year a Bill into the other House to prevent the seizure of rolling-stock. That Bill did not come down to this House. When the present Session opened, it appeared to the Government that it would be better to delay any proposals which they might think fit to make until they had seen the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Railways, the more so as there seemed to be no immediate necessity for legislation, because, as the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) had said, the debentures upon which the payment of interest had been suspended were insignificantly small, and it appeared impossible that the failure of so small a proportion, especially as the causes of the failure were so manifest, should in any way affect the debenture-holders generally. With regard to another question—that of providing proper machinery for winding-up companies when in a state of insolvency—the Government thought that immediate legislation was requisite, and he (Sir Stafford Northcote) had accordingly, a short time before, introduced a measure, the second reading of which had been postponed for a few days; but that measure had reference only to the case of railway companies which were unable to satisfy the holders of debentures. He was extremely sorry if, through any inadvertence on his part, he had done or said anything tending to alarm the holders of debentures. He could only assure the hon. Member that it was unintentional. He had postponed the second reading of the Bill in order that there might be the more time to consider the matter carefully, and to consult some Members who were interested in the management of railways, and he had every confident expectation that after the matters had been fully considered some arrangement might be arrived at by which that Bill or some other like it might be advantageously adopted. What we had to do was to prevent the stoppage of the traffic, and at the same time to secure the rights of all the creditors; for, though the debenture-holders formed a very important class, there were other classes of creditors whose claims had also to be considered. Upon such distinctions the Bill before the House did not, he thought, even attempt to touch. It might perhaps be decided in the Committee that it would be better to pass a Bill dealing with one class first and another afterwards; but, at all events, the Government thought, when they came to look into the Bill laid upon the table by the hon. Member, that it was not one which in its present condition could be advantageously discussed by the House, and that it would be far better to refer it to a Select Committee, by whom all its details would be carefully considered. In answer to an observation made by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), in reference to the absence of the Law Advisers of the Crown, he might mention that the Attorney General, who was unavoidably absent, thoroughly concurred in the proposal, and had, moreover, expressed his perfect willingness to serve on any Committee that might be appointed. He (the Attorney General) thought it better that the whole question should be calmly and quietly considered in a Committee, and under the circumstances it was not necessary to detain him in the House at great personal inconvenience. He would be ready to co-operate with the hon. Member in his main object—namely, the keeping the line in work, and giving as good a security as possible to the debenture-holders. They ought, too, as far as possible, to consider whether the debenture-holder could not be protected from the carelessness of the directors themselves, for the want of confidence felt by the debenture-holders at the present time might possibly be attributable to other causes than the recent judgment of Lord Justice Cairns, or the speech which he himself had been unfortunate enough to make. He thought it might be desirable to consider all these matters in Committee. Personally, he should like to have awaited the Report of the Royal Commission; but that Report would, no doubt, be soon issued, and it was possible that some Member of that Commission might be willing to serve on the Committee. Whether that were so or not, they would, no doubt, receive from the Members of that Commission every assistance in coming to a decision; and he could only say that the Government themselves were most anxious to co-operate in promoting any measure which would be likely to secure the desired effect.

MR. WATKIN would only say, in explanation, that the reason why he did not include in the Bill some power of registration was because he did not wish to interfere with any measure which was likely to be brought in by the Government.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, it will not be necessary for me to say more than a very few words in introducing the Motion of which I have given notice; for I am sure your Lordships need no inducement to adopt an Address to the Queen on the occasion of the happy confinement of the Princess of Wales, and the birth of a Princess. All who have the honour of knowing Her Majesty personally are aware that there is no stronger characteristic of Her Majesty than the deep affection she entertains for every member of Her family; and every addition to it is an event of the greatest interest to Her. I am also sure that anything which so much interests Her Majesty cannot but be deeply interesting to all who have the happiness of living under the sway of a Sovereign who, in the discharge of Her duty has excited and merited the devoted loyalty of Her subjects, and who, from Her personal character, has strengthened in no slight degree the institutions of this country. On the present occasion there is ground for a more than ordinary feeling of satisfaction, because the confinement of the Princess of Wales and the birth of a Princess have taken place under circumstances which led to no unreasonable anxiety and apprehension, though happily all apprehension has been dissipated by the event. The manner in which the Princess of Wales has conducted herself ever since she placed her foot on these shores has been such as to endear her to every person in the realm. I am sure your Lordships will join with me in an expression of satisfaction on the fact that the Princess of Wales has safely passed through her painful crisis, and in congratulating Her Majesty on the accession of another Princess.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to congratulate Her Majesty on The Princess of Wales having happily given birth to a Princess, and to assure Her Majesty of the deep interest felt by the House of Lords in all that concerns the domestic happiness of Her Majesty and Her Family.—(The Earl of Derby.)

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, we are all ready to congratulate Her Majesty on the birth of the Princess. I need not, therefore, say more than that I gladly second the Motion.

Agreed to, Nemine Dissentiente, and the said Address Ordered to be presented to Her Majesty by the Lords with White Staves.

TENURE OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, in calling the attention of their Lordships to the question of Land Tenure in Ireland, and presenting a Bill on the subject, said, the measure was only a repetition of one which he brought forward last year. He regretted to say that the lapse of time had not at all diminished the difficulty or the importance of the question. It might be considered presumption in him to tender fresh legislative proposals at that moment, bearing in mind that there were already on the table of the House of Commons four Bills relating to the question of landlord and tenant in Ireland; but he did not think there was anything in those measures, so far as their nature had yet transpired, which need prevent their Lordships from examining the land question as a whole for themselves. What he was about to propose in no way entered into competition with the Government Bill which related exclusively to the question of compensation for improvements made by the tenants. That subject was of great interest in itself, and was one that it was extremely important to deal with, because it had been made the pretext for the most absurd propositions and the most ridiculous claims. But the Bill he was about to introduce related to the larger question of the tenure of land. He need not enlarge upon the general subject, for it had been very ably discussed during the recess by a noble Friend of his (Lord Dufferin), a Member of that House, who in his letters had thoroughly investigated and explained it; by Lord Rosse, also, in a pamphlet familiar, he hoped, to the majority of their Lordships; and in another pamphlet by the noble Viscount on the cross-benches (Viscount Lifford.) The literature of the question had also received additions from various writers and speakers. Nevertheless, the difficulties in the way of legislation had not been diminished by all this discussion, nor were they at all likely to diminish unless their Lordships determined to adopt and adhere to sound principles. Although, as he had said, this question required further investigation, he was bound to say he believed there was nothing in the agricultural condition of Ireland at the present moment or in the relations existing between landlord and tenant of a very unsatisfactory character. On the contrary, at that moment, in spite of the Fenian rising and agitation, there was nothing to show that the relations existing between landlord and tenant were in general otherwise than cordial and satisfactory. He said that advisedly, referring to the tenant farmers of Ireland; and he might add that the condition of the agricultural labourer generally in the country was greatly improved. The landlords received their rents easily, and the farmers had been obtaining recently large profits in the legitimate and honourable course of business. They hold their land at fair and equitable rents, and were able to cultivate their holdings at a fair and reasonable profit. This condition of prosperity was shown in some degree by the reports of the principal railways in Ireland. The improved condition of the country was strikingly evidenced by the last report of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, in which a most satisfactory account was given of the business of the railway during the past year. With the exception of sheep, it appeared that the traffic in every kind of agricultural produce had increased. The goods traffic had likewise increased. He attached much importance to that fact, because it was well known that many of the towns in the interior of Ireland had suffered materially in their trade from the continuous emigration that had been going on. There could be no doubt that those of the population that had remained at home must have considerably improved in their condition, and that their powers of consumption had become much greater. All those facts went to show that the general prosperity of the country had improved, although he was sorry to say that it had not kept pace with that of the other parts of the United Kingdom. He was not, however, one of those who maintained that nothing was wanted. He thought that the condition of Ireland demanded the immediate attention of the Government and Parliament, as the sources of the country could be much more extensively developed than they had been up to the present time. That prosperity had increased should exist in despite of the political agitation of the country showed that there could not exist between landlord and tenant that amount of distrust and rancour that was alleged; but there undoubtedly did exist a state of law on the relations between them which gave facilities for oppression on one side, and fraud on the other, which required to be remedied by judicious legislation. He had invited their Lordships' attention last year to this subject, and he still thought there could be no doubt of the fact that the law relating to the tenure of land in Ireland required much amendment. The people of Ireland had traditional notions of confiscation which it was very desirable to put an end to; and he was sorry to say that these notions had to some extent been fostered by language which had been held in Parliament. The Fenian conspiracy was based upon the proposition that there should be a re-distribution of land; but when it came out that the land was to be distributed amongst those who came to take possession of the country, many who had been deluded returned to their senses, and he believed that there was not a single man of any property who wished to see the Fenian conspiracy succeed. Upon this subject he must allude to a letter which had appeared in the newspapers with the signature "John Bright," which he hoped was not that of a Member of the other House of Parliament, for a more reprehensible document he had never read. It represented that if the Irish people were not restrained by British soldiers, they would exterminate the landed proprietary. A more untrue representation had never been made, for the landlords of Ireland were on as good terms with their people as were any other employers of labour in any part of the United Kingdom. From Mr. Bright, the Member of Parliament, a suggestion had emanated that the State should buy up large estates from owners who were absentees, and distribute them among the occupiers at fair prices. Without entering upon a detailed discussion of the subject, was it not plain that such a scheme was utterly wild and nonsensical? Was there a single principle of political economy or of any other science to recommend the proposition? Other suggestions of various kinds were not wanting, but they all favoured the taking of land out of the hands of the only persons in Ireland with means adequate for its improvement, and transferring it virtually to a new race of comparatively pauper proprietors. Was it not absurd to say that tenants who were so poorly off that they could not pay their rents, were to buy their landlords' estates? But however absurd these notions were, they had their effect in Ireland. Another proposal was, that every man in Ireland should be authorized by statute to hold his land on a sixty-three years' lease; another fixed on twenty-one years as the proper period. What the gentlemen who made such suggestions would practically achieve, if successful in their views, would be a revival of the old feudal system, under which land was sought to be rendered inalienable. With regard to compensation, he had never heard any landlord, great or small, in Ireland, or any man of common sense, object to give full compensation to a tenant for all real and reasonable improvements effected by him upon the land. It was not true to say that outgoing tenants in Ireland received no compensation for their outlay, for in nine cases out of ten there was compensation, and in cases where there was none, it generally happened that the tenants were in debt for rent, and had ruined the farms. The Bill which he proposed to introduce, and by which he sought to remedy some of the defects of the existing law, contained thirty-one clauses and some schedules, and it was based upon the great principle that everything was to be done by voluntary contracts between landlord and tenant. There were bad tenants in Ireland as well as bad landlords, and no Act bearing upon the subject of compensation and tenure could abolish extortion on the one hand, or roguery on the other. The Bill which had been brought in by the late Government during the previous Session had been much praised by those who professed to be the friends of the tenants, although he must say he had some doubt about that profession; but, as a proof of the real value of the Bill, he might mention that a large meeting of tenant farmers in the county of Cork had condemned the measure as utterly worthless; while landlords universally reprobated it. Even by those who approved it, it was looked upon solely in the light of an instalment, and not by any means as a settlement of the question.

A Bill to simplify the Law of Tenure in Ireland—presented by The Marquess of CLANRICARDE.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 1st."
—(The Marquess of Clanricarde.)

LORD MEREDYTH said, that he had so recently acquired a seat in their Lordships' House that he should not have ventured to address them upon the present occasion unless he had been pointedly referred to by the noble Marquess. He would remind their Lordships that the first attempt was made to settle this question twenty years ago, and yet that now they were no nearer than ever to a settlement. He was therefore inclined to think that we had been proceeding on a wrong basis, attempting to do between man and man that which they ought to do for themselves, stepping in between the landlord and tenant to make a bargain which could not be settled satisfactorily by any but the parties concerned. Only one Bill had passed for regulating this question within twenty years, and that Bill had become a nullity. Having failed so often, let them try now to adopt some measure founded on sound and simple principles. Many people regarded emigration as the great curse of Ireland, but he recollected that at the time of the Irish famine, when he had the honour of holding the office of Secretary for Ireland, the greatest pressure was put upon the Government to compel them to assist emigration, which was then believed by the best friends of the Irish tenants to be the great panacea for the misery existing in that country. Emigration had been greatly increased by a law passed in 1843, rather with the intention of retarding it, which imposed upon the Irish landlords the payment of all rates on holdings under the value of £4 per annum. The result of that measure was that in many districts of Ireland, the landlords, while receiving no rent whatever, were called upon to pay heavy rates for the maintenance of their poor tenants. In what did the evils of emigration consist? Was not the position of the poorer classes of Ireland greatly improved by their emigrating to lands, where, he rejoiced to think, numbers of them were now living in comfort and in happiness? In his opinion every attempt to interfere by legislation between parties to a simple contract must end in total failure. The last Bill on this subject introduced by the late Government was not now before their Lordships, and therefore he need not enter into its details; but it contained provisions which would never have been sanctioned by their Lordships, and which would have proved detrimental and injurious to the very classes for whose benefit the Bill had been introduced. The Bill on the same subject, now before the other House, he was afraid, would disappoint those who were anxious to see this important question settled. The Bill now before their Lordships provided a simple system of voluntary contracts between landlord and tenant, and to codify and simplify the whole of this branch of the law. He believed that if the Bill were passed it would confer a great and lasting benefit upon the people of Ireland, and therefore he trusted that their Lordships would permit it to be read a first time.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, his noble Friend who had just addressed their Lordships (Lord Meredyth) had spoken on this subject with that authority which attached to one who was himself an Irish landlord, and who had great experience in the conduct of Irish affairs, having held for a considerable time the post of Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. His noble Friend had alluded to the measure brought in by the Government last year in terms so condemnatory that, although not inclined to trouble their Lordships by discussing the details of a measure not now before Parliament, he hoped to be excused if he made a few remarks on the question. His noble Friend who introduced the subject (the Marquess of Clanricarde) began by stating that he entirely admitted it was desirable there should be some distinct provision made, by which a tenant who had improved his land should recover compensation for unexhausted improvements. He apprehended that principle was so generally admitted, both in and out of Parliament, that it had become almost a necessity to endeavour to devise some measure by which that justice might be secured to the tenant. His noble Friend behind him (Lord Meredyth) very naturally, dispirited at the want of success which had attended so many attempts, and despairing of effectually dealing with the subject, fell back on a measure which he himself had prepared to facilitate contracts between landlord and tenant. Now he (the Earl of Kimberley) did not so entirely despair of success; and he was glad to see that the Government had endeavoured to produce a measure which might satisfy the just desire of tenants for more satisfactory relations with their landlords. He should be the last person, knowing the great difficulties of the question, to endeavour to prejudice their Lordships against any measure introduced by any one, and no doubt the measure of the Government, if it reached that House, would deserve careful and considerate discussion; but before he said anything on that Bill he would say a word or two in regard to the measure of last year. It was assumed that that measure was a violent interference with the rights of ownership; that it gave the tenant a share in the ownership of the land—the noble Lord said it almost confiscated part of the land and transferred it to the tenant. He entirely denied that this was a just description of the measure. In no sense of the word was it an interference with the rights of the owner—if it had done so he would not have had anything to do with it. Although that Bill endeavoured to procure for the tenant compensation for improvements—although it endeavoured to establish a presumption of law different from that which now existed—namely, that in future the law should presume that the tenant had a right to compensation for improvements unless the owner could establish the contrary—still it allowed the landlord to prevent any claim by restraining the tenant from making any particular improvement. The clause in the Bill was found fault with because it was not sufficiently explicit; but the intention of the framers was that this provision would enable the landlord to restrain his tenant from making any specific improvements against his wishes, and if he refused his assent the tenant would not acquire under the Bill a right to compensation. That was clearly a very necessary provision; for instance, there might be a claim for such an improvement as building a house, which might involve a very great hardship, the land not being fit for such a purpose. The Bill distinctly reserved the fundamental right of the owner to deal with his own land; but it gave the tenant the right which he had in equity to obtain compensation for improvements, unless there was a contract to the contrary. This was the usual practice of prescription as recognised by the law. There was nothing unjust or unfair, no invasion of the right of ownership in it. No doubt there were details in the measure which would have required careful consideration, and probably would have received considerable amendment. But if they fell back on such a measure as that introduced by the noble Marquess, merely for facilitating contracts between landlords and tenants, it would not, he feared, give satisfaction to the tenantry of Ireland. He admitted that the relations between landlord and tenant were improved, that agrarian crime had remarkably diminished, and that agricultural prosperity had advanced in Ireland, attributable to a variety of circumstances; but that was the very time when they ought to legislate upon this subject, instead of waiting till compulsion was put upon them, and they had to legislate during a crisis. This was a moment when tenants might be ready to lay out considerable sums in improvements, and to encourage them it was necessary to give them, in case they should be called upon to leave their farms, the assurance of a right to compensation for unexhausted improvements. As regarded the measure introduced by the Government, though he would not discuss its various provisions, as it was not yet before them, he could not help expressing a doubt respecting a measure which threatened to have the effect of placing all the small tenants in Ireland in something like a position of dependence upon the Treasury of the United Kingdom. He did not object to the principle of giving Imperial assistance further, if that assistance were accompanied by safeguards as to the application of the advances. That might be a mode of settling the question; but he doubted whether it would be safe or convenient to make advances to tenants. He would rather look to the owners themselves, as being able to afford a better security for repayment. He did not wish now to express any decided opinion on the measure of the Government, which ought to be fully discussed, and he hoped that if the Bill reached their Lordships it would be discussed in a calm and temperate spirit. The present discussion would not be without value if it gave an assurance that any measure honestly brought forward would meet with a favourable reception at their Lordships' hands.

LORD DUNSANY feared that, between the expectations of Irish tenants as to what legislation would be on this subject, and any measure likely to pass this House, there was as great a difference as between a hungry man's dream and another man's dinner. The sort of legislative enactment which was spoken of in Parliament would in Ireland be regarded as of no value at all, and if the effect of the present discussion should be to dispel the delusions of the Irish peasantry on this subject, the discussion would have proved beneficial. He trusted that the noble Earl at the head of the Government would make an authoritative declaration to the effect that, anxious as Parliament might be to pass some satisfactory measure, no enactment was likely to be adopted bearing the smallest resemblance to that which the agricultural classes in Ireland were taught to look for from the propounders of revolutionary doctrines. If the effect of this discussion should be to open the eyes of the agricultural classes in Ireland to the difference between the legislation which might pass and the wild notions which they entertained, it would have been very useful. The legislation to which those classes looked forward was revolutionary, and resembled an agrarian law, and if carried out in Ireland could not be refused in England and Scotland. He had a pamphlet in his hand written by a lawyer—not an obscure, briefless barrister, but a Queen's Counsel, and one who had been a Member of the other House of Parliament (Mr. Isaac Butt). In that pamphlet it was observed that if the Irish people resolved to declare their determination to have fixity of tenure for the occupiers of the soil, three years would not pass before a measure for that purpose would become law. The pamphlet was accompanied by the draft of a Bill. The preamble stated that it was desirable to convert short and uncertain tenures into long tenures for terms of years. No doubt it was. It might be desirable when you had taken your house for six months to convert your tenure into one for sixty-three years, or when you had borrowed a horse to retain it for the term of its natural life. The draft Bill, moreover, went on to settle the rent to be paid which was to be on the principle of the Poor Law valuation. Such was the way in which it was proposed to deal with property in Ireland. Under these circumstances, he trusted that their Lordships would hear from the noble Earl at the head of the Government, who was himself a large Irish proprietor, an authoritative declaration that no such revolutionary proposal as this was what was meant by the term the settlement of the relations between landlord and tenant. It was a delusion to suppose that the tenants of Ireland were ardent improvers and the landlords were obstructives. In his neighbourhood nearly all the improvements were made by the landlords; and the tenants were so ignorant of the advantage of drains as to laugh at their construction as the folly of rich men. There were, of course, improving tenants, but these were exceptions, and legislation based on the assumption that the tenants were the invariable improvers would be a great mistake.

EARL GREY said, he hoped his noble Friend the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (the Earl of Kimberley) would excuse him if he ventured to say that, had he wanted an argument for the principle laid down by the noble Marquess who had introduced the Bill, and so well supported by his noble Friend behind him (Lord Meredyth), the speech of his noble Friend would have supplied him with one than which nothing could be more to the purpose. His noble Friend had endeavoured to defend the Bill of the late Government from the charge that it was an invasion of the landlord's rights; but he had only attempted to rebut that charge by showing that the rights which were conferred by it on the tenants were accompanied by safeguards for the landlords, which, in his opinion, must have tended to embroil the landlord and the tenant, and to make the relations between these classes worse than ever. By the Bill of last year the late Government proposed to legislate upon the principle of giving a claim for unexhausted improvements made by the tenant without any agreement with his landlord. If that principle was to be made applicable to everything which might be called improvements, one could easily see what extreme injustice might be done to the landlord. Things might be improvements for the actual tenant, and yet be a positive injury to the land if it were brought into the market. Thus, if there were small farms of ten acres, a cabin on each of them would perhaps be an improvement for the occupying tenants, but it would be a serious injury to the land at the expiration of such a tenancy. Then, if they guarded the landlord by giving him a veto on the improvements of the tenant, they raised questions between the two parties as to what should and what should not be regarded as an improvement. These questions of compensation generally arose many years after the improvements were made, and when, perhaps, one or both of the parties to the original letting were dead. He believed that by legislating on the principle of the Bill of last year they would create still greater difficulties than those which unhappily prevailed at present in connection with the tenure of land in Ireland. There was another principle which if he correctly understood the Bill now proposed by his noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde) was that which he adopted, and it was simply this—to afford every possible facility to landlords and tenants to make their own bargains between themselves, and to establish the practice that their agreements should be in writing, the terms to be plainly expressed, so that there should be no disputes thereafter. He believed that to be the best and simplest plan which could be adopted. In his opinion the system which was desirable was not that the tenants should have a claim for unexhausted improvements, but that they should have leases for such terms as would enable them to get the value of their improvements in the shape of occupation. The larger improvements, such as drainage, should be made by the landlord. The smaller improvements should be made by the tenants, on lease for a sufficient number of years. That system was well known in the North of England, and also in Scotland, where, under leases of nineteen and twenty-one years, the Lothians and both banks of the Tweed had been doubled and trebled in their productive power, and he had no doubt whatever that the introduction of such a system into Ireland would conduce to the greatest amount of good. He objected, however, to claims for compensation on an undefined agreement based upon an Act of Parliament, when such claims might be made perhaps thirty or forty years after the improvements had been effected.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he quite agreed with what had been said by his noble Friend who had just sat down (Earl Grey), that the object of the law ought to be to encourage the granting of leases; but we know as a matter of fact that such was not the state of things in Ireland. Like his noble Friend the late Lord Lieutenant, he thought that the Bill brought in last year might have required amendment in its details, but it was based upon a sound principle, because, in changing the presumption of law, it would have put a stress and strain on the landlords to come to written agreements with their tenants. To do that was, he believed, perfectly consistent with a due regard to the rights of property. In the West of Scotland much good had resulted from the introduction of written agreements, and he thought that the same thing would follow from their adoption in Ireland. He was not in favour of giving any artificial encouragement to the letting of land in very small farms. He hoped that whenever this question came on for discussion in their Lordships' House it would be dealt with without any party feeling. He trusted that it would be considered with the view of doing what was best for the improvement of the tenantry of Ireland, and for placing on a more satisfactory footing the relations between landlord and tenant in that country, without any political feeling whatever.

Earl Grey

VISCOUNT LIFFORD protested against any attempt to apply to Ireland principles which were not applied to England and Scotland. The Bill of the late Government would have had the effect of enabling tenants to make improvements in defiance of their landlords, and this principle was not to be defended.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the words in the 29th clause of the Bill of last year might not have been sufficiently explicit, but the intention had been that if the landlord expressly declared that the tenant should not build a house, the tenant, if he did build, should not be entitled to compensation.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD replied that such might have been the intention, but it certainly was not the reading of the clause.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 1^a, and to be printed. (No. 23.)

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA BILL—(No. 9.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY presented petitions from the Governors, Principal, and Fellows of the M'Gill College, Montreal, from the Provincial Association of Protestant Teachers of Lower Canada, and others, directing attention to several provisions of the Bill and especially to the 93rd clause, which in their operation they feared would have the effect of subjecting them to the will of those possessing the majority of the representation, and they desired the introduction of a clause into the Bill now before Parliament for their security. The petitioners disclaimed all feelings of distrust or hostility to their Roman Catholic brethren, but they foresaw difficulties likely to arise in the future history of the colony which they wished to obviate by timely legislation. The petitioners felt strongly on the point, as their petitions showed. At the same time, so sensible were they of the importance of passing this measure, that if the modifications which they had suggested could not be accepted without endangering the measure itself they would not insist on their demand.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that through the courtesy of the noble Earl who presented these petitions he had enjoyed a previous opportunity of learning their contents; in fact, they had been referred to him at the Colonial Office, and copies of them would be found in the official correspondence. The petitioners he knew to be men of position and great respectability in the Lower Province, and it was accordingly his duty to entertain with due care and consideration the points which they urged. Having done so, he was bound to say that it was wholly impossible to amend the Bill in accordance with the wishes of the petitioners without compromising the success of the measure. The real point which they desired was to secure for ever, both in the general and in the local Legislatures, the same relative representation for the Lower Province which it now possessed. Independently of the fact that many of the proposals were of a municipal character and might be settled by the local Legislature, to introduce the clauses asked for would violate one of the principles upon which the Bill was based—namely, that the local Legislatures should have the power of amending their own constitutions. He could not but think that the views of the petitioners must lead to a multiplication of those sectional interests of which already there were, perhaps, too many in the Provinces. Those petitioners, it seemed to him, were needlessly afraid of the consequences of the scheme. The 80th clause provided that no change should be made in certain districts of Lower Canada—the very districts, in fact, which returned the Protestant minority—without the consent of the Members returned by those districts. Hence the House would perceive that it was almost impossible for any injury to be done to the Protestant minority. The real question at issue between the Protestant and Roman Catholic communities was the question of education, and the 93rd clause, after long controversy, in which the views of all parties had been represented, had been framed. The object of that clause was to guard against the possibility of the members of the minority suffering from undue pressure by the majority. It had been to place all these minorities, of whatever religion, on precisely the same footing, and that, whether the minorities were in esse or in potestate. Thus the Roman Catholic minority in Upper Canada, the Protestant minority in Lower Canada, and the Roman Catholic minority again in the Maritime Provinces would all be placed on a footing of precise equality. He could only say further that if he were to accept an Amendment based on the petitions presented by his noble Friend, it would be difficult to resist other Amendments of an analogous character put forward by opposing interests. In fact, only a few minutes before he entered the House that day he had received a paper setting forth the views of a strong and very respectable Roman Catholic minority, who feared that the 93rd clause would not extend to them the protection which they conceived to be their due. His answer to them, as to his noble Friend, must be that to comply with their wishes would be to depart from a compact entered into by the representatives of all shades of religious and political opinions. If the compromise were departed from in favour of one party, it must inevitably be departed from in favour of another. Therefore, he could not accept from his noble Friend the Amendment which he knew had been prepared, but with much consideration had not been pressed.

LORD LYVEDEN asked for some information as to the powers of the delegates by whom this compromise was entered into, and the quarters from which they derived their authority. A large and influentially-signed petition would soon, he believed, be presented, expressing a hope that this Confederation scheme would not be passed into law before May next, when the results of the elections in Nova Scotia would exhibit in a clearer light to the people of this country what was thought of the Bill in that Province.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that so far as regarded Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland, inasmuch as they refused to be included in the Confederation, it was not necessary for them to send any delegates. With regard to the delegates who came to this country to negotiate the Confederation, they derived their power from the several Provinces which they represented, and were armed with the fullest authority from the Legislative bodies. In the case of Nova Scotia, in which Province only was there a semblance of a difference of opinion, the matter was fully debated as to whether the Governor should be authorized to appoint delegates to proceed to this country for the purpose of arranging the terms of union of the Province, and after a very full discussion it was carried in the affirmative by 13 to 5 in the Legislative Council, and by 31 to 19 in the Legislative Assembly. With respect to Upper and Lower Canada, nothing could be more complete and comprehensive than the power granted to the delegates.

Motion agreed to : House in Committee accordingly ; Amendments made : The Report thereof to be received on Monday next.

PATENTS FOR THE IMPROVEMENT OF SMALL ARMS.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD asked the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether any Departmental Officers, having had the benefit of the experience of the various trials of Small Arms made at the expense of the Government, had taken out patents for the improvement of Small Arms ?

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he was not aware that any such patents had recently been taken out. One officer, indeed, in the Enfield factory, had been about to do so, but, being well advised, had abandoned his claim. Colonel Boxer, it was true, had taken out a patent for a cartridge which had been found to be of value in connection with the Snider rifle ; but the War Department had always discouraged the practice of officers taking out patents. Though, however, the practice had been discouraged, there was no absolute prohibition on the subject before General Peel came into office. The noble Lord who preceded him in office (the Marquess of Hartington) had expressed his opinion that these proceedings were objectionable, and his judgment was to deal with the matter by legislative enactment in connection with the revision of the patent laws. The subject was some time under consideration, when a difficulty arose, because while the law advisers of the War Department were in favour of proceeding by legislation, the Law Officers of the Crown were of a different opinion, and referred the question back as one that should be entirely regulated by the Department. The consequence was that no immediate action was taken. Another element of difficulty was that, whereas the War Department objected to patents under such circumstances, the Board of Admiralty did not, and on being referred to declined to concur with the Secretary of War in issuing a general prohibition. The matter had attracted the attention of General Peel, who was understood to be averse to the practice, and would before long consider whether it was advisable to take any steps by legislation either on the part of the Department alone, or in connection with the other Departments ; so that in future departmental officers should no longer be permitted to take out patents in relation to improvements which came under their official notice.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) ACT CONTINUANCE BILL.

NOTICE.

THE EARL OF DERBY : My Lords, it is proposed, and I believe that there is no objection to the proposal, that this House shall meet to-morrow, at one o'clock, in order to read the first time a Bill—the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act—which has just come from the House of Commons. The Act at present in operation expires on Tuesday next, and it is necessary that the Bill now before Parliament should be passed before that day. I shall also move to-morrow the suspension of the Standing Orders, in order that the Bill may be passed through all its stages on Monday.

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, One o'clock.

QUESTION.

SIR THOMAS LLOYD said, he wished to ask the Vice-President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Registrar General on the defective sanitary condition of Wales; and whether he is prepared to take any steps to remedy the serious evils complained of?

• MR. CORRY, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the Report in question, and during the course of last year medical officers of the Privy Council were sent down from time to time to various localities, on the outbreak of epidemic disease, for the purpose of giving advice to the local authorities, with whom it rested to initiate sanitary improvements. In default of their doing so, the inhabitants of a place might complain to the Government, which would institute inquiries on the subject.

ADMIRALTY STEERING AND SAILING RULES.—QUESTION.

MR. HOLLAND said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the existing "Steering and Sailing Rules;" and whether it is intended to cause any inquiry to be made as to their efficiency, with a view to prevent disasters arising from collisions at sea?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the Question of the hon. Member is one of the greatest possible interest in this commercial country. Some years ago the sailing rules at sea were most carefully considered, and at last rules were agreed upon by the Admiralty, the Board of Trade, and the Trinity House; these were approved by foreign countries; and on the whole, notwithstanding the accidents which have recently occurred, I am disposed to think that those accidents are rather to be attributed to the neglect and ignorance of existing rules than to any defect in the rules themselves. At the same time, the question is one of so much interest that, several accidents having occurred recently, I propose to confer with the Board of Trade and the Trinity House in order to ascertain, not so much as to whether the system can be changed as to whether it is not possible that those rules may be made more simple and effectual, especially with regard to the exhibition of lights.

HOLYHEAD UNION.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, If he has taken into his consideration the Petition from the parish of Holyhead lately presented to this House, together with any Special Report from the Poor Law Inspector of the district, Mr Doyle, urging the necessity of immediate Legislative interference, to enforce upon the Guardians of the Holyhead Union the building a workhouse and hospital for the sick poor, and giving means for instruction to orphan and pauper children in the Union; and if he will be prepared to bring in a Bill to enforce the same; and if he will lay upon the table of the House any Report or Papers relating to this subject?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Very soon, Sir, after I came to the Poor Law Board this subject was brought before me, and the facts were of so dreadful and disgusting a character that I made up my mind at the time that it should be the fault of Parliament and not mine if measures were not taken to redress the grievances existing in that district. It appears that no workhouse has ever been built, and that cases had occurred in which people suffering from typhus fever have lain for weeks on chairs in common lodging-houses, for the want of proper accommodation, and that girls of tender age have been lodged in a common brothel because no workhouse was provided. If the House will take the trouble to read the petition presented by the hon. Member for Beaumaris, it can have no doubt that there is strong grounds for legislative interference. I propose, as soon as I have the opportunity, to bring in a Bill to invest the Poor Law Board with a power they do not possess. At present they can compel the making of alterations in a workhouse, but they have no power to compel the building of one. At other places—very few, I am happy to say—there is almost an equal call for interference; and I shall have pleasure in laying the Reports that relate to Anglesea and Holyhead on the table.

MR. NEATE said, he would suggest that it was a question for the consideration of the Law Officers of the Crown whether persons who had been so far guilty of a breach of the trust placed in them were not punishable at Common Law.

POSTAL SERVICE WITH THE UNITED STATES.—QUESTION.

MR. BAXTER said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will lay before the House the recent correspondence between the Postmasters General of Great Britain and the United States, with reference to the postal service between the two Countries; and whether, in making the new arrangements consequent on the termination of the Cunard contract, care will be taken to give the public the benefit of the great competition now existing between the various steamship companies having vessels on the North Atlantic?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that there would be no objection to lay before the House the recent correspondence between the Postmasters General of Great Britain and of the United States with reference to the postal service between the two countries, and with respect to the proposed new arrangements consequent on the termination of the Cunard contract the public would have the full benefit of open competition with regard to the contract for steamers to be employed in carrying the mails.

POOR LAW — RATING OF CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. BIDDULPH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Poor Law Board, Whether his attention has been called to the fact that hospitals and other charitable institutions, formerly held to be exempt from poor and other parochial rates, are by a recent decision made assessable for these rates; and whether he proposes to recommend any alteration in the Law so affecting them?

MR. EARLE: Sir, the decision referred to by the hon. Member for Herefordshire, as establishing the liability of hospitals and other charitable institutions to contribute to poor-rates, has certainly not escaped the attention of my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board. As, however, the state of the law will probably be further elucidated by the decision of the Courts, in some cases now pending, I cannot at present say more than that the whole question of exemptions from rating is under the consideration of the Government.

Mr. Neute

ARMY—GOVERNMENT POWDER MAGAZINES.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT KINGLAKE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether any Report has been made by a Committee of Officers appointed by the Secretary of State for War in 1865, to inquire into the storage of Gunpowder in Government Magazines; and whether any alteration has been or is about to be made in the system of storing Gunpowder in public or private Magazines?

GENERAL PEEL said, in reply, that a Report was made by the Committee of 1865, and they estimated the cost would be £151,000 for the removal of the principal magazines. No steps had been taken on that Report on account of the inquiry which was going on as to the desirability of protecting gunpowder by Mr. Gale's process.

SUGAR DUTIES—DRAWBACK ON SUGAR. QUESTION.

MR. CRUM-EWING said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will state at what date the new Regulations as to the amount of Drawback on Sugar, to be allowed by France, Holland, and Belgium respectively, as provided for by the recent Convention, are to come into operation; and, in the event of that being delayed beyond the 1st day of March, whether the change of the Duties and Drawbacks on Sugar in this country shall be postponed, in order that the change may take place simultaneously in all the countries which are parties to the Convention?

MR. HUNT: As soon, Sir, as the Resolutions were passed by this House they were communicated, through the Foreign Office, to the Powers who are parties to the Convention, with a request that they would furnish the British Government with information as to the date at which they would be prepared to carry out the arrangement. At present an answer has been received from Belgium only, stating that the Government of Belgium were prepared to carry out the arrangements on the 1st of March in case the other Governments would do the same. It would be obviously disadvantageous to our interests if the high drawbacks now existing in foreign countries should not come to an end at the time the new scale of duties here began, and therefore the Government propose, unless they are assured by the other three parties to the Convention that they will be prepared to make the change on the 1st of March, to delay the passing of the Bill through this House, so that we may be in a position to alter the date from the 1st of March to any subsequent date that may be agreed upon by the four Powers, and that the new scale may come into operation in all countries simultaneously.

GOVERNMENT SUPERINTENDENCE OF TELEGRAPH LINES.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill for placing the Telegraph Lines in the Kingdom under the superintendence of the State?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that the question had been under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but it was obvious that a question of this magnitude required mature consideration, and he was not in a position at present to say that the Government had come to any determination on the subject.

IRELAND—FENIAN PRISONERS.

EXPLANATION.

MAJOR STUART KNOX: Sir, as the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) thought fit last night to misrepresent what I stated on the subject of the treatment of Fenian prisoners, I have given private notice to the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland that I will ask him, Whether prisoners arrested under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act in Ireland have not always been treated in the same way as untried prisoners and insolvent debtors?

LORD NAAS: The observation of the hon. and gallant Member is strictly true. The rule is that the prisoners apprehended under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant, no matter in what gaol they may be, are treated in regard to food, exercise, and other matters precisely in the same way as untried prisoners or persons imprisoned for debt.

PRINCESS OF WALES—ADDRESS OF CONGRATULATION TO HER MAJESTY.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, this House, I am sure, will be rejoiced to offer an Address of Congratulation to Her Majesty on the happy event which has occurred in the Royal Family of the birth of a Princess in the direct line of the Royal House. The Royal Family of this country live so much in the eye as well as in the heart of the nation, that some domestic sentiment must necessarily mix with the public feeling which dictates and sanctions this Address, and I am sure the House will offer with every sincerity, and with the utmost and most respectful cordiality, the congratulations which we all feel on this occasion, and the unalterable devotion which we entertain to Her Majesty and the Royal Family. I beg to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to congratulate Her Majesty on the Princess of Wales having happily given birth to a Princess, and to assure Her Majesty of our feelings of devoted loyalty and attachment to Her Majesty's Person and Family."

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish, Sir, to be permitted to second the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, and I will only add to what has fallen from him, that the indisposition from which Her Royal Highness has been suffering before the event, has contributed to supply an additional interest in an event which would always come home to the hearts of the nation. I beg to express an earnest hope that the Princess may be relieved from any continuance of that suffering, and that she may continue to enjoy, together with every other blessing which Providence has been pleased to bestow upon her, that uninterrupted health which is the desire of the whole country.

Address agreed to.

Resolved, Nemine Contradicente, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to congratulate Her Majesty on the Princess of Wales having happily given birth to a Princess, and to assure Her Majesty of our feelings of devoted loyalty and attachment to Her Majesty's Person and Family.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BENTINCK said, he rose to call attention to the Estimates for the designs of the New Courts of Justice. He thought it his duty in the last Parliament to bring before the House on two occasions the unsatisfactory mode in which it was proposed that the New Law Courts should be built.

It appeared then to be the opinion of Her Majesty's Government that by some proceeding or in some mode the House had parted with its jurisdiction over the subject, and handed it over to the Commissioners. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) in the last discussion expressed himself to the effect that, as an independent body had been chosen to exercise an economical control over the work, the House ought to abstain from interfering with those to whom that charge had been committed. That view was so irreconcilable with the facts of the case that, coming from so great an authority, it required satisfactory explanation. It was for the purpose, therefore, of raising this question that he had placed his Notice upon the Paper. If the subject was a matter of interest last Session, it was now a matter of urgency, because they had the estimates of the competing architects before them. The scheme of a concentration of the Law Courts had been many years before the public, and had led to much adverse criticism, not because any one doubted that concentration was desirable, and that the officers of the law should have a proper place for carrying on their business, but because there was a strong opinion among high authorities that it was not right to appropriate the Suitors' Fee Fund to such a purpose, and that this was the beginning of an expenditure of which no human being could see the end. The Government of the day, therefore, when proposing their measures, were very strictly questioned, and their answers were most frank and explicit. His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), in his capacity of Attorney General, had charge of the Bill, and in introducing it in February, 1865, and on other occasions during the progress of the measure, stated that the estimate was one on which the utmost reliance might be placed. That Mr. Pennethorne had estimated the cost of the site at £703,000, and the cost of the building at £750,000, so that the entire expense would not exceed £1,500,000. His hon. and learned Friend added that with proper superintendence there was no reason to expect any great excess over the estimate. In the other House of Parliament a statement was made to the same effect by Lord Westbury, but that did not satisfy their Lordships, and, so desirous were they that there should be no mistake upon the matter, they inserted a clause in the Bill and sent it down to the House of Commons, where it was in principle adopted—that no notice for the purchase of the property should be given until it had been certified by the Commission to the Treasury that the cost of the building was not to exceed the sum provided by Parliament. So much for 1865. In 1866, during the repeated discussions on this subject, it was never suggested by the late Government that the estimate would be exceeded, and on the 5th of July last the certificate required by the Act was given to the Treasury, signed by his right hon. Friends the Members for South Lancashire and Hertford (Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Cowper), his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, and by several other distinguished persons. It was therefore with great surprise that he had observed the amounts of the estimates of the competing architects now made public. Eleven architects competed, and of the estimates sent in two amounted to about £1,100,000, four to £1,250,000, one exceeded £1,300,000, two exceeded £1,400,000, one was nearly £1,600,000, and last, not least, one exceeded £2,000,000. Now, he thought it hardly possible that such estimates should have been furnished had not the architects received an intimation that the Commission would not adhere to the sum to which they originally bound themselves. Indeed, it was reported that the Commission had applied to the Government for a further grant, and that they actually proposed to make use of the Common Law Fee Fund as security for the money to be thus raised. Considering, however, the animadversions which were passed on the appropriation of the Suitors' Fee Fund by the present Prime Minister and by the Home Secretary, he could hardly believe that the Government would entertain the proposal. The funds provided by the Act were £900,000 from the Suitors' Fee Fund, £200,000 from the sites of the present Law Courts, and £400,000 to be advanced by the Government on the security of taxes on the suitors. If, however, the costs of the building were to be doubled, he should like to know how the additional sum was to be provided. The Suitors' Fund was exhausted, and it only remained to tax the suitors further. Would the House permit this? It was said that this was a mere lawyers' hobby, with which the Government had nothing to do, and that the suitors were well able to bear the burden, but he hoped the House would not take that view, and would extend to suitors the same consideration as to any other section of the community. The true explanation of so grave a breach of faith consisted, as in the case of the Vote for the Paris Exhibition, in the existence of an irresponsible body acting behind the scenes and pulling the wires, and to whom the taxation of British suitors was of no account, and who had no motive for economy. It was, then, high time that the House should assume the responsibility of the works, and assert its own jurisdiction in matters of finance. There was another point to which he would advert—the defective tribunal which had been appointed to select the design. The Commission had named only five gentlemen as judges of the designs, and to these certainly no exception could be taken. There were the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) and the late Commissioner of Works (Mr. Cowper), who represented the Government; the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), and the Chief Justice of England, who represented the law; but there was only one Member who represented the general public. Architecture and art were without representation. Hence the country has had an insufficient choice, for no design in the modern style had been exhibited. Of ten bond fide competitors named, seven were “Goths,” and from this unfair appointment as well as for other reasons, the three “Non-Goths,” and the artistic public inferred that no design, except one in the “Gothic” style would have any chance of success. The designs exhibited were very curious, no doubt, as illustrations of Gothic cathedrals, feudal castles, and other mediæval monuments, but they were most extravagant in their character, costly in their estimates, and barbarous in their details. He was satisfied that had the responsibility rested with the Government, a liberal-minded tribunal would have been appointed, as had been done by the noble Lord (Lord John Manners) in the case of the National Gallery. The Civil Service Estimates had always appeared to him to be the plague-spot of our expenditure, and he had brought forward this question as one of economy, in which hon. Members of all parties ought to co-operate.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that all arrangements respecting the building of the New Courts of Justice should be effected under the sole responsibility of Her Majesty’s Government,” —(Mr. Bentinck,) —instead thereof.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE was sorry that his hon. Friend should, in bringing the case before the House, have prejudiced it by giving an opinion on the merits of the designs, and so lending a colour to the supposition that there were some artistic or personal objection on his part to the designs underlying the general subject. The somewhat entangled and unsequential statement of his hon. and learned Friend divided itself into four points, with some of which he agreed, but not with all. The hon. Member complained of what he called the sequestration of the Suitors’ Fee Fund; he complained of the responsible Government of the country having delegated its duties to a Commission; he complained of the absence of the artistic element in the body of judges, and he complained of the castellated, monastic, et cetera, et cetera, character of the designs. These four objections stood on different bases, some of which would hold water, while others certainly would not; but to attempt to raise the question on all these issues would be to bring about utter confusion in the end. In the first place, as to the so-called sequestration of the Suitors’ Fee Fund, he must say that, looking at that enormous sum of money which had gone rolling on, year after year, of no use to any one, simply a sort of “no man’s land,” a fund that seemed to be grinning and mocking in its own gigantic exuberance—to take that money and appropriate it to the real use of the suitors, to the service of justice, and to modifications in the system of our judicial administration, the benefits of which no one as yet, in all probability, adequately appreciated, would be a reform of a most salutary and satisfactory character. [Mr. BENTINCK: I did not complain of the sequestration of the Suitors’ Fund.] Then the hon. Member gave the House a very good imitation of so complaining. He felt a personal interest in this question, for he had had the honour, when in the House, about nine years ago, of obtaining, on behalf of the Incorporated Law Society, that Royal Commission, on whose recommendation all that had since taken place had been effected. As to the second point—the personal superintendence of the Government—he also agreed with the hon. Gentleman. If we were to have a Minister of Works he ought to superintend the construction of all great works of the nation. He thought there was no worse feature of our political hierarchy than the subordinate position to which the Department of Works was reduced. Sometimes the head of this Department was in the Cabinet, and sometimes he was not; and he did not think there was any country in the civilized world, except England, where the Minister of Works was not ex officio a Member of the Cabinet. The Ministry of Works used to be called the Woods and Forests. He was a sort of land agent of the Crown. Some thirty years ago the superintendence of the national buildings was intrusted to him; but with the usual half policy of this country he was only set up as a sort of three-quarter Minister, while, true to the British feeling of setting two men to do the work of one, our reformers shortly after supplemented him with a half-Minister, the Vice President of Education, on whom they heaped duties of an artistic nature far more appropriate to the Commissioner of Works. As to the third point, the composition of the Board of Judges, he, as representing the architectural profession of the country, was the instrument through whom a memorial was presented to the Treasury on their behalf, suggesting certain changes; but the answer he received from the Secretary of the Treasury was simply—"You are too late," without any attempt being made to meet his arguments. In all these three points he thought his hon. Friend had established his case. But the great grievance of his hon. Friend was the barbarous mediæval Gothic of the designs, which to him seemed to have the same effect as a scarlet cloth had on a certain most useful and meritorious inhabitant of our fields. There he (Mr. Hope) owned that he did not go with his hon. Friend. He did not go with him as to £750,000. Architects could not make their bricks without straw; and the arbitrary sum set down as the price of the building became inadequate when provision was required not only for Equity as well as Common Law, but for Probate Courts and Record Chambers, passages, and meeting rooms, and refreshment-rooms, and all sorts of arrangements

to enable lawyers to get in and the clients to be kept out, and the general public to be civilly and quietly bamboozled. These additions did not come within the original £750,000 estimate, and when the architects were required to carry out these extra works, it was not right to blame them for producing plans which exceeded that estimate. Then as to choice of style, it was a remarkable thing that in the voluminous instructions to the architects not a single word about style was mentioned, directly or indirectly. His hon. Friend said, "Leave the matter in the hands of the Government," and then he went on to explain what he meant. The Government had now ordered the designs to be prepared in what he (Mr. Bentinck) called the "simple modern style"—that was, he (Mr. Hope) supposed, in the style which we all admired in Harley Street and Baker Street. They would have had a repetition, on a large scale, of 73, Upper Baker Street; but it so happened that the list of architects was not framed by the Commissioners but by the Government, by the late First Commissioner of Works; and in that list of architects, as originally drafted, about half the number were admirers of the simple modern style, and only the other half were Goths and Vandals. But two or three of the Italian architects withdrew, and their names had to be filled up. Still, the second names were chosen very impartially, and yet, when it came to the scratch, not a single Italian architect was found to stand to his gun. With one consent, but with no mutual deliberation, each man for himself came to the conclusion that for the temple of traditionary British law, the law that produced a Lyttelton, and a Bracton, and a Gascoigne, an Italian or Grecian edifice would be a startling anachronism. Every one of the architects, without any concert, came forward with a Gothic design. He pitied his hon. Friend. He knew what

"Affliction'sore long time he bore"

since the designs had been hung up; but he (Mr. Hope) ventured to say that neither Government nor Commission would have made any difference in the matter. English Law Courts, built in English architecture, was what English common sense dictated. In conclusion, the hon. Member expressed a hope that his hon. Friend would not press his Motion to a division.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, he hoped that the hon. Member for White-haven would not think it his duty to press his Motion, because it would put an end to the possibility of proceeding with other Notices on the Paper. No doubt, the responsibility in this matter must rest with the Executive Government, and could not be thrown upon any other person. The late Government in their Bill did not originally ask that this responsibility should be shared by any other body. That was a suggestion from independent Members on the opposite side of the House, who thought that it would insure the satisfactory prosecution of the work. He believed it was the present Attorney General who made that suggestion. The clause in the Act requiring the Treasury to consult with a Commission to be appointed for that purpose was introduced at his instance. That, however, was not a clause that took from the Treasury their control and responsibility: and no excess of the original estimate, or extension of the buildings beyond the site originally proposed, could be agreed upon by that Commission, without rendering it necessary to come again to Parliament for further powers. The hon. Member for Whitehaven had correctly quoted his (Sir Roundell Palmer's) statement to the House that the late Government had done the best they could to ascertain for what sum the buildings could be erected. They had obtained the advice of Mr. Pennethorne and Mr. Hunt, who both thought that the estimate of £750,000 might be sufficient for the cost of the building. He (Sir Roundell Palmer) had, however, added at the time that, when a building was begun it was possible to exceed any estimates that might be made; but he stated that the Treasury were determined to watch narrowly over and check the expenditure, and to prevent any extravagant outlay upon ornament and decoration as distinguished from useful work. When we got into the region of architectural beauty it was impossible to impose any limit, and it was for the House to consider and determine what should be expended for the sake of architectural beauty. The primary object was to obtain practical utility, and there was reason honestly to believe that if no unnecessary ornament were adopted the buildings originally contemplated might be erected upon the site, and for the sum originally proposed. It was the duty of the Commissioners, at the outset, to inquire, and they did inquire, into the question of the probable sufficiency of the site, and of the outlay, provided for by the Act. They did so; and upon the evidence laid before them, they signed the necessary certificate upon that subject; but they had not, and could not have, before them, any definite plans; and they did not, and could not, take into account, for the purpose of that preliminary estimate, any excess of cost, or any extension of the site, which might result from any subsequent enlargement of the original design, or from any regard to considerations of architectural beauty. It was quite consistent with this, that the Commissioners might afterwards recommend the execution of the work, for the sake of greater perfection and public convenience, in a manner which, if sanctioned by Parliament, might involve greater space and increased cost. It was true that the Commissioners thought it would be an advantage to have additional land, not that the land was absolutely necessary for the work, but that the work would be made more perfect and the results more satisfactory if it were taken, of course, with the consent of Parliament. The Commissioners did not change their minds as to the practicability of erecting courts and offices on the site originally proposed for the sum that had been named; but they believed that if the opportunity of taking additional land was now lost that land would consequently acquire an increased value, and when it ultimately had to be taken the public would have to pay a great deal more for it. The Commissioners recommended, therefore, that an application should be made to Parliament for taking additional land; but the execution of the work would not necessarily depend on that land being taken. He could confirm the statement of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. Beresford Hope) that neither directly nor indirectly did any suggestion emanate from the Commissioners to any of the architects as to the style they should adopt in their designs, or the estimates they should make. They were simply told what were the practical requirements of the building, and no doubt this information was given in an ample and detailed form. The result was that the architects had produced designs and estimates according to their own taste and judgment, and the designs they had produced were doubtless of a highly decorative, ornamental, and expensive character, going (it might be) far beyond what would be absolutely necessary for the completion of the work, even with some reasonable regard to architectural beauty. Neither Government nor the House was obliged to adopt any of those designs or estimates. Of all this decoration and ornament a great and expensive part might doubtless be cut off, and the designs might be modified in any manner which might be thought proper; but when the architect was selected, it would be for the House to consider how far it might be expedient to expend, for the purpose of adorning the metropolis, more money than was absolutely required to carry out the practical object in view. He had no intention to say a word that would prejudice that question whenever it might arise; but he thought nothing could be more unjust than to say that the original project was one that had proceeded on insufficient grounds merely because the Commission had invited plans which were not to be limited to the exact area at present authorized to be taken, or because the architects had produced designs of a highly ornamental character and great beauty and extent, and had estimated their cost at very considerable sums. If it were thought desirable to accept one of these designs Parliament would be asked to sanction that step; if it were not thought desirable, the work might be executed on a scale of less completeness, and inferior architectural beauty, but still to the great practical benefit of the administration of justice.

MR. POWELL said, he trusted that before the debate came to a close the House would be satisfied that the expense of the site for the New Courts of Justice would not be so much in excess of the original estimate as the expense of the building seemed likely to be. With reference to the source from which the money was to be obtained, he must remind the House that it would be raised by means of a charge in the nature of an annuity upon the fees; but the question for the House to consider was whether, for the sake of erecting a handsome building, it would consent thus to increase the cost of litigation of Her Majesty's subjects. As far as the excess of the cost over the original estimates was concerned, it could not fail to be remarked that the estimates of the architects, whose calculations were based on prices ranging, say, from 9d. to 13d. per cubic foot, were far from extravagant, yet it appeared that they never expected anything else; for one of them had recorded the opinion that, considering the large space to be covered, the building could not possibly be raised for £750,000; while another indulged in a sportive vein, declaring that "he never expected that the building could be erected for anything approaching to £750,000, and he supposed every one else who knew anything about it felt the same." No one for a moment doubted the high character of the judges of the designs; but it was a fair ground for apprehension that six gentlemen, engaged in active life, and not all of them accustomed to the consideration of large questions connected with Art, might find some difficulty in supplying themselves with all the information that was necessary for arriving at a sound conclusion. He knew that some anxiety was felt that those who had to supply this information to the judges should be without any prejudice in favour of any particular architect or any particular style; and if there was any hesitation in arriving at a decision, he trusted that it might not be thought objectionable to appoint two or three architects to make a report more fully illustrating and explaining the nature of the designs. He did not agree with the unfavourable criticisms of the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck) upon the designs. Fault might perhaps be found with some of the details; but their general conception was eminently creditable to the architects; they showed the high degree of architectural skill now existing in the country; and if preserved (as he understood they were to be), they would prove hereafter that we do not live in an age of degenerate Art, but in one in which Art had attained great nobleness and richness, in proportion to the increase in the national magnificence and splendour.

MR. CARNEGIE said, there could be little doubt, from what had been stated, that some of the architects had disregarded the instructions that had been given with regard to the cost of the building. They reminded him of those troublesome tradesmen who, when asked for a particular commodity, would insist in offering another and more expensive article, which they said was a great deal better. He hoped the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bentinck) would persevere in his Motion. The designs might be very beautiful, but they were not the things that were ordered, and he hoped they would only be regarded as so many advertisements of the skill of the architects.

MR. DILLWYN said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Bentinck) that some responsible Minister of the Crown ought to undertake the control of such a large expenditure as that which was contemplated for the New Law Courts. This was another illustration of the practice, which could not be too severely watched, of the House being asked to vote hundreds of thousands of pounds without any satisfactory explanation from any responsible Minister.

MR. COWPER said, he wished to assure his hon. Friend that there was no question at issue as to relieving the Government from responsibility with respect to the erection of the buildings to which the Resolution related. The Commission had been appointed simply to consider and Report on the subject, and to collect information, which they had done with great accuracy and success, for the preparation of detailed instructions in reference to the plans. On that Commission all branches of the legal profession, including several Judges, were represented; for no persons, it was thought, were likely to arrive at a sounder conclusion as to the requirements of the New Courts than those who would have to occupy them. It was quite true that when the Commissioners came to consider those requirements with regard to the future, they took a more enlarged view of the extent of accommodation which would be necessary, than entered into the contemplation of the Government when the Act was passed. The estimate of £750,000 was, he still maintained, quite adequate to secure the amount of space which it was then intended to provide. The Commission were, however, of opinion that as a great structure was to be erected in which all the Law Courts were to be concentrated, it would be a pity to lose the opportunity thus afforded of going beyond the immediate wants of the hour, and providing for those of some years hence, as well as of combining with the building offices which were not absolutely required, but which they deemed it desirable to have concentrated. The schedule, consequently, on which the architects had to proceed embraced a much larger number of rooms than was at first proposed. Next arose the question whether the Government or the House were committed to the expenditure involved in the estimates of these designs? His answer was that it would be quite open to the Government, after an award had been made on the designs, and an architect appointed, to determine that the building finally to be erected should contain no more accommodation than was originally intended. The excellence and talent of the designs would be admitted by almost every one, except the hon. Member for Whitehaven, who, although very fond of talking about Art, and claiming taste and knowledge, had showed himself on all occasions to be quite incapable of seeing any merit in the style best fitted for this purpose. The Motion of the hon. Member for Whitehaven, therefore, merely endorsed the adoption of the course that it had been intended to follow from the beginning; and as far as the complaints of the hon. Gentleman regarded the expense of the designs, he would remind the House that not a farthing of it would be paid out of the Imperial revenue. For the £200,000 to be advanced from the Consolidated Fund, a full consideration was given in the unused buildings — the value of which was believed to be in excess of that sum, while the balance would be obtained partly from the Surplus Interest Fund hitherto invested in Government securities, and partly from the Court Fees, which it was very properly proposed to levy upon the suitors who would have the benefit of the new building.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that as the appointment of the Commission had been decided upon before the present Government came into office, he thought it right to allow a Member of the late Administration to explain the circumstances of the case before he ventured to speak on the subject. Having heard from the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that explanation, he had no wish to add to it a single word. One or two remarks had, however, been made in the course of the discussion to which he thought it right that he should reply. It had been stated that recourse had been had to the advice of two gentlemen of great eminence—Mr. Pennethorne and Mr. Hunt—and that, in accordance with their advice, the sum of £750,000 had been fixed on as the cost of the new buildings. That, no doubt, was so; but subsequently to the making of that estimate a very considerable addition to the building was proposed, and it was quite clear that a sum which might be adequate to the carrying out of the plans of 1865 might be totally insufficient for the execution of those of 1866. It was therefore unfair, under those altered conditions, to charge either those two able gentlemen with having submitted inadequate estimates, or the distinguished architects who entered into the competition with having produced in the latter year elaborate designs which, if adopted, would involve the expenditure of £1,000,000 or £1,500,000. He gathered from what fell from the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) that, in his opinion, a considerable saving might be effected by diminishing the amount of ornamentation. He thought, however, that that was to a great extent a fallacy, for he could not think that any very considerable reduction could be made in that way. The Secretary of State for War had often said that if the House would let him know the number of soldiers to be voted he would state what would be the cost of maintaining them. The same rule might be applied to buildings, for if they told the architect or builder how many cubic feet of building was required, he would be able to arrive at a pretty accurate estimate of the expense. Of course, everything would be done with a view of keeping the expenditure within reasonable bounds; but he must say that any Motion which at the present moment would intercept altogether the action of the Commission would be a great misfortune. He was not there to defend the origin of that Commission; but as it had been intrusted with this immense work, and had sustained all the weight and labour of the preliminary stages of this gigantic undertaking, and as they had, in a manner certainly abnormal, but with sufficient reason, appointed judges who were actually on the point of commencing their important labours, it would not be right for the House of Commons to turn round and throw the whole responsibility upon Her Majesty's present Advisers. Under these circumstances, he joined in the wish expressed by several hon. Members that the present Motion might be withdrawn.

INDIA—THE MAHARAJAH OF MYSORE. QUESTION.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, If the Government has come to any decision on the recent appeal of the Maharajah of Mysore with regard to the succession of his adopted son; and, if so, whether he is prepared to lay on the table of the House any Correspondence that may have passed on the subject? In order to render the Question intelligible it would be necessary for him to make a few explanatory remarks, not for the purpose of discussing the merits of the case—as that would be premature pending the announcement of the intentions of the Government—but merely in order to state his reasons for asking the Question. It had been often noted that the House was disinclined to discuss Indian questions, but he could not believe that it could be really indifferent to the interests of 100,000,000 of our subjects in India. The province of Mysore was of great extent. It contained 12,000 square miles, and had a population of 3,000,000, and yielded a yearly revenue of £1,000,000. This country was under the government of a native Hindoo dynasty for many generations, but about a century ago it was conquered by the celebrated Hyder Ali, from whom it descended to his son, Tippoo Sultan. In 1799 the united arms of the British and the Nizam re-took it from Tippoo Sultan, and it was then in the power of the Governor General to have divided the territory between the British Government and its allies. It was thought advisable, however, to re-establish the old Hindoo dynasty in order that it might act as a counterpoise to the Mahomedan Governments of the South of India. For that purpose the Governor General took a boy, the representative of the ancient Maharajah of Mysore, not from a dungeon, as had often been stated, but from private life, and by virtue of a treaty with the Nizam placed him on the throne. Surrounded by parasites, and having an unlimited command of money, it was not surprising that the young Prince turned out to be a weak and dissipated ruler, though he was neither cruel nor rapacious; and in due course, under the provisions of a treaty, the British Government stepped in and sequestered the country, and from that time to this the country had been under the administration of British officers. Although there might be some question as to the grounds on which we interfered, yet the benefits conferred on the country had fully compensated for the irregularity of that interference, and he was not prepared to advocate the restoration of the old Rajah, who had now for thirty-three years been unused to the toils of government. But there was another matter on which the Rajah had some ground of complaint, and that was with respect to the right of succession. For a long time it was believed, both in India and England, that the Rajah had an intention of bequeathing his territory on his decease in free gift to the British Government, and the probability was that, if he had been restored, he would have done so. But being disappointed in respect to his restoration, he lent his ear to other counsels and adopted a son and heir as his successor, according to the Hindoo law. Now, the Home Government had disallowed this claim to appoint a successor, and it was this point which he wished to bring under the notice of the House. The question might be considered both in a legal and in a political point of view. Firstly, whether the Rajah really had any right to appoint a successor; and secondly, whether it was expedient on our part to acknowledge that successor? It was contended by the late Government that the Rajah had no right whatever to appoint a successor; it was maintained that his claim to the throne was purely personal, as he had attained his position in virtue of a personal treaty, the conditions of which he did not observe, and thereby allowed his territory to be sequestered by the British Government. In reality, however, the Rajah did not become Sovereign of Mysore in virtue of any treaty whatever with us, either personal or perpetual. He acquired his position in virtue of our treaty with the Nizam. When once he was placed on the throne and declared to be a Sovereign he acquired all the rights inherent and indefeasible in a Sovereign, and one of those was the right of hereditary succession, and sequestration did not invalidate that right in any respect. The article which authorized sequestration in case of the non-fulfilment of obligations, which he read, contained nothing to invalidate the rights of the Pasha as an independent Sovereign, or to interfere with his leaving his territories to a successor. In reality, the payment of the subsidy had never fallen into arrear; where we were authorized to sequester territory merely as the equivalent of a deficiency we had sequestered the whole country, and what was to be temporary we had made permanent. Courts of Justice had, however, repeatedly ruled that the position of the Rajah was that of an independent Sovereign, and that Mysore was foreign territory, where a writ issued from a British Court of Judicature could not be executed. The Rajah, indeed, was admitted to be an independent Prince, although he lived as a private person, and it seemed an arbitrary exercise of power to disallow his right to appoint a successor. It must be remembered that in India the law regarded an adopted son in the same light as a natural born son, and to disinherit him was equal to saying that the property of a man who had been temporarily deprived of its administration—by the decree of a Commission of Lunacy for instance—should lapse to the Crown upon his death. If the legal view of the case was strong, the moral and political one was much stronger. Some years ago there was a perfect rage for the acquisition of new territory in India. Principality after principality was annexed, the annexation mania culminating in the acquisition of Oude, which was closely connected with, if it did not originate, the Indian rebellion of 1857. After the extinction of that rebellion a new era was inaugurated under Lord Canning. A Royal proclamation was issued, which had been described as the Magna Charta of India, confirming to the Native Princes their personal rights, their dignities, and privileges. Supplementing that proclamation, there came the famous despatch of Lord Canning, declaring that on the failure of natural heirs the adoption by Native Princes of a successor would be recognised, and that nothing should disturb that arrangement so long as the family was loyal to the Crown and observed the treaties faithfully. When the Rajah first expressed a wish to adopt a son, and signified the fact to the Governor General, a difference of opinion prevailed in the Council of India, to whom the subject was referred, and a vague answer was returned, leaving the question open. It was on record that there were two dissentients in the Council, Sir Frederick Currie and Sir John Willoughby, even in this preliminary stage of the matter. Subsequently the adoption actually took place, and on a second reference to England was formally disallowed, although three of the most experienced Members of the Council of India, Sir George Clerk, Sir Frederick Currie, and Captain Eastwick, again recorded their dissent. That was the position of the case at the present time. It was considered that under the operation of the last order, in the event of the death of the Rajah, by some formal act of annexation the Rajahship of Mysore would be at an end, and the territory would be incorporated with the British dominions in India. Now, what effect would such a measure have on the feelings of the Natives in the face of the proclamation of Lord Canning? They would certainly see in it a mere desire to annex large revenues to the British Government. The other great Princes of India were in a position very similar to that of the Rajah of Mysore; and if in the treaties with them heirs and successors were not mentioned, we might, on their decease, say that they were Sovereigns for life only. The case was one of great importance, involving, as it did, the good faith and honour of this country. There were two other points which it was important that the House should also take into consideration, one being the general question of annexation, and the other the present state of India. With regard to the general question of annexation, he heartily agreed with the principles which Lord Canning had laid down in the despatch which he had previously read, and in which he stated that our supremacy would never be rightly accepted and respected so long as we left ourselves open to doubts, which our uncertain policy had justified, as to our ultimate intentions towards Native States. For the civil government already our English officers were too few for the work on their hands, and the annexation of territory would not make it easier to discharge our existing duties. To these sentiments he would add one or two remarks which seemed to him of great weight. It was his firm belief that independent Native States, under a good and friendly Administration, were a source of strength and not of weakness. They were a source of strength because, in the first place, they furnished a sort of safety-valve for the exuberant Native energy which could not find employment under our rule, and which, while unemployed, fermented and was a source of danger to us. They were valuable also as a breakwater to disaffection and mutiny; it had been said that the existence of the Native States of Hyderabad and Gwalior had really been the means of saving Madras and Bombay in the Mutiny of 1857. And Lord Canning had left it on record that but for the loyal Native States in the North West the tide of the mutiny would have swept in one wide wave over the country, from the borders of Bengal to the Indus. It was mainly owing, indeed, to the fidelity of these Native States that we were able to make

head, and ultimately to suppress the rebellion. They should bear these things in mind, learning from the experience of the past how to act in the future. He had studied the subject with much care, and he believed that never in this century had it been of more importance than at present to conciliate Native feeling in India, and to endeavour to rule the people through their affections rather than through their fears. India at present was in a transition state both from within and from without, and it mainly depended upon our conduct during this interval of trial whether the crisis would end to our weal or to our woe. When he said that the country was "in a transition state from without," he alluded to an entirely new phase in our Indian rule, which was now imminent. India was rapidly coming in contact, for the first time, with the other great European Powers—he referred to the conquests of Russia in Central Asia on the one hand, and on the other to the opening of the Suez Canal, by means of which we might expect to see the swarming fleets of the Mediterranean transferred to the Indian seas and coasts. An entirely new phase was thus opening to India in her foreign relations; and the change in the interior of the country itself was even more important. India, indeed, was just now awakening from the lethargy of centuries. The country was stirred from one end to the other by the contact of European industry and civilization, but was not yet penetrated with its quickening influences; and it depended on the spirit in which the Government was conducted whether the change now in progress would lead to good or evil results. If we betrayed a sordid or scornful spirit, if we disregarded Native feeling, and proclaimed the doctrine of "India for the English," then the stronger and wealthier India might become, the more would the differences of race be deepened, the more would religious hatred become intensified; and if we continued to retain the country it would be at the expense of such a drain on our resources that it would be questionable whether it would be worth the cost. But if we acted with kindness and forbearance, if we led rather than drove, if we governed India for the Indians, then we might expect that in due course that great country would become the most loyal and the most prosperous, as it was already the most fertile and the most populous of all the dependencies of the British Crown. He would only further remind the noble Lord (Viscount Cranbourne) that since the last orders were sent to India a very numerous signed petition had been presented to the House in favour of the Rajah's claim to adoption, and that a deputation had also waited on him last year to advocate the same cause, so that they might consider the whole question to have been re-opened and re-considered. He begged, in conclusion, to ask, Whether the Government has come to any decision on the recent appeal of the Maharajah of Mysore with regard to the succession of his adopted son; and, if so, whether they were prepared to lay upon the table of the House any Correspondence that might have passed on the subject?

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he wished to say a few words in support of the appeal made to the House and the Government by his hon. Friend, because he felt that the position in which India stood was one of great difficulty and danger. If the decision of the late Government were allowed to take effect, it would carry dismay to the Native Indian mind, which would not be able to understand the grounds upon which it rested. When the question of the assumption and seizure of the Native Principalities arose it did not meet with the attention which it deserved, but opinions were expressed at the time which gave rise to those feelings of alarm which his hon. Friend had described. On that occasion Lord Dalhousie, who had only lately arrived in the country, announced in broad terms his opinion that the time had arrived when the Government should lose no lawful opportunity of extending their territory, though, at the same time, they should pay the most scrupulous regard to the rights of others. No wonder such a declaration caused alarm. He endeavoured to draw the attention of the House to the subject, but it was one to which the House would not listen at the time. The question, however, became aggravated from year to year, until at last the Government thought that the time had arrived to quiet the alarm which had been created on the subject. It was a remarkable fact that while those connected with the civil administration came eagerly forward to defend principles of confiscation by which their departments might be extended, those who had spent years in India, and were intimately acquainted with the feelings of the Natives, and with the law and practice on the subject, protested almost unanimously against the course on which the Government was embarking. With regard to this Mysore State, Lord Canning laid down a simple but broad principle, that the assurance as to the right of succession should be given to every chief who governed his own territory as a sovereign Prince; and it was alleged that the Rajah of Mysore was not included within that condition. It was a principle, in fact, that those cases in which sovereign rights were exercised carried with them an inherent right to succession. It was said that it was specially intended to exclude the Rajah of Mysore from the exercise of that principle; and perhaps, on the face of it, it bore that construction; but no one who knew Lord Canning would think that he entertained the idea of denying the sovereign rights of the Rajah of Mysore, for within thirty days after laying down that principle he wrote again on the subject of that Mysore State, expressing his hope that the titular ruler of that State might eventually be induced to bequeath his power to the British Government. His territory had been administered for more than forty years by British officers, and he admitted that this fact entitled the English Government to impose such conditions as might appear called for; but he maintained that, as a matter of right, the succession ought to be recognised. The present Governor General had described the Rajah as a dependent Prince, possessing only such personal rights as had been conferred on him by treaty; but that despatch was written in ignorance of all the facts of the case, and tended to re-open all those questions which Lord Canning had settled. It was true that the British Government at one time made a treaty with the Rajah in perpetuity, in which no mention of his heir was made; but he contended that the Rajah's rights of sovereignty did not depend upon that treaty, and a previous treaty between the same parties recognised the Rajah as sovereign of Mysore. The claim we had to interfere with the territory arose out of a treaty declaring that whenever the subsidy which should be paid should fail, then the British Government would have a right to go in and occupy the place, and administer the State laws, the terms implying that that should be merely a temporary measure; and all our rights depended upon that treaty. He hoped the British Government, in deciding this matter, would maintain its character for good faith.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: Sir, this is beyond doubt a very important question, and has attracted a great deal of attention both in England and India. It has been usually discussed with considerable exaggeration both of argument and feeling; and I have to express my thanks to both the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken upon it for bringing it forward in so moderate and so candid a spirit. The hon. Member who brought the subject forward established what I thought was a very convenient division of it, when he said he would refer first to the legal and then to the political grounds of the question; and I shall adhere to his division, because, though upon the legal ground I may differ from him very considerably, I daresay that when we come to the political question we shall be found not very widely apart. The first question upon which I want to touch, although it does not concern my main argument, is one raised by the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke); I mean the question of the adoption despatch of Lord Canning. I feel bound, in justice to the Governor General, to point out the reasons why I think he was justified in stating that that despatch conferred upon the Rajah no right of adoption. The simple facts of the case are these:—Lord Canning carefully excluded all those who were not in the actual government of their own territories from its operation; and afterwards, by way of an illustration of what he meant, he sent a special sun-nud to every individual chieftain upon whom he intended to confer the right. From that list the Rajah of Mysore was excluded; and I cannot conceive any more distinct or emphatic way by which Lord Canning could announce that the Rajah was not to enjoy the right of adoption. I think that the adoption question does not arise on the present occasion. I shall therefore prefer, in the few short arguments I shall use, to lay aside the question of adoption, to treat the young man as the lineal son of the Maharajah, and to inquire into his rights as that lineal son. I hope by doing that, among other objects, to establish in the mind of the hon. Baronet opposite, and, it may be, in the minds of any of the Native Princes of India who share the fears he attributed to them, a conviction that no thought ever entered into the mind of Her Majesty's Government—I am convinced that no such thought will ever enter into the minds of any British statesmen—of disturbing these solemn grants that Lord Canning made to the Native Princes. I believe there is no right which every Government in India will regard as more sacred than Lord Canning's concession on the subject of adoption to the Native Chiefs. The hon. Baronet who brought forward this Motion rightly said that the whole of the Maharajah's title depends upon the partition Treaty of Mysore. It lies in the four corners of that treaty, and what we have to inquire is—Did the Maharajah receive a full right of Sovereignty with succession; that is, in fact, his territory in fee simple; or did he receive only a life grant? Remember that this is not the case of an ancient Sovereign whom we found in that country, or with whom we made a treaty. This is the case of a man whom we took from a house in which he was confined when a child, dying from ill-usage, and whom we rescued and placed on the Throne. Therefore, it is to the treaty alone that we must look to see whether the Maharajah has any right to bequeath or hand down to his lineal son the territory then granted to him. Now, I confess that, when I came to examine this question carefully, though I was naturally in no way prejudiced in favour of the views of my predecessor, but I was quite surprised at the doctrines and the interpretation of the treaty which several of those who argue the case of the Maharajah had taken up. The Partition Treaty of Mysore was a treaty in which the Maharajah himself had no share. It was a treaty between the Nizam and the English Government, and its object was, as its name implies, to divide the territory which conjointly they had conquered from Tippoo Sultan. The Maharajah of Mysore is not mentioned at all in the preamble. The first article of the treaty declares that certain territories afterwards named shall be subjected to the authority, and shall be for ever incorporated with the dominions of the English East India Company. The second article says that, for the same reasons, certain districts afterwards specified shall be subjected to the authority and for ever united to the dominions of the Nawab Nizam. Then again, for reasons therein stated, the fortress of Seringapatam was to become part of the dominions of the said Company, in full right and sovereignty for ever. In each of these three articles the greatest care is taken to say that the grant is one "for ever"—first to England, and then to the Nizam. Then comes the fourth article, which declares that a separate Government shall be established in Mysore; and it is stipulated and agreed that for this purpose the Maharajah of Mysore, a descendant of the ancient Maharajahs, was to possess the territory thereafter described. There is not one word in the article about sovereignty, perpetuity, or inheritance. Now, I cannot imagine that if you were dealing with any other case—with a case, for instance, of private property or International Law in Europe—you would doubt for a moment that with a contrast so striking between these several articles, the intention was that to the Maharajah alone should the grant of that territory be made, and that it should be reserved for subsequent decision what should be done with that territory after his death. The hon. Gentleman who introduced the question said that there were many Indian treaties from which the word “perpetuity” was excluded, and that there was no Native Prince in India who would feel himself secure if on that ground we disputed the right of this young Maharajah. I see that that statement was also made by a very distinguished member of the Council, with whom the hon. Gentleman is familiar. Now, I went very carefully through the seven volumes of Indian treaties to ascertain whether that was the fact. I am bound to say, that wherever territory is granted, as a rule the words of perpetuity are carefully inserted. There are some slight exceptions in the case of rectification of frontier, and where agreements are made with well-known reigning houses, with regard to whom it was wholly unnecessary to insert those words; but as a rule they were inserted, and I cannot subscribe to the doctrine that even if the case of Mysore and that of other States were analogous, such a construction would imperil other Native Thrones. But the case of Mysore stands by itself. There is no other case like it in India. The hon. Gentleman talked of Scindia, Holkar, and the Nizam. Well, but we found those Princes on the Throne. They were reigning Sovereigns before our time, and it was immaterial with regard to them whether we put into treaties with them words of perpetuity or not. But this man derives his rights from us, and it is only to us that he can look for the exact definition of them. But there was one analogous case—the case of Sattara. That was exactly the same case of a territory carved out of a conquest, and given to the descendants of those who formerly reigned in the same region. But in the Sattara treaty the words “of perpetuity” are carefully inserted. Therefore the case seems to me complete that, so far as the construction of the treaty can guide us, the son of the Maharajah has no right to succeed to the sovereignty of Mysore. If that be so, I need hardly add that it is not necessary to enter into the question of adoption, because what the lineal son has no right to, it is clear that the adopted son cannot claim. I must therefore express most emphatically the opinion of Her Majesty’s Government that the rights conferred upon the Maharajah of Mysore by the Partition Treaty terminate with his life. So much for the legal question. Now for the political; and here, I think, the case assumes a different aspect. The hon. Gentleman is quite right in saying—although I do not think the feeling is very logical—that there exists a considerable feeling among many distinguished Princes in India in regard to the policy of the Government in this case. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman introduced the question of fear into the argument that he presented to the House. I not only disclaim being actuated by such a motive, but I must state, in the most distinct manner, that there does not seem to me to be the slightest occasion for any appeal to our fears in this instance. I believe that we were never safer in India than at the present moment. There never was a time—whether we have to rely on our swords, or whether, which I hope is now the case, we may rely on the sense which the Natives entertain of the justice they may expect from us, or the security which our Government confers upon them—when we had a better right to calculate on the stability of our power in that country. But that fact does not in the least diminish our desire to calm the minds of the influential feudatories who are in alliance with us—to do anything consistent with our duty to India, which may be pleasant and agreeable to their feelings. And therefore I freely admit that the wishes which have been expressed by several distinguished Princes on this subject have much weighed with Her Majesty’s Government. Not that we concede to those Princes any right or title to interfere in this matter. But the feelings between us are naturally those of amity. We know that we are together engaged in a great work, which will task the strength of both of us. We are aware that the object we have in view will be much facilitated, and that we shall more readily obtain the good Government we seek, if we work thoroughly and heartily together, and if no jealousies disturb our common action. But there are other considerations, and I think the hon. Gentleman stated them very fairly and eloquently. I do not myself see our way at present to employing very largely the Natives of India in the regions under our immediate control. But it would be a very great evil if the result of our dominion was that the Natives of India who were capable of Government should be absolutely and hopelessly excluded from such a career. The great advantage of the existence of Native States is that they afford an outlet for statesman-like capacity such as has been alluded to. I need not dwell upon other considerations to which the hon. Gentleman so eloquently referred; but I think that the existence of a well-governed Native State is a real benefit not only to the stability of our rule, but because more than anything it raises the self-respect of the Natives, and forms an ideal to which the popular feeling aspire. It is not therefore the intention of Her Majesty's Government, whenever the Maharajah dies, that the State of Mysore shall be annexed. But then, if not annexed, what is to be done with it? Well, I must say that I do not feel inclined to adopt the opposite alternative. I do not think it would be consistent with our duty to hand it back to a Native Government unchecked and uncontrolled. The House will excuse me, I am sure, from entering into any further details on that subject. But no one can have examined the records of the Commission that inquired into this subject after Lord William Bentinck assumed the Government of India, without feeling that to such a course there are insuperable objections. Then the question really amounts to this—how far will you go in giving to this young man a share in the Throne and the Government of the territory that his father possesses? It is from no other feeling than a real belief, which I think is justified by the facts, that the time for a decision has not arrived that we hold that the decision of this question must be deferred. It must be obvious to anybody who reflects upon the subject, that the character of a Native Government, and the amount of blessings it is likely to con-

fer upon the people, must depend more than is the case in our part of the world upon the character of the individual ruler; and nobody can tell what will be the character of the adopted child of the Maharajah. When this youth shall have advanced in years—when he shall have reached some twenty years of age—it will probably then be possible for those who may be charged with the responsibility of the Government of India to decide whether he is likely to imitate the bright example which has been set by the Native ruler of the neighbouring State of Travancore, or whether he is likely to fall into those habits of prodigality and favouritism which are among the besetting sins of Indian Courts. We shall leave the decision of that point to those on whom the responsibility will properly devolve. It is the wish of Her Majesty's Government by no word or action to fetter that discretion, or to bind beforehand the judgment of those who will have before them the facts with which we are now unacquainted, and who will therefore be better qualified to adopt the conclusions to which they may legitimately lead. But there is even yet another consideration. As the hon. Member justly said, the state of India is now one of transition. It is a state of rapid and violent transition; and no man can tell what the needs of that country will be ten or fifteen years hence. And, whatever treaties or engagements may be entered into, I hope that I shall not be looked upon by Gentlemen of the Liberal party as very revolutionary if I say that the welfare of the people of India must override them all. I quite admit the temptations which a paramount Power has to interpret that axiom rather for its own advantage than its own honour. There is no doubt of the existence of that temptation, but that does not diminish the truth of the maxim. Therefore, I should be sorry now to pledge any future Government to any course which might honestly and clearly seem to be at variance with the interests of the people of Mysore. But, reserving that point, as far as we can see it may well be hoped that a practical share in the Government of the whole or a portion of the country—probably that would be the best—might be given to this young man. I am only stating my own individual opinion—merely stating what the circumstances of the case as they stand before us now may seem to justify. But I wish again to repeat that I am uttering no pledge. We leave the decision of the case to those on whom the responsibility of that decision must rest. Our only object now is to so order our proceedings that they should be able to arrive at an easy and just decision. When the present Maharajah dies no change will be made in the form in which the Government of Mysore will be conducted. As to the young Maharajah, if we have the opportunity to do it, of course we shall be glad to do all we can to give him the advantages of a European education, and so prepare him, to the best of our ability, for the responsibilities which we hope it may one day be possible to commit to him. I need scarcely say that, of course, proper arrangements will be made for maintaining him in a condition suited to his rank; but beyond that, I think I should do my duty best by pledging the British Government no further. With reference to the last part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, I will only say that the despatch in answer to the application of the Maharajah of Mysore will be laid on the table; and it will then be competent for him, if he does not approve the views of Her Majesty's Government to ask for the opinion of the House on the subject.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAW.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: * Sir, I am sure that no apology will be thought necessary from any hon. Member who endeavours to call the attention of the House to any defects which may appear to him to exist in so important a part of our institutions as the judicial system of this country. Were it otherwise it would, I think, be easy to give special reasons at the present moment for undertaking that task. In the Speech from the Throne, at the opening of this Session, we were told that our attention would be called "To the Consolidation of the Courts of Probate and Divorce and Admiralty; and to the Means of disposing, with greater Despatch and Frequency, of the increasing Business in the Superior Courts of Common Law and at the Assizes."

It will be obvious to all who reflect on the matter that this is a subject which invites our consideration as a whole. Whatever may be the views of the Government of which we are now imperfectly informed—the present is a fitting opportunity for passing in review the whole of the subject to which our attention is thus called. The question discussed at an earlier part of this very evening—namely, as to the measures in progress for the erection of new Courts of Justice to facilitate the administration of the law, affords an additional reason for now bringing this matter forward. There is, also, another advantage in considering this subject at the present time, because we have now, and for a long series of years have had, such an administration of justice—as far as the Judges personally concerned are responsible for it—as disarms all censure or criticism, and deserves the strongest and warmest acknowledgments. Whatever defects I may endeavour to point out are defects in the system, not at all attributable to those whose duty it is to administer it. They have done all in their power, I believe, in every branch of our judicial administration, to encounter and overcome those defects. The Government have not yet had an opportunity of explaining to us their intentions as indicated by the passage I have read from Her Majesty's Speech. A measure, however, has been laid on the table of the other House of Parliament with reference to the Courts of Admiralty, Probate, and Divorce, which, if adopted, certainly will have one good effect—namely, that of relieving the Courts of Common Law from a duty lately imposed on them which it has been impossible for them conveniently to discharge, and which no doubt requires to be otherwise provided for. It is also said that we may expect a proposal to be made for a considerable increase in the number of Judges in the Courts of Common Law. With respect to that, as also with respect to the measure to which I have alluded, it would not become me now to anticipate discussion. But if such a proposal is likely to be made it appears to me very desirable that we should take likewise into consideration all other causes of obstruction and difficulty which may now exist in the administration of justice in the Courts of Common Law, in addition to such as may arise merely from the inadequacy of the number of Judges. Undoubtedly, at the present moment there is a great obstruction of business in those courts. There are considerable and accumulated arrears which the Judges have not been able to keep down by all the energy at their command. That, I believe, is found to be the case both in London and at the assizes. I understand that the Nisi Prius list for the present sittings is exceedingly heavy, and not by any means likely to be cleared. According to the figures with which I have been furnished of Common Pleas cases there are no less than 124 remanets from last sittings, and 145 new cases, making 269 cases altogether standing for trial at the present sittings. I am informed that there is very little probability indeed of getting through the whole of the 124 remanets, and that many of them are likely to go over till next November. Of course, the new cases must also be deferred; and unless a remedy is applied to such a state of things it will tend greatly to the detriment of the interest both of suitors and the public. Then as to rules nisi for new trials, I learn that the list of these which stands over for argument is getting much into arrear, and that some cases which arose as long ago as February of last year are not likely to be argued till May in the present year. The special cases in the Crown Paper are equally or more in arrear. In fact, there is almost a complete block up as to a great part of the business in the Courts of Common Law. At the assizes the power of disposing of the cases under the present system is similarly inadequate. The question before us is, what are the remedies to be applied? I cannot but think that under the present arrangements of the courts there is a very great waste of judicial power, and that to a great extent that waste might be remedied by a careful revision of the whole system, both as regards London and the assizes. I would strongly urge upon the House and the Government the importance and the necessity of looking the whole question fully in the face and examining it in all its departments and branches before applying a particular remedy—which is objectionable if it be not necessary, but which ought to be applied if it is—I mean that of an increase in the number of Judges. There are obvious causes of evil for which there are obvious remedies distinct from an increase in the number of Judges, and those remedies ought to be applied whether the number of Judges be increased or not. Some of these have occurred to myself, and others have been suggested to me by persons of high authority. Looking at the question broadly, the first thing which one encounters is that there are three Courts of Common Law, with fifteen Judges—five in each court, and the first question that occurs is how far is this division of jurisdiction between these three courts necessary or useful, and how far would the administration of justice be promoted and improved by abolishing the division of jurisdictions and making the three courts practically one? There is no sound reason for retaining any part of that division of jurisdiction; it is purely technical and artificial. The Court of Queen's Bench has exclusive jurisdiction in criminal informations, and in what are technically called Crown cases, though I believe there are other Crown cases, under Mr. Waddington's Summary Jurisdiction Act, which may be taken into the other courts. It has also exclusive cognizance of certain Poor Law cases. By other forms and processes, direct or indirect, questions of precisely the same nature may be introduced into the other courts; but, so far as relates to these particular modes of procedure, the Court of Queen's Bench has exclusive jurisdiction. The Judges of the other courts are selected from the same bar, and have in every respect the same qualifications with the Judges of the Queen's Bench. The distinction that exists is really quite arbitrary, and I maintain that it ought to be abolished. Whatever arrangements it may, at any time, be found convenient to make, for the distribution of business among the Judges, can, of course, be made; but there is a great difference between such arrangements, and an exclusive jurisdiction. I say the same thing of the special jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer. Revenue causes are tried in that court only: though petitions of right against the Crown, which may throw heavy charges upon the revenue, may be taken to any court. The Court of Common Pleas has less of peculiar jurisdiction; but that court only has cognizance of registration cases. I advocate the abolition of these technical and arbitrary differences altogether, and I would make all the courts practically branches of one, having a uniform jurisdiction, and capable of taking any business without distinction. I do not think the time of the Judges is now so occupied as that the most is made of them. Four Judges sit in a court at a time, and one often leaves in the middle of the day to go to Chambers. A great amount of Nisi Prius business accumulates for what are called the after-term sittings. Let three Judges constitute a full court, let one or more, if necessary, from each court sit at Nisi Prius all through term continuously as well as afterwards, and then the great arrears of business would be kept down. The sitting of Judges in Chambers might be greatly reduced or entirely abolished, the routine and uncontested business should be done by the chief Masters, and it should be in the power of suitors to put down in a list the cases which they wished to have disposed of before a Judge. One Judge, when not required to sit at the Central Criminal Court, might sit alone to dispose of practice cases, and in that way a considerable saving of the time of the Judges would be secured. In the Court of Chancery we do not permit suitors at their option to accumulate a list of arrears in one court, while other courts are insufficiently supplied with business. In the first instance, the suitor selects his own court, and when he has done so, and the case is ripe for hearing, if one court is overburdened and another ill-supplied, cases are transferred from one court to another, and so the business is equalized and expedited. In the Courts of Common Law, there is at present no such power. Cases cannot be transferred from the Queen's Bench, to the Common Pleas or the Exchequer. One man favours one court and another man another. One court has a lack of business, while another is overburdened with arrears; but if the cases were transferred, a great deal of time might often be saved. It has also been suggested to me that in moving for new trials and in other matters there is a double process, which, in many cases, might be advantageously abolished. There is the motion for the rule nisi in the absence of the enemy, and there is the further argument when the enemy shows cause. Why should it not be here as in the Court of Chancery, where you summon your adversary by notice of motion in the first instance, and the matter is argued once for all? Why should not the party have at least the option to move upon notice for his rule absolute at once, some economy of time might result from the adoption of this plan. Another matter has often struck me with surprise, although I cannot say how far it occupies time. If there are issues of law joined by demurrers, and also issues of fact, although the issues of law may entirely exhaust the merits of a case, and the determination of them often settles the question between the parties; yet, they must, if they wish to go to a Superior Court upon the point of law, unnecessarily try, perhaps at great expense and delay, the questions of fact, upon which if the judgment is right nothing will depend. In the Court of Chancery, if a demurrer is allowed to a bill the matter goes to a Court of Appeal, and there is an end of the case unless the judgment is reversed, in which case the questions of fact are re-opened. Why should there be a trial of facts, when it is settled that it will be of no use unless the Court of Appeal should reverse the judgment? The good sense of parties often leads to an arrangement; but, on the other hand, there are cases in which the unnecessary trial is not avoided, and when there is no necessity for it, it must be a vexatious and useless waste of money and time. Another important matter to be considered is the relief of the Superior Courts from business which might be better disposed of elsewhere. There are two ways of doing that—first, absolutely excluding a certain class of cases which the County Courts have jurisdiction to try, and in which they might be trusted to do full justice; and secondly, imposing discouragements in the way of costs upon parties who, without good reason, choose the more expensive instead of the cheaper and simpler process. I have high authority, both of experienced Judges and of members of the Bar, for the principle of this recommendation. That many frivolous cases would be got rid of by compelling the parties to try them in the County Courts, unless a Judge saw special reason for their being tried in a higher court. I do not pretend to name the precise amount at which the line ought to be drawn, but I doubt whether any harm would be done by taking it in cases of contract at £50. Some might put it lower, but that would be a matter for consideration. It would probably not be right to apply, in all respects, the same rule to actions founded on wrongs. There may be cases such as libel involving a small pecuniary amount, yet in which, more than the verdict is sometimes at stake, and in these cases it might be unfair that the option of having them tried in a Superior Court should be wholly taken away. I venture to suggest, however, that if a person should bring an action of that description, which might be tried in a County Court into a Superior Court, without recovering more than a certain sum—say £10 or £20—he should not be entitled to costs unless the Judge should certify that the case was a proper one to be tried in a Superior Court. The adoption of that course would get rid of a number of cases which are a great obstruction in the Superior Courts, and which form an unnecessary addition to their business. With respect to the assizes, there are two other recommendations which I also venture to make with the sanction of some authority. The first and principal one is that the same practice should be adopted at the assizes in the transaction of criminal business which is followed at the Central Criminal Court. The Judges, who sit at the Old Bailey, try the more important cases, while in an adjoining room others are disposed of by the Recorder or the Common Serjeant. Now there is, I apprehend, no reason why the Judge of assize should not try the more important cases and let the others be tried before the local recorder or by an inferior Judge specially summoned for the purpose. In that way some relief might probably be obtained without any prejudice to the administration of justice. Another mode in which the same end might be promoted is by the entire abolition of separate assizes for counties of cities and towns. There is, it appears to me, no practical necessity for maintaining this separation, and if the assizes for towns were thrown into the counties to which those towns belong, and if, in some cases, the assizes for more counties than one could be held together, some time would, no doubt, by those means be saved. I have now submitted to the House all that I have to offer on that part of the case which relates to the general business of the Superior Courts of Common Law. I now come to the first subject mentioned in my notice of Motion, which I regard as a very important one, and which, I hope, may receive the early attention of the Government and of Parliament. I refer to the subject of appellate jurisdiction. We have four Courts of Appeal, two of final, and two of intermediate appeal. The two Courts of Final Appeal are the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; the two intermediate are the Exchequer Chamber, or Court of Error at common law, and the Court of Appeal in Chancery. From each of the two latter an appeal lies to the House of Lords. When that statement is made several questions of principle occur to my mind, and I should like to say a few words on those questions before I enter at any greater length into details. Let me suppose that we were about to construct, de novo, a judicial system, I do not think there could be much doubt that the best course to adopt would be—following the example of some neighbouring, and of, perhaps, most well-governed States—to establish one supreme court of final appeal. I cannot but hope that our efforts after improvement on the subject may take, as far as is practicable, that direction. To have two Courts of Final Appeal administering in several parts of their jurisdiction the same law, with the possibility of conflict, is, to say the least of it, inconvenient, and no sound reason can, so far as I am able to say, be given for it. Next, I would ask if the best plan to adopt be to have only one Court of Final Appeal, whether it would not be better also to have only one appeal? The contrary system, it seems to me, holds out inducements to those who are fond of litigation; and there are, therefore, in my opinion, two principles which ought to be aimed at in any reform which we may attempt. That we should, if possible, constitute a single Court of Final Appeal, and that we should, at all events, permit only one appeal in any case decided by a Superior Court. The next question is, is it expedient that there should be different Courts of Appeal in Equity and at Common Law, or only one Court of Appeal for both? The distinction between them is, as we know, in a great measure artificial, and the requirements of the times point to as great a fusion of the two as is consistent with some reasonable division of labour and the practical despatch of business. Their separation has a tendency to produce a certain narrowness, which may be corrected by bringing both together into a focus by means of one Court of Appeal. As things at present stand, we have the House of Lords administering English and Scotch jurisprudence, and the Privy Council administering not only English jurisprudence, but French, Dutch, Mahomedan, and Hindoo. Now it may be thought that English Judges, whose minds have been formed in the practice of the English law, might be incompetent to the discharge of such duties; but it is somewhat remarkable that, although no Scotch lawyer has ever taken a regular part in the judicial business of the House of Lords (Lord Mansfield and other eminent men whom Scotland has given to the English bar and bench, cannot properly be called Scotch lawyers), yet, by the general consent of those best qualified to give an opinion on the subject, the law of Scotland has derived great benefit from the mere fact that the decisions of its Judges have been reviewed by men free from Scotch prejudices, and bringing to the performance of their duties large views of jurisprudence. Everyone who knows how the business of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is administered, will, I think, admit that the difficulties arising from having to deal with different laws have been by them most successfully grappled with, and that, upon the whole, a regard for substantial justice rather than mere technical accuracy has grown out of the fact, that they have to administer justice in accordance with so many different systems. The conclusion I draw from these circumstances is that our equity decisions would be better reviewed by a court which comprised some Common Law Judges than by one from which they were altogether absent, and that our common law decisions would be better reviewed in a court of which some Equity Judges formed a part than if it were confined to common law Judges alone. I contend, therefore, that a fusion of the two would be an absolutely good thing in itself. There is also another point to which I must briefly advert. The conditions on which the right of appeal is given ought not to vary substantially with the court from which the appeal is brought. Some Members of the House may not be aware that if a man wants to appeal to the House of Lords from a Common Law Court he must bear the burden of a double appeal. He has no access to that House except through the Court of Exchequer Chamber. The case, however, is not so in Chancery. An appeal may there be made from the court of first instance—passing over the Court of Appeal—direct to the House of Lords. Now, one or the other of these two systems must be wrong, and there is certainly room for improvement in this respect, even though other things should remain as they at present stand. Again, there is a remarkable distinction between the rule applicable to Scotland and that which is applicable to England and Ireland in reference to appeals from interlocutory orders. Every order made by the Court of Chancery, in England or Ireland, may be enrolled at once, and carried by appeal to the House of Lords. And in practice this facility of appeal is not abused. In Scotland, the rule is that no matter which may there be determined in the progress of a case shall be taken to the House of Lords by way of appeal until the case is finished, unless the Judges either give leave or happen to differ in opinion with respect to it. By reason of that rule, matters of the greatest importance may sometimes be hung up for a considerable time, and I cannot help thinking if not that the English rule is a better one, at least that it may be desirable that the Scotch should be made somewhat more flexible. Having made these general observations, I will address myself to each of the four jurisdictions which I have mentioned, and endeavour to point out the great necessity which exists for some reform in connection with the whole subject. I will commence with an institution which I will venture to say is the most unsuccessful and the most defective part of our judicial system—I mean the Court of Exchequer Chamber, the Court of Error at common law. I have not a word to say against the Judges who transact the business of that court; they are in no degree responsible for its failure. All that it is possible for men to do they accomplish; but the system is one which cannot be satisfactorily worked, and nothing can be more easy than to demonstrate to any one, however unfamiliar he may be with it, the crying necessity for some reform in both its principle and practice. Taking the principle, I must first explain in what the Court of Exchequer Chamber consists. There are three Superior Courts of Common Law—the Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Court of Exchequer. By an ingenious device the Judges of each two of these courts are appointed to sit alternately in judgment upon the decisions of the third. Such a system is in many ways objectionable. It would not be difficult to put a case where the determination of the law might depend upon the mere accidental priority of an appeal. It has sometimes been found that upon difficult and debateable questions of law one court holds a view opposed to that held by one of the other two courts. Take, for instance, the two subjects of the extent to which a master is liable for the acts of his servants, or of persons in his employment, and of the extent of the liability of railway and other public companies whose operations are injurious to the property of others. Upon these two subjects considerable differences of opinion have prevailed in the Courts of Common Law, and it is possible that the law of the land as laid down by the Court of Exchequer Chamber might be determined one way or the other, according to the court whence the appeal was brought. Thus, if the appeal were from the Queen's Bench, the views of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas, with or without the accession of one or more Judges from the Exchequer, might prevail in the Court of Error; while, if it were from the Common Pleas, the tables might be turned; so that the eventual decision of an important point of law might depend entirely upon the accidental constitution at a particular moment, of the court before which the appeal was brought. In many cases, also, by this peculiar system of appeal, the decision of the minority may overrule that of the majority of the whole number of Judges of equal and co-ordinate authority before whom the case has been argued. A case may be decided one way by the unanimous judgment of four Judges of the Queen's Bench, and their judgment may be reversed by four out of six Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, the other two Judges of the latter court agreeing with the decision of the Queen's Bench. Thus, under this ingenious system, the opinion of the minority of four would overrule that of the majority of six; and then, as a matter of course, the case would go to the House of Lords. The truth is that this court was intended to be a very important and solemn tribunal, composed of the whole of the judicial power of the other two courts. It was intended that if a majority of the Judges of the Queen's Bench decided one way, ten—or at least eight—Judges of the Common Pleas and Exchequer should bring their united wisdom to the review of that decision. On account, however, of the other duties which the Judges have to discharge, it has been found generally impracticable to bring together more than five or six of them for the purpose of reviewing the judgments of any of the courts—a number which gives the Court of Exchequer Chamber but little if any more weight than is possessed by the court whence the appeal is brought. Then again, the Court of Exchequer Chamber sits so seldom that it is scarcely possible for the cases to be properly disposed of by it at all. Thus, in 1866, this court sat altogether twenty-eight days, of which thirteen days were allotted to the Queen's Bench errors, eight to those of the Common Pleas, and seven to those of the Exchequer. The Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer had each two days allowed for its errors in February, in May, and in June; the Common Pleas had also two days in November; the Exchequer one day in December; the Queen's Bench

five days in February, one in April, and two in June and November. It must not be supposed that the court sat so seldom in consequence of there being no work for it to do, for there was much more business than it could get through, but the reason that it did not sit oftener was because it was impossible to get the Judges of the same two courts together oftener or for more than two or three days at a time. Thus it happens that year after year cases go on from sitting to sitting unheard; some are partly heard, and are then adjourned to some future sitting; and some are passed over when their chance appears to have come from the fear that they cannot be finished at once, and that it may be impracticable for the same Judges to be re-assembled at a subsequent sitting. Parties are sometimes induced or compelled to compromise their cases after all the delay and expense of legal proceedings have been incurred. It is also scarcely possible for the Judges of this court, amid their other pressing business, to find time for consulting together upon the cases which have been argued before them, and there are many accidents to which human life is liable that may render the opinion of the minority even of the Judges before whom the case in error was argued, that which determines the question of law involved in the appeal. A case known as the "Vibration Case" was decided the other day in the Exchequer Chamber, and it affords a good illustration of the working of the system. The question raised was as to the liability of railway companies to pay compensation to owners of property injured by the vibration caused by railway trains. The case was argued in June last in the Exchequer Chamber, before six Judges, two of whom were Chief Justice Erle and Lord Chief Baron Pollock. Lord Chief Baron Pollock resigned in July, and Chief Justice Erle in December, and in the February following judgment was pronounced by four only out of the six Judges who had heard the appeal argued, and of these four Judges one held that the opinion of the court below was right, and the other three that it was wrong; thus overruling the unanimous judgment of four Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, with which, if the judgment had been sooner given, Sir William Erle and Sir Frederick Pollock might possibly have been found to agree.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL remarked, that the judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench was delivered by two Judges only.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: I may have been misinformed on that point; but that circumstance does not weaken the force of the argument, because had the judgment of the Queen's Bench been pronounced by four instead of by two Judges the result would have been exactly the same. It is, in truth, impossible now to get more than five or six Judges to attend in this court at one time. My duties took me into the Exchequer Chamber on the 4th of February last, when I found that the time allotted for hearing ten cases of error from the Common Pleas was three days, of which one, being the day of the opening of Parliament, must be regarded as a dies non. At that time there were three Nisi Prius Courts sitting; there ought to have been four or five; and Mr. Justice Blackburn was engaged in the Central Criminal Court, and the Lord Chief Justice was necessarily absent owing to ill-health. Thus, only two Judges from the Queen's Bench and three from the Exchequer could be assembled. No person can look at these facts without seeing that the Court of Exchequer Chamber is an institution which ought not to be allowed to continue, and that it is the duty of Government to adopt some means of substituting a better constituted tribunal in its place. I now come to the other intermediate court of appeal—the Court of Appeal in Chancery. Very eminent and able Judges have presided over that court, and have transacted, in an admirable manner, a vast amount of business; still, it is impossible to deny the existence of some obvious defects in the constitution of that court also. In 1851 two Lords Justices of Appeal were appointed to assist the Lord Chancellor for the first time, by Act of Parliament, on the ground of the necessity which existed for strengthening the court presided over by that noble Lord. It was originally intended that the Lord Chancellor and two Lords Justices of Appeal should sit together as one court, with power, however, of subdivision when occasion required; but since the passing of the Act, creating the Lords Justices, the three Judges have very rarely indeed sat together as a full court. At the present time, the Lord Chancellor, as a general rule, sits in one court, and the Lords Justices in another. The Legislature contemplated the possibility of the Lord Chancellor being a Common Law Judge, and therefore it was determined that in such an event he should be assisted in the Equity Courts by two Equity Judges, who were to sit with him. Every question of equity, which may happen to be reviewed in the Court of Appeal, is thus liable to be decided by a Common Law Judge. I have already expressed my opinion that the presence of one or more Common Law Judges in the Court of Appeal for Equity cases is most desirable; but that is a very different thing from a Court of Appeal in Equity, in which a single Common Law Judge sits alone. Some tribute however must, in passing, be paid to the Common Law Judges who have presided in the Court of Chancery. They sat there under undoubted disadvantages, but I must say the manner in which they overcame them merits the most pointed acknowledgments. Before my time Lord Brougham, within my time Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Truro, Lord Campbell, and the present Lord Chancellor, all of the Common Law Bar, have presided in that court; and I must say that the inconvenience which may have occasionally been felt, from the circumstance to which I have alluded, has been in practice very much less than any one could have anticipated, judging only a priori, owing to the very great patience and care with which those eminent men have discharged their duties. Still, the fact remains, that a Common Law Judge—and the Lord Chancellor must frequently be taken from the Common Law Bar—a Common Law Judge sitting alone as Judge of Appeal in Chancery must labour under serious disadvantages, and no doubt it would be a better constitution of the court which offered some security for having Equity Judges to assist him. Besides, the Lord Chancellor is constantly withdrawn from that court. He is absent from it four days a week during the Session of Parliament. On Wednesdays and Saturdays alone he resumes his place in the Court of Chancery. Arguments are thus unavoidably interrupted — unavoidably protracted; and no one can say that is a satisfactory state of things, if means of avoiding it can be devised. With respect to the Lords Justices, nothing can be more admirable than the administration of their court, and I do not doubt it will so continue. But, at the same time, every one must see a most patent inconvenience in the sitting of two Judges together, because unavoidably they may sometimes differ; not only they may differ, but they sometimes do differ, and the consequence in such cases is that the appeal simply fails, all the expense is thrown away, and the parties must either acquiesce in the judgment of the court of first instance, with a sense of their not having had the benefit of an appeal, or they must go further and appeal to the House of Lords. If we can devise a system that would avoid this inconvenience, it would certainly be an improvement on the present state of things as existing in the Court of Appeal in Chancery. I now come to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. This is a very eminent tribunal. It takes Indian and colonial Appeals; also domestic appeals of three classes—in Admiralty cases, in Ecclesiastical cases, and from the Lord Chancellor or Lord Justices in lunacy. What particular propriety there is in sending Admiralty, Ecclesiastical, and Lunacy cases to a different court of final appeal from that which determines cases in Chancery and Common Law, I cannot conceive. But that is a subordinate consideration. The court, undoubtedly, has worked well, and I cannot but think it, in some respects, a model of what a good Supreme Court of Appeal ought to be. I have no hesitation in saying that I take the constitution of the Judicial Committee as furnishing, on the whole, the best basis for the construction of such a court. Its merits are these:—It has administered a great variety of law, with great breadth of view, great regard to practical justice, comparatively little regard to technicality and mere form, and I believe greatly to the satisfaction of the country, and of the colonies and India, from which a great portion of the appeals have come. It has adopted a practice differing from that of the House of Lords in one important respect. It gives judgment by the mouth of a single Judge, usually well considered, and written or even printed, and suppresses the difference of views which may possibly exist among the members of the tribunal. I cannot but think the practice of the Judicial Committee, in that respect, a wise one—giving the authoritative judgment of the court, from which there is no further appeal, without the expression of individual opinions calculated to detract from or neutralize its authority. It has kept down business—there are no arrears, and no serious delays. Lastly and not least, it has cost, I may say, nothing to the public, for the total annual cost of the establishment is £1,500,

and very nearly the whole of that is made up by the fees received for business. The business has a tendency to increase, but its working, hitherto, has been such as I have described. We cannot, however, safely rely on the perpetual continuance of the favourable working even of that tribunal. The constitution of the Judicial Committee has inherent difficulties which make it hard to keep it always going, without drawing away power from other courts. It is constituted thus:—All existing Judges of the Superior Courts of Law and Equity, and of the Admiralty, Probate and Ecclesiastical Courts, who are members of the Privy Council, are ex officio members of this Committee; so are all retired Judges of those courts, including ex-Chancellors. In addition to these there are two Judges specially nominated by Her Majesty. Nothing could be more excellent than the materials I have described, provided, of course, that they can be brought to bear with sufficient regularity, convenience, and despatch. We have men of great learning, great experience, and important position. But its judicial force is not such as to secure adequately the regularity of the administration of the court. Take the case of the retired Judges; of course, their number will be fluctuating. At present there are four very eminent Judges—Sir William Erle, Sir Edward Williams, Sir Richard Kindersley, and Sir John Coleridge—they have been most assiduous in their attention, as far as health and other circumstances have permitted, to the business of the court. In that respect, I do not think there could be a better state of circumstances than exists at present in the Judicial Committee. But you cannot expect that retired Judges, however mentally able and willing, should long be physically able to give a constant attention to duties of this description. They have come to a time of life when they either already do, or soon must require, the rest which they have fairly earned. You cannot rely on more than occasional and precarious assistance as a general rule from that source. Then with regard to your present Judges. The Chief Justices and Chief Baron and the Admiralty and Probate Judges, are so occupied in their own courts that their attendance is generally impracticable. The Lord Chancellor and the Ex-Chancellors are wanted in the House of Lords. With regard to the other Judges of the Court of Chancery, the Master of the Rolls and the Lords

Justices, they have been accustomed to give a good deal of their time to that court. In Lord Langdale's time the Rolls Court used to be shut up for long periods together, while his Lordship attended the Judicial Committee. That does not so often occur now; but the Lords Justices have often been withdrawn from their own court to attend the Judicial Committee. In 1864 the Lords Justices sat thirty-seven days in the Privy Council; in 1865, fifty-three days; in 1866, nineteen days; in the present year they can hardly be expected to sit there at all. I need hardly say anything about the two nominated Judges, but the retirement of one of them, a man honoured by us all, who has done eminent service to his country in the Judicial Committee for many years, and to whom, in a great measure, it owes the high reputation it enjoys—I speak of Lord Kingsdown—must be severely felt. Such being the situation of things, I will venture to state what has occurred to me as the best way of meeting all these difficulties, before I say a word on the most difficult portion of the subject, relating to the august tribunal of the House of Lords. Taking the three courts I have mentioned alone—the Court of Error in the Exchequer Chamber, the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—I am of opinion, if the House agrees with the view I have expressed, that one Court of Appeal is sufficient—that out of the Court of Appeal now existing in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council you might, with some additions, form a most admirable Supreme Court of Appeal, capable of discharging the whole of the business which is now done by that court and also by the Courts of Exchequer Chamber, and of Appeal in Chancery. The constitution of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is most excellent, as far as it goes. I have no hesitation in saying that that court, powerfully constituted, with a sufficient number of Judges to render it capable of subdivision, and comprising men conversant with different kinds of law—common law, equity, and, it might be, Scotch law, as well as colonial and Indian law—would be able to dispose of the appeals most beneficially to our jurisprudence, with great satisfaction to the country, and at no very great additional cost. You might have the Lord Chancellor, though, if the House of Lords retained its appellate jurisdiction, he would be required there frequently. You might also have the Lords Justices, and all the other eminent persons now constituting the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. You might have two or three other permanent Judges with proper salaries, chosen with reference to qualities which are not ordinarily to be found in the Judges of the Court of Chancery; and you might from time to time offer an inducement by some acceleration and increase of pension to a few able men on the Bench in England, Scotland, and Ireland, to retire from their positions and become members of this court. Some such measures as these have been suggested by high authority as necessary to maintain in efficiency the Judicial Committee, even for its present purposes. I venture also to think that those who may hereafter fill the high office of Lord Chancellor might, considering the circumstances which often deprive the country of their services in that office, be called upon ex debito, in consideration of their pensions (which are ample though not too great), to give their services in the Supreme Court of Appeal as they now voluntarily give them from a sense of public duty in the House of Lords. It would be thus quite practicable to form such a Supreme Court of Final Appeal as might unite the various jurisdictions now exercised by different courts, and then I should certainly recommend that the court should assemble in the same place as the other Law Courts—in the future home about to be provided for justice in the neighbourhood of those who practise the law, and not, as the Judicial Committee now does, in such an inconvenient place as the Privy Council Office in Downing Street. I do not conceive that there would be any constitutional objection resulting from the relation of the colonies to the Crown to giving such a court jurisdiction over colonial and Indian appeals, because its Judges might be, and, in practice, would be, Privy Councillors, and, being so, would be qualified to advise Her Majesty on all matters of that kind. If such a court were thus constituted, and if the House of Lords retained its appellate jurisdiction unaltered, still it would be advisable to cut off the second appeal; and I see no reason why an option, at least, might not be given to suitors in Scotland and Ireland to carry their appeals to this high tribunal, if they should desire to do so. Having ventured to make these observations, I will state what amount of judicial business such a court would have to transact, judging from the data furnished by the business of the existing courts, though by the changes I have suggested there might be some alteration in the amount of business, especially by reason of the abolition of double appeals. In 1866 the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council sat for sixty-seven days. I think it better to take the number of days than the number of cases. The Court of Exchequer Chamber sat for twenty-eight days, making together ninety-five days. From Michaelmas, 1865, to Michaelmas, 1866 (I have not the exact Return for the year 1866), the full Court of Chancery sat fourteen days, the Lord Chancellor alone sat seventy-four days, and the Lords Justices sat 127 days, making together 215 days. These, added to the ninety-five days, made 310 days in all. Thus, if the court were ordinarily divided into two subdivisions, 155 days only would be required for the discharge of the business hitherto discharged by these three courts. I now come to the subject of the House of Lords, and I should be very sorry if anything were to fall from me which might be thought disrespectful to that illustrious body, and I think it my duty to bear my humble testimony to the excellent manner in which the Judges in the House of Lords have during the whole of my experience discharged their duty. It is not from any dissatisfaction at the performance of their duty that I venture respectfully, and I hope with due modesty, to approach for the purpose of criticism that august tribunal. The jurisdiction of the House of Lords underwent consideration in 1856, when Lord Westbury recommended an opposite policy to that which I now recommend. He recommended that the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should be transferred to the House of Lords. I cannot say that such a change would to my mind be an improvement. I own I cannot see why we might not venture even to ask the House of Lords to transfer their jurisdiction to another Supreme Court of Appeal, if there be not some strong political reasons to the contrary. It is really only nominally that the House of Lords now act as Judges of Appeal. Two or three, or four, eminent and learned Judges sit in the House of Peers, in a most inconvenient place, surrounded, no doubt, by the trappings of that august assembly, and discharge functions which they could perform equally well elsewhere. What happened in O'Connell's case? When a case involves principles of importance, political or religious, about which men's minds move in different directions, there is some danger even for Judges in a court of justice to be divided with respect to it, just in the manner which might be anticipated from their known opinions, although their decisions may be perfectly consistent with the most conscientious discharge of their duty. That happened to the Law Lords in O'Connell's case. Other Peers, however, were present who thought they might have been capable of forming an opinion on such a question, and one of those, hearing the opinions expressed by the Law Lords, thought that he, being a Member of the House of Lords, which was then exercising its appellate jurisdiction, had a right to express his opinion also. He had listened to the whole of the case, and had heard the entire argument, which he thought he understood. Accordingly, he desired to express his opinion; but it was held that neither the views nor the votes of any of the numerous lay Lords who attended at the hearing could be given. The result was that the sentence was declared against, possibly, the judgment of the majority of the Peers who were present. The majority of the Law Lords determined the matter, and some people thought they did so according to their political opinions; though that may, I believe, be accounted for without the slightest imputation being made on the character of those Judges, because on occasions of that kind general principles have a considerable influence, even over judicial minds. Still, this justifies me in saying that the House of Lords, as a great political assembly, does not now practically exercise this jurisdiction, which is in reality transferred to a small number of learned persons who, if the law allowed it, might render the same valuable service to the State in a place more suitable for the administration of justice. If, however, any value were attached to the form, that form might still be gone through, just as is the case with appeals from India or the colonies. An appeal from India or the colonies is made to Her Majesty in Council, and is referred to the Judicial Committee, who make a Report, which is afterwards adopted by Her Majesty, who gives judgment accordingly. In the same way the House of Lords might refer cases for argument and report to the Supreme Court of Appeal, and might adopt and act upon the reports of that court, though I confess I do not myself attach much importance to such forms. Whatever may be the political value of this association of the House of Lords with the administration of justice, I cannot but feel, and I think it my duty to impress upon the House, that, as things now are, this benefit is purchased at the cost of very serious public inconvenience, to which, if the jurisdiction is to continue, a remedy ought without further delay to be applied. Let us look, first, at the time which is lost under the present system. This great court of final appeal in the House of Lords sits only while Parliament is sitting: that is, for four days only in the week, during less than six months in the year. For the other six or seven months of the year, however great may be the urgency of the case, the doors of this Court of final Appeal are closed. I will give an illustration of the inconvenience which may be caused by this. Lately questions have arisen in consequence of the failure of the firm of Overend, Gurney, and Co. The shareholders in that Company have raised the question whether they are liable to its creditors. Well, if a decision on that question were given by the Court of Appeal in Chancery at the end of July, while Parliament was not sitting, it would be impossible to have the matter determined by the final Court of Appeal before the next Session of Parliament, notwithstanding the vast importance of the interests involved, and the shock which might possibly be given to credit throughout the mercantile community. I maintain that the final Court of Appeal ought to be always accessible. Then, with regard to arrears. In 1866 the House sat for judicial business on seventy-seven days only, and this Session there are forty-three cases, which are remanets from former Sessions, fourteen of them being remanets from Sessions earlier than 1866. Now this delay is felt most particularly in cases of error brought from the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in which it is often considered necessary to have the attendance of the Judges. This very day there has been a strong illustration of the inconvenience which arises. There was an appeal relating to the presentation to a church living, the parties being the Bishop of Exeter and the patron of the living. The Bishop had not instituted the clergyman presented by the patron, and the action was brought in 1858. The real issues between the parties were raised on demurrers, and decided in June, 1859; but it nevertheless became necessary to go into the trial of questions of fact, which occupied a considerable time more, and it was not until December, 1860, that the case could be taken, by way of error, to the Exchequer Chamber. In February, 1862, it was decided there, and then taken to the House of Lords, and set down for hearing. It waited four years, and then came on for argument. The argument began in June last year, and the Judges were summoned; but they were obliged to go on circuit before the argument could be concluded. The argument was resumed yesterday before Judges not altogether the same; and to-day it has had to be again interrupted in consequence of the Judges being obliged again to go to other duties. It is not probable that it can be a second time resumed before June next. Now, is it possible to conceive anything more objectionable than such a system? For my part, I cannot see what is the use of the Judges attending the House of Lords in order that they may hear an argument a third time, and once more express their opinions. That practice ought, I think, to be put an end to, especially considering the pressure of their other duties, which make it most difficult for them to find time for such a purpose. But now I come to a still more important point. In order to keep up this jurisdiction in the House of Lords, you must have a sufficient attendance of Law Lords; but you cannot always find childless men who can be transferred to the House of Lords to do judicial business. Is it convenient to the Law Lords themselves or to the country that you should be under the necessity of making a new hereditary Peer as often as you have to keep up the supply of judicial power in the House of Lords? There are some lawyers who are able to leave adequate fortunes to their children. But we know from past experience that there have been eminent men to whom, and to whose families, it would have been infinitely more desirable not to have had that burdensome dignity. As long as the Law Lord himself lives the country gets the benefit of his learning and services; but his son is not a Judge in the House of Lords, nor his grandson; and unless he has been so fortunate as to be able amply to endow his family you are inflicting an evil upon them, upon the Peers themselves, and upon the country by multiplying unduly the number of hereditary Peers. Not very long since an attempt was made to remedy this evil. It was supposed that Her Majesty possessed the prerogative of creating Peers for life, and that when She did so by Her writ, they might be summoned to sit in the House of Lords; and I confess, for my own part, I have never been able to discover in what part of the law or Constitution of this country authority can be found to show that a Peer so created and summoned has not a right to sit in that assembly. However, their Lordships have so determined, and have thus practically excluded every lawyer with a family which would forbid him to accept an hereditary Peerage. Therefore, unless the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords can be otherwise provided for, we must go on with this system of multiplying hereditary Peerages in order to keep that House sufficiently supplied with judicial power. The House of Lords themselves have confessed that this is a very serious evil. In 1856 they appointed a Committee, and a Bill was introduced on the subject. The sense of the evil entertained by that Committee was such that they recommended that there should be two paid Judges sitting in the House, and a limited number, not exceeding four, of life Peers, to secure a regular attendance. A Bill was introduced to give effect to that recommendation, and passed the House of Lords, but was thrown out in this House. The evil has been going on ever since without remedy. As often as I hear of attempts being made to supply the deficiency I am only reminded how inadequate they are, and how much they fall short of the exigencies of the case. We have all heard that two new Judges are now to be called to the Upper House. One of these is a Judge from Scotland (Lord Justice General M'Neill), whose presence, as long as he has health and strength, will, I doubt not, be a most valuable addition to the strength of that assembly. I hope he may long enjoy that dignity and prosperity which his services to the country so richly deserve. The other is an eminent person (Sir Hugh Cairns) who was, not long ago, one of the chief ornaments of this assembly, and who will be one of the chief ornaments of any assembly to which he belongs; one who is deserving of every honour which can be bestowed upon him, and to whom we are all delighted to see honour paid; but the only thing he will not be able to do is to add to the judicial force of the House of Lords, for as long as he has to discharge the duties of a Judge elsewhere he cannot do it in that House. His presence there will be welcome to the House and the country, but the difficulty will still remain. Now, is there any real difficulty in dealing with the case? In Lord Eldon's time Sir John Leech, who was not a Peer, assisted in the discharge of the judicial duties of the House of Lords for a considerable time, and therefore there is no reason why those duties should not be discharged by men who are not Peers, if you constitute a Supreme Court. But, if that solution cannot be accepted, there can, at least, be no good reason why the obstacle, which the Lords themselves have created, to the exercise of Her Majesty's prerogative to create life Peers, should not be removed by legislation. I thank the House for having heard me with so much patience. All I have to say in conclusion is that I hope I shall not be misunderstood. I do not profess to dogmatize, or to do more than propose to the House and the country those matters which have occurred to me as worthy of consideration, to meet evils which are, or ought to be, admitted by all. Such remedies as have occurred to me I have offered; but no one will be more ready to defer to the judgment of others, if the remedies which I have suggested should not be considered conducive to the public good.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, the subject which has been introduced to-night by my hon. and learned Friend is one of the greatest importance. The mode in which it has been brought under our notice is not the most convenient for discussion. Were it not for the somewhat singular proposals with which the speech of my hon. and learned Friend concluded, I should express my regret that during the many years he sat on the Government Benches, with the influence and reputation his name has always carried, he did not introduce them for our consideration at an earlier period. Having regard to the nature of those proposals, I cannot regret that measures of such a character were not introduced with the authority of Her Majesty's Government. I shall not endeavour to follow in detail all the arguments of my hon. and learned Friend through his long and varied speech. It was divided, as the House will recollect, into two main points—the one referring to the original jurisdiction of the Courts of Common Law; the other to the jurisdiction of the appellate courts. My hon. and learned Friend made no complaint of the original jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, with which he and I are best acquainted; but with respect to those courts to which his experience does not extend much more largely than my own, he had several complaints to make. I shall not dwell upon this part of his case, being anxious to direct attention to those large and important proposals with which he concluded. Still, with reference to the courts of common law, I may say that my hon. and learned Friend admits that all the energies of the Judges now presiding there, are honourably and well directed to the discharge of all their duties, and that there is nothing to be hoped for in the way of an improvement of the machinery by which the business of those courts is conducted. When I say “the machinery” I speak of the intellect, the mind which is applied to the discharge of those duties, whatever other machinery there may be. My hon. and learned Friend admits there is nothing more to be hoped for in that direction. I agree with him. But he complains that there is a great waste of judicial power. Now, as far as he and I are concerned, this is not a question of knowledge; it is a question of hearsay evidence, and I venture to think that my hon. and learned Friend’s evidence on the point is not more valuable than my own. For thirty years he and I have sat side by side in the Court of Chancery, and so engaged that neither of us can know from personal experience what goes on in the Courts of Common Law. Therefore, what my learned Friend and I say on the point is derived from information furnished by others. I believe that my information on the subject is derived from the highest authority, and I say that after every allowance made for possible improvement in procedure, an addition to the judicial power is necessary, and that it was right that in the Speech from the Throne the attention of Parliament should have been called

I repeat that I do not pretend to personal knowledge on the subject; but, speaking from the information of parties who are familiar with it, I will proceed to consider the observations of my hon. and learned Friend. He says, first, that he would make all three Courts of Common Law practically one. Now let it be granted that this might be done, though I do not admit the expediency of it; still, what great saving would there be of judicial power? There is a special jurisdiction in the Queen’s Bench, a special jurisdiction in the Exchequer, and some special jurisdiction in the Common Pleas. Throw the three into one, you have still the same amount of work to do. I do not think, therefore, there is much to be accomplished by that suggestion of my hon. and learned Friend. But he says that we ought not to have three Judges sitting in banco, that we should have one every day in term sitting at Nisi Prius, and one in Chambers. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Sir Robert Collier), in correction of one of those suggestions of my hon. and learned Friend, remarked that already one of the Judges sits at Nisi Prius every day during term. And as regards Chamber sittings, I may observe that already we practically have that course of procedure. Whenever an escape from duty in court is possible, one of the Judges does sit in Chambers in the middle of the day; and when this is not possible, Judges are to be often found discharging their official duties in Chambers to a late hour in the day. I think, therefore, that there is no ground in that direction for a saving of judicial power. Another suggestion of my hon. and learned Friend is to transfer arrears from one court to another. This might prevent arrears, and on that ground no one would object to it. But it would not prevent the necessity of additional judicial power. There were some other points in my hon. and learned Friend’s speech directed to the same subject, but I failed to perceive how any of his suggestions disposed of the proposition in the Queen’s Speech, that there is a necessity for strengthening the judicial powers of the Courts of Common Law. I now come to my hon. and learned Friend’s argument respecting the ultimate Court of Appeal. I agree with many things he said; but I must confess that I heard with great surprise and regret that, in his opinion, it is right and proper that the main appellate jurisdiction of this country should be removed from that tribunal which has possessed it from the earliest period of our history. I will follow my hon. and learned Friend as closely as I can through the various portions of his argument. First he submits that there should be only one appeal. That I admit is an important consideration, but I do not intend to express an opinion upon it, because it is not at all material to the main question which my hon. and learned Friend has brought forward, and to which I propose to address myself. It is clear that throughout this vast Empire, and for as long a time as our judicial tribunals have existed at all, suitors have had a right of intermediate appeal. From the Courts of Chancery there have been appeals to the Lord Chancellor, and more recently to the Lords Justices, and thence to the House of Lords. From each of the Common Law Courts there have been appeals to the Exchequer Chamber, and thence to the House of Lords. In Scotland there have been appeals from the Lord Ordinary to the Court of Session, and thence to the House of Lords. In the colonies and in India there has almost always been an appeal from the court of first instance to the Supreme Court, and thence to the Privy Council. I quite agree to the proposition that, if you have an ample and exhaustive argument on the whole subject before two minds or two sets of minds, one after the other, one appeal is enough. The intellect of the appellate court is then fully informed, and a right decision is as likely to be obtained then as after a second appeal. But it constantly happens that the hearing of the first appeal is defective, that a case goes off on some point of form, that the arguments are not exhausted, and that questions of importance are not considered at all till the hearing of the first appeal. And this is not a thing to be cured by regulation. It is an infirmity of human nature and will always exist. There is therefore another side to the question, and it may well be that our old constitutional practice is right of allowing more than one appeal. I leave that question, however, without expressing any opinion upon it, and I wish it to be understood that I am throughout giving utterance simply to my individual sentiments with reference to my hon. and learned Friend's proposals, and that nothing I say is an expression of the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. The next point which was urged by my hon. and learned Friend is that there should be only one ultimate appellate court. Personally and in the abstract, I agree with him, provided it can be done. But observe the great difficulties there are in the way of producing that result with an Empire so extensive and so varied in its interests as ours. If there is to be one appellate court for the whole Empire, it must be a court to which every portion of the Empire will cheerfully submit. It may be that Hindoos and Mahomedans and Her Majesty's colonial subjects would submit to a tribunal sitting in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Possibly even Jersey and the Channel Islands would submit, and perhaps if they did not my hon. and learned Friend might think he could compel them. Still, these are difficulties in the way which are not to be disregarded. But then comes the question which some hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House may be able to answer—What will Scotland say to the matter? Will Scotland submit to an independent tribunal sitting in Lincoln's Inn Fields to try her appeals? For my part, I believe Scotland will insist upon retaining the great benefit she has derived from an appeal to the Imperial Parliament, which is, in fact, her Parliament as much as it is that of England. Moreover, if you want only one Court of Appeal you have one already in the House of Lords, to which there can be no practical difficulty in referring every portion of our ultimate appellate jurisdiction. The argument of my hon. and learned Friend really tells against the conclusion which he endeavoured to establish. I agree with him that a mind schooled in law and accustomed to grapple with facts, will have no insuperable difficulty in dealing with the law that may be brought under its consideration from any part of our Empire. My hon. and learned Friend has spoken of the way in which Hindoo and Mahomedan law is administered by the Privy Council, and the law of Scotland by the House of Lords. These are admirable instances of the truth of his remark, and it is manifest that the benefit is reciprocal. The law of England is as much benefited by the familiarity of our supreme Judges with the law of foreign countries as the law of those countries is benefited by the law of England. The effect of that is that no narrow or prejudiced view is taken, and we find that the law of England receives light from the knowledge which is obtained by Judges hearing appeals on other systems of law than those with which they are most familiar. Then, as to what that ultimate tribunal of appeal should be, I may remind the House that in the debate of 1856, upon the Motion of Earl Granville for a Committee of Inquiry into a more effective exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, the Earl of Derby used these words—

“Of this I am quite certain, that if it was necessary to take the alternative between the maintenance of any privilege of your Lordships’ House, however important, or however valuable, and, on the other hand, the better administration of justice, there is not one of your Lordships who would hesitate in regard to that alternative, and say, let justice be fairly and impartially administered, whatever privileges this House may be compelled to forego.”

It was not, therefore, a new sentiment to which my hon. and learned Friend gave utterance when he said that the consideration of primary importance was the perfect administration of justice, because that principle was insisted upon over and over again on that occasion. If I fail to show that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords is the system most complete and perfect for securing the administration of justice, no subordinate considerations can be taken into account. Some general observations, however, naturally occur before we come to the particular history of that jurisdiction and the particular objections that have been urged against it. In the matter of judicial tribunals should not regard be had to the usage of centuries? Were the respect, the affection, and the confidence of the people in the administration of justice by a tribunal which had existed for centuries to be disregarded? I affirm that the subjects of the Crown have perfect confidence in the administration of justice by the House of Lords, and my hon. and learned Friend will not and cannot impeach it. His own experience as well as mine, for twenty years at least, will testify that though sometimes an advocate’s sympathy with his client may lead him to regret a particular decision, yet on reviewing the decisions of that long period I believe that we shall agree in the opinion that in the House of Lords we have a wise and just administration of the law, and that everything that can be expected from an appellate jurisdiction has been obtained. Then, too, regard must be had to the place which the existing tribunal holds in the Constitution of the country. That argument would be of no avail with any Members of this House—if such there be—who do not admit that it is an advantage to have a House of Lords as one of our institutions in which the people have confidence, and the dignity and importance of which it is proper to maintain. I do not to-night quarrel with their sentiments; let them be adduced at the proper time, and we will meet them. But those who believe that the House of Lords is a valuable, important, and venerated part of our Constitution must certainly give some weight to the fact that the confidence and respect which attach to its appellate jurisdiction add to the dignity and importance of that Assembly. In the debate to which I have referred, Earl Granville, adverting to the remarks which had been made by the Earl of Derby, and which I have already quoted, thus expressed himself upon that subject—

“I go still further than the noble Lord in holding that those functions are a very important part of the functions of your Lordships, and go far to support the dignity and utility of the House, and to increase the respect in which it is held in the country.”

Lord Campbell, too, said—

“I entirely agree that it is of the greatest importance, not only to the dignity and usefulness of your Lordships’ House, but to the public welfare, that the judicial jurisdiction should be retained. It has been looked upon for ages with veneration, and no supreme court of appeal can now be constructed which would be a substitute for this House.”

These were the opinions of noble Lords in that House. Then, Sir, what are the feelings of each part of the Empire? I will not appeal to the colonies or the smaller dependencies of Great Britain. If you are to have an appellate tribunal such as the hon. and learned Gentleman recommends, are you to deprive Scotland of its privilege of appeal to the House of Lords? The opinion not only of every lawyer but of every Scotch gentleman capable of expressing an opinion would be against such a proposal. Having had some experience in arguing cases from Scotland, I will say that, whether you take the opinion of suitors or of the profession, you will find them agreeing that Scotland has derived the greatest benefit from the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. Only this week the hon. and learned Gentleman who filled the office of Lord Advocate in the late Government (Mr. Moncreiff), in addressing the Lord Justice General of Scotland on his retirement from the Bench, said, “We are conscious of the many benefits which Scotland has obtained from the appellate jurisdiction.” That is the universal sentiment of Scotland. Are you then to divide the appellate jurisdiction, and make it into two jurisdictions? That is not desirable as admitted by my hon. and learned Friend, and I am sure that the people of Scotland would not be satisfied with the shifting of the jurisdiction which he proposes. If you are then to reduce the appellate jurisdiction to one tribunal, the House of Lords is the place in which it is to be exercised. If you divide it into two, the House of Lords must retain its ancient jurisdiction. The judicial and appellate functions of the House of Lords are of great antiquity. They add to the dignity of that ancient and distinguished Assembly, and you cannot withdraw them without removing a stone from the edifice which would not be unimportant. But what I rely upon mainly is this, that the House of Lords is the tribunal the best calculated to administer justice in every portion of this great and varied Empire. No existing tribunal possesses the same elements, nor will you find them in any tribunal which you may create as the appellate jurisdiction for the whole Empire. What are the objections the hon. and learned Gentleman urges? The small number of Judges, the occasional sittings, and the uncertain attendance. Let me ask, what is the most suitable number of Judges? If you get a tribunal of three Judges of the highest qualification you have enough. During the last twenty years the great majority of judgments in the House of Lords have been those of three of their Lordships. Out of 400 appeals a small number have been decided by two Lords and not one-sixth of the number have been decided by one only. That, at all events, is not an objection of so vital a nature as to induce you to remove the appellate jurisdiction from the House of Lords. Then as to occasional sittings, is there any difficulty in applying a remedy? I say there is no difficulty. With the aid of this House there would be no difficulty in passing a Bill through Parliament enabling a Judicial Committee of the House of Lords to sit for every practical purpose during the vacation. The hon. and learned Gentleman says it is a mere sham to call the sitting of noble and learned Lords as Judges a sitting of the House of Lords. But his argument equally goes to the functions exercised by the Sovereign. Her Majesty in Council hears appeals from India and the colonies, and refers them to a Judicial Committee. Is that tribunal to be dispensed with because the Queen does not herself determine the question? The fact that a large tribunal have always had an appellate jurisdiction, and that a portion of that body only are exercising it, forms no reason whatever for removing that jurisdiction, on the ground that they are delegating it to a portion of their number. How do men gain access to, and become members of, the appellate tribunal of the House of Lords? If my hon. and learned Friend took his seat there it would be because he is known to be a fit and proper person to sit in that House. He admits that those who sit upon this tribunal are competent to the task. I say that the interests of the law and of the public at large, that equity, that common law, that Scotland, England, and the colonies, alike receive benefit, not only from the existence of this tribunal for the ultimate decision of great questions, but also from the mode in which the tribunal is from time to time renewed or strengthened. I say we ought to be proud of the Constitution which leads to the elevation of men who have distinguished themselves in their profession. The road to this dignity is open and is known to the public. It is the road of honour, wisdom, and learning, and the people of this country, who know the path which leads to this high eminence, place confidence in that tribunal. I say it is no sham, and it would be as true and as just to call the decision of the Privy Council a sham because it is given in the name of the Queen. But then the hon. and learned Gentleman says there were sometimes only two Judges, and their sittings were only occasional. I deeply regret that my hon. and learned Friend did not call attention to these subjects when he was in office, because, with the power and influence he then possessed, any proposal coming from him would have been carefully considered by Parliament, and within reasonable limits might have been carried. At the same time, I do not believe that any such measure as my hon. and learned Friend now indicates would have been carried, and I doubt very much whether he would have proposed it under the responsibility of office. If he entertained these strong views, why did he not bring in a Bill when Attorney General and endeavour to carry it? My deliberate opinion is that maintaining the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords is the best way of administering the appellate jurisdiction of the country. The jurisdiction is as free from objection as is any legal jurisdiction in the country, and its defects, such as they are, admit of easy redress. Various remedies have been attempted. In 1834 Lord Brougham, then Lord Chancellor, brought in a Bill to refer appeals to a Judicial Committee to be appointed by the Lords, upon whose Report the Lords were to determine. That plan seemed to be in the mind of my hon. and learned Friend, though it has not received much favour till to-night. In 1841 Lord St. Leonards, then a Member of the House of Commons, introduced Resolutions, and a Bill in which he proposed the nomination of two Lords' assistants. In 1842, a Bill was brought in by Lord Campbell having for its object to establish one court of appellate jurisdiction, and to constitute the House of Lords the sole court of ultimate appeal for the Empire. In 1856 a Bill passed through the House of Lords and was brought down here, having its origin in the Report of a Committee appointed on the Motion of the Earl of Derby, and its object was to make better provision for the appellate jurisdiction of that House. That Bill was, in substance, to appoint two Deputy Speakers with salaries to assist in the judicial business of the Upper House, and provided that if the Crown should create any Lord Chancellor or Deputy Speaker a Peer for life, such life Peer should be entitled to sit and vote in the House of Lords, subject to certain provisions for limiting the number of such life Peers entitled to sit and vote. [2 Macquenn's House of Lords Reports, p. 675.] This would be a method, and, I think, a good method, of surmounting the occasional—and, in my experience, only very occasional—inconvenience arising from too limited a number of Judges. It is admitted that the jurisdiction of the Upper House has been well and wisely exercised, and it is evident that the inconvenience that sometimes arises from the difficulty of finding a sufficient number of Judges might be remedied. I am of opinion that much of the difficulty, in cases of this kind, arises from the perhaps wise parsimony of this House in sanctioning expenditure for judicial purposes. I say "wise," because it is wise of this House always to look cautiously to the way in which public money is expended; but economy may be carried too far. At present you actually trust, as my hon. and learned Friend has pointed out, for the discharge of all the appellate business of the country to the sense of honour of Judges who, having by their former services entitled themselves to their retiring pensions, think it their duty, without salary or remuneration of any kind, to undertake those new and onerous labours. Look at the instance of the noble Lord who has rendered such eminent service to the country, Lord Kingsdown, who never held any judicial appointment, and never consequently had any retiring pension, yet who for years discharged duties of the highest kind, and added, not only to the lustre of the Bench, but, by his decisions, contributed to place upon a firm basis principles which before had been unsettled, and, at the same time, facilitated the administration of the law. Such labours were due entirely to his sense of honour and of the public duty incident to his high position as a Member of the House possessing the appellate jurisdictions, and examples equally honourable have occurred before now in our legal history. But is it wise for the country to trust to services of this character being often at its disposal? I have detailed to the House plans which at various times have been suggested for modifying the appellate judicial tribunal. At present, I do not think there is any necessity for adopting any of these plans. But if reform be needed, and the money forthcoming, all that is required might be accomplished by the appointment of Lords' assistants or Law Lords with life Peerages, as proposed in the Bill carried through the Lords in 1856. We have, however, now an ample staff for the business to be transacted. Three Judges attend constantly, without taking into account the addition of the noble Lord from Scotland who is about to enter the House. That the efficiency of the tribunal should be maintained to the fullest extent I am clear. A tribunal which has to comprehend, to weigh, and to apply finally the principles of law in force in almost every part of the Empire, and which discharges those functions ably, impartially, and to the satisfaction of the country, is a tribunal which I am sure this House will never think of weakening or destroying. It might be desirable that the whole appellate jurisdiction should be administered by one court, which should have the ultimate decision in all causes, whether Hindoo or Mahomedan, whether from our colonies or dependencies, or from England, Ireland, or Scotland; but no sufficient ground has been shown for removing the jurisdiction from the House of Lords.

With reference to the Privy Council I have nothing to say but this, that it is a tribunal which has discharged its duties admirably. Into the small matters which my learned Friend has discussed as to the judgments of the court being pronounced by one for all or by all of its members, I will not travel; they are points which are not properly subjects for legislation, but which every court must determine for itself. But I think that it would be impossible to constitute the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the sole tribunal of appeal. Neither do I think it would be satisfactory to have one tribunal sitting at Lincoln's Inn Fields to decide all the vast and varied issues growing out of the business of the nation. For these reasons I submit that if legislation on the subject be sanctioned, it must be such as shall retain the jurisdiction of the House of Lords, which has existed so long and so beneficially in this country.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, that he had no intention of following the Attorney General and the Member for Richmond in their controversy on the subject of the appellate jurisdiction. As far as abstract principle was concerned he thought that there should be one court of appellate jurisdiction; but it would be admitted that to adapt that principle to our existing institutions must be a work of difficulty and of time. Without entering into this question, he desired to draw the attention of the House to a point of more pressing importance—namely, the present dead-lock in the Common Law Courts. At Middlesex the remanets in the Queen's Bench numbered 141, in the Common Pleas seventy-nine, and in the Exchequer twenty, making a total of 240. Adding to these the remanets in London, the total number was brought up to 479, or close on 500 remanets. At present it might be observed that the Court of Exchequer was not so fully occupied as the other tribunals. But the very admirable manner in which the present Lord Chief Baron discharged the duties of his office was such that business had already returned to the Court of Exchequer, and there was every reason to suppose that before long it would be as much occupied as any of the other courts in Westminster Hall. Among the evils resulting from the pressure of business in the courts, as represented by these 500 remanets, were these. Actions just and capable of being maintained were not brought; others were settled

disadvantageously or referred to arbitration at double or treble the expense; and defendants were encouraged to defend actions unjustly for the sake of wearying the plaintiffs out, and so obtaining the advantages to be looked for from delay. These various evils taken together represented an amount of actual money loss greater than the salary of many Judges. But there were not only remanets at Nisi Prius, there were arrears on the new trial paper, and on the special paper. On circuit there were also remanets, or else, without any fault of Judge or counsel, when there was a long cause list and no time to try it, causes were crushed and ground to powder in a way that was highly unsatisfactory to suitors. On many of the circuits Judges were obliged to avail themselves for days together of the assistance of Queen's Counsel in trying the criminal cases. This state of things entirely bore out the contention of the Attorney General, from which he did not understand his hon. and learned Friend to dissent, that it would be absolutely necessary to take into consideration the passage of the Queen's Speech upon this subject. His own opinion was, and had been for many years, that a public necessity existed for adding to the judicial strength of the Common Law Courts. The number of Judges had been substantially the same since the Revolution. In 1881 the number, it was true, had been increased from twelve to fifteen; but the abolition of the Welsh judicature took place at the same time, so that there had been a corresponding increase in the duties. A statement in his possession from a learned Judge showed that from 1831 to the present moment the duties of the Common Law Judges had at least doubled. This had been due, in the first place, to the increase in the wealth, population, and commerce of the country; but next, to the great improvements which had taken place in the law itself. Cases, instead of being got rid of by technical objections, were now for the most part tried out upon their merits, which course, while it was much more advantageous and satisfactory, naturally consumed a great deal more time. Again, the examination of the parties, who were generally the largest witnesses, inasmuch as they knew most about the subject, had greatly added to the length of trials. Again, the Chamber business of the Judges had very much increased, owing to the Common Law Procedure Acts; and he was informed by a learned Judge that for one hour that used to be spent in Chambers there were now at least four. Moreover, additional circuit towns had been established, and the Judges now went to Liverpool, Manchester, and Leeds, and they were to go to Birmingham. All this had taken place since 1831. Winter circuits had also been established, and it was most desirable, nay, necessary, that they should be extended for the trial of civil as well as criminal cases. The universal feeling of the profession was that another circuit should be formed. But that was utterly impossible with the present judicial staff. Arrangements might, no doubt, be made for saving the time of the Judges to some extent. The business of the three courts might be equalized, and by abolishing the peculiar jurisdiction of each the business might be transferred from one court to the others; but that would only equalize the burden—it would not diminish it as a whole. He also agreed that four Judges need not sit at one time in banco, but four Judges scarcely ever did so. There were generally only three, so that no great saving could be effected in this way. His hon. and learned Friend suggested that the Chamber business might be transferred to the Masters; and, perhaps, a portion of it might, but not much, because the decisions of the Masters could not carry with them the authority of those of the Judges, and would probably give rise to many more appeals. Possibly some further business might be thrown on the County Courts, but it was not desirable much to extend the jurisdiction of those tribunals, for if they became courts for the trial of heavy cases their utility would in a great measure cease, and it would, perhaps, become requisite to have other small debts courts, thus leading to greater confusion. Again, the number of frivolous actions might possibly be somewhat reduced by depriving plaintiffs of costs in certain cases. Still, enough would remain to make it absolutely necessary that the present judicial strength should be increased. He did not think that the addition of one Judge to the Admiralty Court would suffice, and in his opinion none of the suggestions made would obviate the necessity of considering the important recommendation contained in Her Majesty's Speech.

MR. SANDFORD said, the Attorney General had not answered the case made by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), because he had contended that the appellate jurisdiction ought to reside in the House of Lords, but had not attempted to show that the appellate jurisdiction of that House, as at present constituted, was the best tribunal that could be constituted. That hon. and learned Gentleman had taken rather a rosy view of the present state of that tribunal. Indeed, Attorney Generals in esse were apt to entertain optimistic views on matters of that kind. If the hon. and learned Gentleman thought the House of Lords the best tribunal that could be constituted, all he could say was that that was not in accordance with the opinion of the House of Lords themselves. For what had they determined? Their own Committee had reported that three Law Lords should always sit as an appellate court. But all knew that three Law Lords would not do that, and that appeals would virtually be decided by Lord Chelmsford and the Scotch Judge who had just been made a Peer. He asked, then, was it right that these two learned Lords should review and reverse—for that was what it came to—the decision of Lord Justice Cairns and the other Lords Justice, or the decision of the Exchequer Chamber? Such an appellate jurisdiction as that could not possibly give satisfaction to the country. As the House of Lords was at present constituted, they did not get the best Judges nor enough of them. If they were about to create a law Peer, they did not ask whether he was the best man they could find; but their first question was, "Is he married?" their next question was, "Is he likely to be married?" and, perhaps, their third question was, if so, is his wife likely to be a fruitful mother of children?" Under these circumstances, he maintained that such an appellate jurisdiction was not one that could be perfectly satisfactory to the country. The Lords' Committee had proposed that two Deputy Speakers should be appointed and made life Peers, as it had been said that barristers did not earn fortunes large enough to render them eligible to be hereditary Peers. The evidence given by the lawyers before the Committee went in favour of life Peerages up to the number of four being created. That was utterly rejected by that House, not because life Peers ought not to be created, but—certainly as far as his own vote went—on the ground that as the measure then stood it would not secure the best men. £5,000 a year each for the Deputy Speakers were not such terms as would give them two of the best lawyers. The most satisfactory arrangement would perhaps be that the House of Lords should part with its appellate jurisdiction, but it was open to this objection, that the Peers' Report showed them to be unwilling to do so. Some persons thought that jurisdiction should be transferred to the Privy Council; but there were some constitutional objections to that. A Privy Councillor was only a servant of the Queen as long as it was Her will and pleasure that he should be so. It had also been proposed that all the chiefs of the superior courts should be made life Peers. But the gentlemen of the legal profession saw one great objection to that, because the chiefs of the Common Law Courts had not the time for such duties, and were wanted elsewhere. Moreover, from the manner in which legal patronage was bestowed, those chiefs were by no means always our best lawyers. They were probably appointed for their Parliamentary services, and they had generally entered that House because they were successful advocates. If the Peers were really unwilling to part with their appellate jurisdiction, it seemed to him that it would be necessary to consider the very broad question of life Peerages, and whether they ought not to be conferred on the best lawyers they could find, whether distinguished as advocates or not. He hoped that that suggestion would receive the serious attention of the Government.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he did not agree either with the present Attorney General in believing that our appellate jurisdiction was in a perfect state, or with the late Attorney General in the opinion that that appellate jurisdiction ought to be removed from the House of Lords. If we were starting afresh no doubt it would be well to establish some court akin in its nature to that of the Court of Cassation, and entirely separated from all political influence. But, under our Constitutional Government, our courts were in reality the débris of the ancient Curia Regis, and the largest fragment of that débris was the House of Lords. To destroy that, or to weaken its authority, would be to derange the balance of power, which was so advantageous in the Constitution of this country. It would not only be a violation of English history and a dangerous innovation, but it was not at all necessary to our obtaining a good Court of Appeal. It was evident that the Judges of the land formerly shared in the judicial powers of the House of Lords, which in the ancient records was said to consist of les grands et sages du royaume. The former term included the Barons of the realm, and the latter the Prelates and the Judges. There were two ways of remedying the present state of things—one which he thought a very good one—was that all the Judges, both Common Law and Equity Judges, should also be Members of the House of Lords for judicial business, and on all judicial business should vote with the Peers, as they did formerly; and the other was to devise some mode by which the judicial strength of the House should be increased without its being encumbered by too great a number of Law Lords. There was little difficulty attending the solution of that problem, for it could be done by granting the Crown power to make the holders of certain high judicial offices, such as Judges, life Peers. This could be done without an unlimited power of creating life Peers being granted, which he had on a previous occasion opposed; for if such unlimited power were granted, the authority of the House of Lords would be gone, and a Minister would be able, by the creation of life Peers, to overbear all opposition in the Assembly by swamping it for the purpose of carrying a particular measure. He did not believe that the Judges sitting in the House of Lords were sufficient to constitute a Court of Appeal. There would be no objection to appointing Judges life Peers; and he thought that if the House were strengthened in either of the ways he had pointed out, it would have greater weight with the country than any court constituted upon a priori principles. It was contrary to common sense that the decision of ten Judges in the Exchequer Chamber should be reversed by three Judges in the House of Lords. The staff of the House of Lords must be increased. With respect to the Courts of Equity, the Lord Chancellor was the chief Judge of the Courts of Equity. It often happened that he had to sit in the House of Lords on appeals from himself, and, with the assistance of a Common Law Judge, who never held a brief in a Court of Equity, affirm his own decisions. This showed that the appellate jurisdiction was in an unsatisfactory state. He thought that either of the expedients which he had pointed out would enable the House of Lords to cope with all the difficulties which existed, and render it a satisfactory Court of Appeal. He agreed with the late Solicitor General (Sir Robert Collier) that the administration of justice at the assizes and at the sittings in London was unsatisfactory. The assizes were arranged on a very antiquated model. At the assizes, the cases frequently were hurried over, or referred to junior barristers, instead of being decided by the Judge. The time was approaching when there must be a thorough re-casting of the whole of our judicial system. With respect to the County Courts, they were unable to cope with the business heaped upon them. A County Court Judge did not possess the dignity and position which a Judge ought to hold. The country ought to be mapped out into judicial districts, and a court ought to be appointed in each capable of discharging all the duties of a court in the first instance. The Judges of that court ought to go circuits in their own district, and be fully responsible for the administration of justice, and from the decision of these provincial courts an appeal might be given to a separate court in the capital. That was a system which existed in every civilized country, and which had been found to work well. So far as the appellate jurisdiction went Parliament had the remedy in its own hands; but he hoped they would never destroy the time-honoured jurisdiction of the House of Lords, which was necessary for the maintenance of the mixed constitution of the country.

MR. JAMES said, he entirely agreed with what had fallen from his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, that there ought to be only one court of appeal. He could not conceive a worse tribunal than the Court of Exchequer Chamber, for the calls upon the Judges who composed it were so numerous that it was impossible for them to discharge the duties imposed upon them as a court of appeal. He wished to call the attention of the House to the necessity of doing something to correct the defects which existed in the tribunals of the law, not only in Westminster but throughout the whole country. The present judicial system was universally admitted to be bad, and the first thing to be done was the consolidation of the Courts of Queen's Bench, Exchequer and Common Pleas. A great deal of mischief resulted from the independent jurisdiction of these several courts. He would take the Court of Queen's Bench as an illustration of the evils which existed in the other courts. In theory these courts consisted of five Judges each, and it was supposed that four of them were sitting continuously in banco. In the Court of Queen's Bench two days in the week were set apart for new trials and motions—two for the special paper and two for the Crown paper. Now, how did the matter stand in point of fact? One of the Judges had to hear cases at Nisi Prius, and four were left to sit in banco; but it not unfrequently happened that one of them was engaged in trying cases at the Central Criminal Court, leaving only three for the general business. One of them had to leave the Court at one or two o'clock to go to Chambers, sometimes rising in the midst of an argument. His time was thus entirely wasted, and he might as well be away from the court altogether. The same thing occurred with regard to the other courts, so that three of the Judges interrupted the business of the courts in order to go to Chambers. It would be much better to have one Judge continually at Chambers. He suggested to the Government the propriety of consolidating the three courts into one. But he would go further. The consolidation of the Court of Admiralty and the Court of Probate and Divorce was contemplated. If these courts were to be consolidated he did not see why the whole of the courts should not be consolidated. If that were done there would be no necessity for additional Judges in the Common Law Courts at Westminster, and the whole business of the country might be very well discharged without any increase in the number of Judges. He was quite satisfied that there ought to be an independent court of appeal, though that might involve some increased cost. He would suggest also that there should be an alteration made in the legal year; the present system of regulating terms was totally inadequate to the purposes of the present day. He would suggest the division of the legal year into six pretty equal parts, and then these might be divided in proper proportion between the metropolis and the country at large. The business of the provinces was largely increasing. Leeds already had assizes, and Birmingham would probably insist on them. At present the Judges were required to go down to every county in England, and it seemed to be an idle thing to require the Judges and sheriffs to go to a place to hold an assize where there was not a single cause to be tried, and perhaps not more than one or two prisoners. There ought to be central districts to which parties might be brought without requiring the Judges to go to every particular place as they did now.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Sir, I thank the hon. and learned Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) for bringing this subject before the House this evening. The part of his speech to which I paid most attention was not that in which he showed that the judicial system of the Courts of Common Law had broken down, but that in which he pointed out the remedies for the evils of which he complained. It would appear from the hon. and learned Member's remarks that the panacea for the numerous defects of the Courts of Common Law is to alter the present system so as to divide the cases more equally between the different courts. The hon. and learned Member alluded to the arrears of business in the courts, and I listened in the expectation of hearing him state which of the courts was so devoid of business that it had been compelled to rise before the time allotted for the trial of its causes had expired. But, although it is true that there are large arrears in the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas only, still we find that the Court of Exchequer sat out the fourteen days allotted for its sittings at Westminster, and is likely to sit out the time allotted for the trial of its causes at Guildhall. It has been well and truly said that the Court of Exchequer will now regain its fair share of business, and it is evident that that court is not in the position in which, according to the hon. and learned Member, some of the Chancery Courts are—namely, sometimes starving, for want of work, and at other times overburdened with business. I fully admit that the state of things in the Common Law Courts is such that we cannot hope to cope with it without an increase in the judicial power. We cannot attempt to satisfy the demand which is now being so generally made for additional assizes without we have a larger judicial staff. I do not think it probable that the suggestion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer) to abolish the assizes altogether will be carried into effect. We may take it for granted that for our time, at all events, assizes will be held throughout the country, and that the number of assizes will be increased instead of diminished, and therefore Judges must be found to hold them. I am told by the hon. and learned Member for Richmond that, in order to utilize the judicial power we now possess, three Judges instead of four could sit to hear Common Law cases. All I can say in reply to that suggestion is that the 1 Will. IV., appointing the fourth Judge, was passed on the express ground that three Judges were not sufficient to form an efficient court for the decision of Common Law cases. Notwithstanding the provisions of that Act, it is rare that more than three Judges can sit together in the Common Law Courts on account of the press of business. Even if some of the defects of the courts could be remedied by a redistribution of the business so as to render it more equally divided between the courts, the difficulty would still remain of having to provide Judges for the additional assizes which are so generally called for throughout the country. The hon. and learned Member for Manchester (Mr. James) suggested the propriety of establishing throughout the country certain district courts, resembling the Central Criminal Court of London. The supposition of the hon. and learned Member was that the work of the learned Judges on assizes would be much lessened by the establishment of such courts. I may, however, remind the House that it is the almost universal practice, in order to diminish the assize business, to hold courts of quarter sessions in boroughs and counties for the trial of prisoners charged with a certain class of offences. If greater judicial power is required at the assizes, and additional Judges are not to be appointed, I think the practice that at present prevails of appointing Queen's Counsel to act as assistant Judges is far preferable to the proposition of the hon. and learned Member. The cases that come before the court presided over by the right hon. and learned Member the Recorder of London (Mr. Russell Gurney), and by the hon. and learned Member the Common Serjeant (Mr. T. Chambers), are not such as come before the courts of quarter sessions, and I do not think that the plan suggested by the hon. and learned Member would in any way relieve the Judges from the duties which are now imposed upon them. It is impossible to help feeling that, with the peremptory demand for more frequent assizes and circuits, the legal business of London and of the country cannot be carried on without the creation of additional Judges. I must say one word regarding an institution which the hon. and learned Member for Richmond looks at in a different light from what I do—I mean the Court of Exchequer Chamber. It is very easy for the hon. and learned Member to say that, in a few isolated cases, this court has broken down. But when he says that this intermediate court of appeal is useless and worse than useless, and that the wit of man never devised a more ingenious system for rendering the law uncertain, I can only say that I do not agree with him. When the hon. and learned Member was pointing out certain defects in this court, did he remember in how many cases decisions in this court are practically final? I will venture to say that in numbers of instances the parties are satisfied with the decision of this court, and so are saved the trouble and expense of appealing to the House of Lords. The Court of Exchequer Chamber, in my opinion, when properly constituted, and when having a sufficient number of Judges, will be a peculiarly good intermediate court of appeal. So far as my experience goes, which is not so great as that of my hon. and learned Friends the Attorney General and the late Attorney General, I cannot help thinking that the court of ultimate appeal is as satisfactory a court as exists. When my hon. and learned Friend says it is small, I agree with him; but I thought I heard him say that he thought the judicial constitution of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, consisting of two Judges, was satisfactory; and, as far as the Courts of Common Law are concerned, that if three sat instead of four, that would be a sufficient staff. Then I do not see why three should not be sufficient for a Court of Appeal. In a large majority of instances three men of great learning and eminence and of large experience sit in the House of Lords deciding causes. Again, I differ from my hon. and learned Friend in this, that the Court of Appeal of the House of Lords, as now constituted, is weakened or less worthy of credit because they can, by their own summons to the House of Lords, ask the whole body of Judges to sit there as assessors. I was surprised to hear him say that, because, although it may be true that a large number of those Judges who came there as assessors in certain cases may have had to consider the case on which they sat in the House of Lords before, I do not think he will say that they are so bigoted to the judgments they before announced that if, on a re-hearing of the case, they find weighty reasons to show their opinion was wrong they will not give full effect to the argument and alter that opinion. But of this I am quite certain, that there are no judgments to be found in the books so valuable as those which have been pronounced in the House of Lords after consultation with the Judges, on whose opinion, after mature deliberation, the Law Lords are entitled to act as they think proper. I will not further trespass on the attention of the House upon this question; but, though I am quite conscious that many evils are found in our present system, I cannot help wishing that my hon. and learned Friend had not only given us a more mature plan for the remedy of those evils which he states exist, but also pointed out with more clearness that the remedies he has shadowed out to-night would really meet the evils which he supposes to exist.

REDUCTION OF THE QUALIFICATION FOR THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH rose to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government mean to invite the House to come to a conclusion in favour of the reduction of the qualification for the Elective Franchise, without at the same time affording a clear indication of what that reduction is intended to be? He had no wish to throw any impediment in the way of the Government; but, understanding that Parliamentary Reform was not to be considered a party question, upon which the fate of the Ministry depended, they could now consider the question purely on its merits. The time had come when Parliamentary Reform should be treated as a broad and philosophical question, above the narrow purposes of party. They had authority for that view from the course taken by the Opposition, who, when in power in 1860, would not stake the existence of their Administration on the success of their Reform measure. The question of Reform, of course, depended upon details; much depending upon the extent to which the franchise should be extended. The Resolution referring to the proposed extension of the franchise in such a form as not to give a preponderating power to any particular class, had his entire adhesion. They might so reduce the franchise as to—

MR. SPEAKER here interrupted the hon. Gentleman, reminding him that, although he was in order in asking a Question as to the form of proceeding, he was not in order in entering on the question of Reform, or the particular Resolutions which stood for discussion on Monday next.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH resumed. The Resolutions appeared to him to be open to very much the same objections which were levelled against the proceedings of the late Administration last year. They were told then that they were asked to make a leap in the dark, which he thought was just the case with these Resolutions. They were told then the Government should treat the House with perfect frankness, and it struck him that the Resolutions were open to the same form of criticism. They were told then that Resolutions might involve a precipitate decision of the House, as they had no second and third readings in which the House could retrace its steps if in error, and that was the same with regard to these Resolutions. [Cries of "Question!"]

MR. SPEAKER again interfered, recommending the hon. Gentleman to proceed to the Question of which he had given notice.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would not occupy the House further, but at once put the Question which stood in his name.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: It is not more than ten days since I came down to the House to suggest that on this subject it was, in the opinion of the Government, expedient that we should proceed by way of Resolution; and when I made that proposition I was very doubtful whether the House would accept it. Formally, it is not even now accepted, although, I believe, I may infer from the declarations which have been made that the House will not refuse the Government that form of procedure. Sir, I will not refer to the nature of the Resolutions that I have put on the table, although my hon. Friend referred to them so amply. I will merely say that the object of those Resolutions was to express certain principles on which the Government wished to proceed, and that we laid them on the table in order that hon. Gentlemen might have the opportunity of considering those principles, and applying them in the manner which they might think most expedient; and in that process they often arrive at this salutary result, that many applications of those principles in detail which at first blush they thought unanswerable and expedient, upon reflection they find to be impracticable and even absurd. When they arrive at that conclusion, after a certain time for consideration has elapsed, they may come then to the interpretation which the Government put upon the Resolutions, and with a disposition more calculated to give an impartial consideration to the propositions of the Government. Sir, I do not think that the time the Government have proposed for the consideration of the Resolutions was extreme, and I do not think the House will think it unreasonable. In two or three days the House will be asked to form itself in Committee to take the Resolutions into consideration; and, of course, it will be my duty, in accordance with the custom of Parliament, before I ask the opinion of the House upon them, to show the manner in which, in their opinion, the Government think those principles should be applied. That, I think, is the Parliamentary and proper system. In the course of the last ten days a great many Questions have been asked of me by Members of this House. I have taken note of those questions, and at the right time, and in due season, those questions will be answered. I have also taken note of the Question of my hon. Friend, and that also will receive an answer.

APPROACHES TO THE HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DAVENPORT BROMLEY rose to call the attention of the First Commissioner of Public Works to the condition of the streets in the vicinity of Palace Yard. The state of affairs outside Palace Yard was not quite so satisfactory as it might be. He should be inclined, if he were not in that House, to call it—and if he were outside that House he would call it—if not atrocious, at all events disgraceful, and ludicrously inconvenient. He wished, therefore, to call the attention of the noble Lord to Sessional Order No. 8, issued on the 10th February last, to the effect that the Commissioners of Metropolitan Police should take care that the passages and thoroughfares leading to the Houses of Parliament were kept free and open, so as that no obstruction should be offered to Members going to and from the House. Let them imagine what would be the position of some Gentleman who had asked some distinguished foreigner to come down and see that House. Possibly that distinguished foreigner might wish to see the interior of the House and the working of that administrative assembly, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer told them would bear comparison with any assembly in the world, whilst the gentlemen of the Reform League told them it was an assembly of bad characters, and filled with men who had humpbacks, and one eye only each. The distinguished foreigner might get with facility as far on his journey as Trafalgar Square, when his nerves would derive their first shock from a sight of the national cruet-stand—he might recover a little afterwards at the sight of Landseer's lions, which he might wish, however, had somewhat larger pedestals. He would then get a distinct glimpse of the towers of the Houses of Parliament, and would, of course, expect something grand, but when he came to the final crossing, unless a man of strong nerve, he would probably wish himself at home again. The guardian policeman, however, extending to him the last privilege remaining to a Member of this House, assists him over, like an Israelite crossing the Red Sea, with a wall of arrested traffic on the right hand and on the left. He would then see a state of things not to be surpassed by any gold diggings or oil city in the world. He would see a huge hole which had lately been filled up. It had been filled up suddenly like the hole in the Roman Forum. Perhaps Her Majesty's Ministers had induced some heroic and patriotic Member to jump in and settle the Reform question. Beyond this, the distinguished foreigner would see a low hoarding, on which was stuck a placard, intimating that the whole territory belonged to the Metropolitan District Railway Company, a steam-engine, which puffed perpetually into the faces of bystanders, and, a little further on, he would meet with that mysterious and solemn interrogatory—that awful question to which no one in this House or out of it was ever able to furnish a reply—"Who's Griffiths?" A friend of his (Mr. Bromley's), who fortunately was a good horseman, was passing by on horseback, when a blast from the steam-engine caused his horse to swerve so much as completely to destroy the equanimity of one cab and cause it to cannon against another, thus creating a great disturbance and interruption of traffic. That gentleman, who was much attached to all the venerable institutions of the country, exclaimed, almost with tears in his eyes, and his voice quivering with emotion, "Only conceive, if I had been a Bishop." Carrying one's eyes further back, there was observable—he did not know what. People said it was to be a fountain, or some other sort of pump; and Canning's statue stood there, turning up its nose at all the disagreeable sights and smells. With regard to the railway that was being excavated in the immediate vicinity of the House, he regretted that the Bill for that line had been passed. He believed it would shake the foundations of Westminster Abbey—and that Westminster Hospital, within a few yards of which it passed, would be rendered untenable, as far as the comfort of the patients was concerned, when the railway was in operation. It had left neither the dead nor the living at rest, for he was told that the bones of our ancestors had been removed, from the burial ground near the Abbey, to Woking Cemetery. He wondered it had not struck the directors that Westminster Hall would make a good terminus or refreshment-room. In fact, whenever he heard of metropolitan improvements, he shuddered, and he might say that he entertained the greatest dread of that inscrutable body—the Board of Works. He was told that the railway was waiting for the Thames Embankment, and the Thames Embankment was waiting for the railway; and so between them they came to a dead-lock. The Thames Embankment was doing nothing, had done nothing, and intended to do nothing, and the authors of a report recently issued congratulated themselves on their having done nothing. He looked over the bridge the other day, and saw eight men and a boy at work. It was difficult, in these cases, to pitch upon the right man to blame; but, generally speaking, the works in connection with that House and the neighbourhood had been carried on, according to the national practice, in the most dilatory manner. That House had been very nearly as long in building as the Temple of Jerusalem—and his belief was that it never would be completed. In conclusion, he begged to call the attention of the First Commissioner of Public Works to the notice he had put upon the paper.

QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury for a further explanation of the sums required for particular items in the approaching Paris Exhibition. He said the hour was late, and the House exhausted, and Members might take his word that, not being a lawyer, he would not occupy two hours in saying what could be said in a few minutes. If any excuse were wanted for bringing the matter forward, it was to be found in the language of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury the other night, who said that when this Vote was first brought before him, his feelings were first those of surprise, then of indignation, and lastly of resignation. When the Secretary to the Treasury, a man who was known to be not generally moved by the common emotions of the human heart, spoke officially in that way, the subject must indeed be one demanding the grave consideration of the House. The question before them was, in reality, nothing more nor less than this—whether the House was to have any voice or control over the public expenditure. This was a subject on which he had heard Chancellors of the Exchequer lecture in former years. He had heard them complain that the House was neglectful of the public interests. Although there were a few Members who said that this matter must be passed sub silentio, because it concerned a foreign Government, he believed there was enough public spirit left in the House, even at so late an hour, to endeavour to exercise some control over the public expenditure. What was the history of this Vote of £116,000? It was a curious fact that no detailed Estimate for this sum had ever been laid before the House. The history began with the constitution of the Royal Commission on May 2, 1865; and the Commission directed that the Estimates were to be laid before the House, and were to be managed through the Department of Science and Art. The Estimates never had been laid before the House. The Commission was constituted originally of eighty-four Members, including twenty Peers and twenty Members of that House, and eighteen gentlemen were afterwards added, which made a total of 102. It was said that the Commission was not composed of men of business, but many men of business were on it. Members of that House and of the other House were on the Commission, and they might be said to be in most senses innocent of science and incapable of art. This Commission was, in fact, a mere ornamental Commission. The hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent was a member of it, and he had already told them what its duties were. The Commission met once in about two months, some thirty gentlemen sat round a table, and they discussed nothing, but some unseen hand prepared resolutions, and, he believed, it was that of their trusted and well-beloved Henry Cole. The Commissioners discussed nothing, but it passed whatever was laid before it. What was every man's business, was no man's responsibility, and to that minute they did not know on whom responsibility rested or by whose direction the money had been spent. In June, 1865, the House was called upon to vote £5,000 for "preliminary expenses" on account of the management of the British department of the Universal Exhibition at Paris for 1867. That £5,000 was voted as a matter of course; it excited no curiosity. The next Vote was one of £12,000 in 1866, again for preliminary expenses; and that also passed without remark. But the other night the House was taken by surprise, by seeing a sum of £50,000 included among other things in the Supplementary Estimates, not for "preliminary expenses" but with real business connected with the Exhibition. Some little discussion then occurred, and the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Hunt) was kind enough to give them, for the first time, the estimates for this Exhibition. In the previous Paris Exhibition an Estimate was laid before the House in 1854. The House voted £50,000, and strange to say only £41,000 was spent, and the remaining £9,000 was returned to the Exchequer—a great contrast to our present management. The estimates now given by the officers of the Department of Science and Art included these items:—For internal fittings, £16,100; supplemental buildings and park, £23,065; ancient and modern art, £11,050; and management, £14,755. Respecting this management they were entitled to full explanations. He understood that a house was taken at the Champs Elysées, which made up about forty beds, and that there were forty-seven secretaries to this Commission. The next item was one of £17,190 for house and office expenses. Now, he should like to know what were the salaries given to the forty-seven secretaries, and especially how much was given to "their trusty and well-beloved Henry Cole." Then there came another very singular item of £8,250 for freight, which brought the House to a very curious consideration. He wished to know whether it was true that it was designed by the Commission that there should be an exhibition of blue books in Paris. [Laughter.] The House might laugh, but he had been informed by the Librarian of that House that that officer had received an intimation that it was the wish of the Commission that all the blue books and all the Parliamentary publications of that House and of the House of Lords should be sent to Paris to be exhibited. He believed it was only through the exertions of their respected Speaker that this profligate waste of money had been controlled, and that only a few specimens of the blue books were to be exhibited. If this extravagant, lavish, and foolish expenditure was to go on in this way, where was it to stop? Then there was another item which he did not understand. "Royal Commission," it said, for these 102 gentlemen, £2,750. There was no explanation given of that. Then there came another, and, he thought, a most extraordinary item—namely, "Exhibition of implements of war, £11,490." Now, that was a very contradiction to the title of the Exhibition, which was instituted as an "Exhibition of works of industry and agriculture, as well as of the Fine Arts." But some evil genius on the Commission seemed to have suggested an exhibition of implements of war, and accordingly the expenditure would be enormous, because all the largest bits of ordnance which this country had produced were about to be sent to this peaceful Exhibition at Paris. He thought it was time for the House to step in and say, "We have no objection to cultivate the arts of peace, and even to send you a few blue books; but to send big guns into the bargain is not only ridiculous, but a waste of money." In the former Exhibitions, both in Paris and London, the jurors were not paid, but were thankful for a bronze medal; but here there was a grant of £12,000 for jurors. He had been so struck with this grant that he looked into the original constitution of the system of jurors, and he found that on the 26th of June, 1866, the number of Jurors for England and Ireland was eighty-five only. Now, a gentleman, who had lately been appointed a juror, informed him that each juror was to receive £50, so that these eighty-five gentlemen would receive £4,250. He should like to know what was going to be done with the rest of the £12,000? These were matters requiring explanation, for, though only £116,000 was asked for, it was well known that that would only carry them on to the opening of the Exhibition, but when it was closed his hon. Friend—and he hoped he would then be on the Treasury Bench, because he was so efficient—would be asking for another £50,000 or £60,000, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer would say, that unless hon. Members wished to imperil the peaceful relations between the two countries they must agree to his Vote. For his own part, he had no wish to stand in the way of a grant of anything reasonable and proper; but while he held a seat in the House he hoped the House would assist him when he exposed lavish expenditure and equally lavish waste.

MR. BRUCE said, that having been under the late Government a Member of that Department which was immediately responsible for the outlay of sums granted towards the expenditure on the Paris Exhibition, the House would perhaps allow him to make an explanation respecting the state of our relations with the French Commissioners up to June last. In March, 1865, the Science and Art Department applied to the Treasury for a sum of £50,000 towards the expenses of the forthcoming Exhibition, in which this country had been invited by the Emperor of the French to take part. The reason why that sum was asked for was that a similar sum had been granted in 1855; and although the £9,000 had then been returned to the Treasury, there was reason to believe that the arrangements would be on a much larger scale in 1867, and that consequently more money would be required. The then Secretary to the Treasury, Mr. Peel, adverted to the fact that the whole sum of £50,000 had not been expended in 1855, and proposed that a somewhat smaller sum—£45,000—should be granted. The reply to him was that it was impossible to estimate, at that time, what the whole expenditure would be, but that there was a probability that it would exceed the previous expenditure. The sum of £5,000 was taken that year for preliminary expenses. In January, 1866, it became necessary to consider what would be required for the current financial year, and an estimate of £12,000 was thought to be sufficient. But, that being so, the House might ask how it was that before the year had expired a further sum of £50,000 had been asked for, and he would explain the reasons of this large difference between the first estimate and the second. It was not till February, 1866, a month after the estimates had been sent in, that the Commission first became aware of the different principles under which the French Government proposed to carry on this great Exhibition. From that time to the month of May there was an unceasing struggle with the French Commissioners to resist demands which would inevitably lead to an expenditure far exceeding the sum spent in 1855. He might mention that the French Commissioners made demands for expenditure upon every possible object, except the mere shell of the building—upon the flooring, the partitions, the places on which the articles were to be exhibited, even on the very roads from the Seine up to the Exhibition. A large building in the gardens was also required for the exhibition of marine and military engines, and a house had to be erected. On the 8th of May, 1866, the Secretary of the Science and Art Department, by the direction of the Lord President, addressed a serious letter on this subject to the managing Commissioner of the French Exhibition. In that letter he stated, that although they had made demands upon exhibitors entirely different from anything asked by this country, or by the French themselves in 1855, yet there might be some show of reason in asking manufacturers, who, in sending their manufactures for exhibition, might have a view to profit, to contribute to the expenses of the Exhibition. It was pointed out, however, that the case was entirely altered when gentlemen were requested to send over works of art, and that gentlemen who did so ought not to be expected to defray the cost of conveyance, and packing and unpacking. The managing Commissioner of the French Exhibition was informed that it was the opinion of Lord Granville that the matter ought to be brought under the notice of the French Minister, M. Rouher, and that, in the event of his insisting on these conditions being complied with, a formal communication to that effect ought to be drawn up with a view to its being laid before Parliament, as furnishing the explanation why a Vote so much in excess of that which had been demanded, or thought possible, was required. No direct answer to that letter was received; but he might say that, up to the period when the late Government went out of office, no concession to these unexpected demands had been made, except that it was agreed that the Admiralty should incur a certain expenditure in landing machinery at the Seine. He entirely agreed with what the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Osborne) had said as to sending implements of war to the Exhibition. Indeed, the Commissioners of this country came unanimously to the conclusion that as this was to be an exhibition of articles of peace, munitions of war ought not to be sent to it; but on its being found that all the other nations of Europe—France and Austria especially—were going to exhibit munitions of war, it was considered that it would be ungracious if this country did not show what she possessed. ["No, no!"] As to no detailed estimate having been laid before the House at an early period, it must be borne in mind that the scheme had been growing greater day by day, and it was therefore impossible for the Department of Science and Art to say what it would be called upon to contribute. The space allotted to British exhibitors was twice as large as it had been on the last occasion, and he might mention that his hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, who had so severely criticized the proceedings of the Department, had demanded, on behalf of the Architectural Society, of which he was President, not less than 110,000 square feet, which was one-third of the whole space allocated to British exhibitors. He had stated how the case stood up to the resignation of the late Government, which occurred at a most critical period in the history of the Exhibition, because it would have been their duty to decide what course they ought to take; whether, on the one hand, to imperil the success of the Exhibition, and inflict a blow on the pride of the French nation, or, on the other, to incur an expense altogether unprecedented, and to which they themselves strongly objected. In this dilemma the present Government succeeded to office, and it was they who were responsible, since the late Government had not authorized any expenditure which departed from the precedent of the previous Exhibition. He did not wish to throw any censure upon the Government, as their position was one of extreme difficulty. Much blame had been unjustly imputed to public servants during this discussion, and in order that Parliament and the country might be fully informed as to the real facts of the case, he had that night given notice that he would on the following Tuesday move for the Correspondence on the subject between the Department of Science and Art and the Treasury, and with the French Commissioners referring to expenditure.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, having been so pointedly alluded to by his right hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydvil, felt bound to explain that his large demand for space, on the part of the Institute of Architects, which he had urged, arose in this way. Very early in the day that Institute was anxious to bring together a large exhibition of works of industrial art cognate with architecture. The Executive Commission asked him how much space they would require. Their reply was, as much as the Commission was prepared to yield them. To this the Executive did not seem to demur, and they conceived they were only carrying out an intimation which they had received from it, when, in order to "regularise" their application, they put in a colourable figure, just as a man put £1,000 on his dog when he sent it to a dog show, and did not wish to part with it. This meant that they were ready to use any space which might in reason be allotted to them. From that day forward, however, when the Executive was out of temper with them, which was not unusual, they had this thrown in their teeth, though the real cause of all the difficulty had been the unconscionable time during which they had been kept waiting.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE hoped some explanation would be given satisfactory to the House and the country. He hoped some answer would be given with respect to the expenditure for jurors. The sum charged was £12,000. There were eighty-five jurors at £50 each. What was to be done with the difference?

MR. HUNT said, that no Member of the Government would complain of the jealousy shown by the House with regard to the sums asked for the Exhibition. It was the wish of the Government to give the information asked for in the best possible way, but the most convenient mode of doing so would be as he stated a few days ago. In the Estimates of 1867-8 there should be a full account respecting the various sums, and he believed the Estimates would be in the hands of Members in a few days.

MR. DILLWYN asked whether the implements of war had been as yet sent, or whether there was time to stop them?

MR. CORRY said, they had not been sent yet.

MR. OSBORNE gave notice of his intention to move on an early day that the implements of war should not be sent.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) ACT CONTINUANCE BILL. (Lord Naas, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

[BILL 35.] COMMITTEE.

MR. BAGWELL moved to add after Clause 1, the following:—

"That all prisoners in confinement at present under the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant by virtue of the power of the first recited Act, or who shall hereafter be arrested and committed to prison in pursuance of the same or of this Act, shall be deemed in all respects untried prisoners, and shall be treated as regards diet, clothing, exercise, and communication with friends, in the manner prescribed for actual prisoners in the several prison Acts now in force in Ireland."

It was true that considerable care had been taken of the persons arrested under the Act, but there had been cases of very great hardship. In Mountjoy Prison those prisoners were confined in separate cells; they were never taken out for exercise, and did not see the light of Heaven from one week's end to the other. He complained that there was no provision made by law to prevent persons taken up—as most of the prisoners had been taken up—on suspicion only, of being so treated. The admirable statement of the Secretary of Ireland of the number released and of the number in custody showed that the great majority had been arrested on suspicion only. He had no sympathy with these men, but he objected to the violation of a great principle of British law.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER seconded the Motion, which involved a most important principle of Constitutional law—namely, that no man should be punished until he had been convicted of an offence. This was a principle which, though acknowledged in theory, was not sufficiently carried out in practice in this country, and certainly not in Ireland, where he trusted it would now be carried out.

LORD NAAS said, he was afraid that in agreeing to the second reading of this Bill the House had consented to a departure from the principles of the British Constitution, and he was sorry that it had been his duty to ask them to do so. The Government had already done what his hon. Friend by his clause sought to have done. The strictest rule had been laid down with respect to the treatment of those prisoners. That rule was simply this—that they were to be treated in every respect as untried prisoners. And that rule was in every respect carried out. It was utterly impossible to keep them in Mountjoy Prison in association. In the best managed prisons—such as the one at Belfast, for instance—every untried prisoner was kept in separate confinement. This rule was carried out as far as possible in all gaols conducted on the new system, in order to keep the unconvicted from being contaminated by criminals. Formerly, the great blot on our prison management was the system of day rooms, which made our prisons colleges of crime, owing to young offenders being brought into constant contact with hardened felons. To keep the prisoners separate in Mountjoy Prison was necessary for the purposes of discipline. It was also indispensable for their safe keeping. He was sorry to say there was reason to believe that many of the persons arrested and sent there under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act were violent and bad characters; and it would be highly dangerous to allow them to associate in a body. They were, however, allowed to wear their own clothes and to receive food which was bought and paid for by their friends outside. They were visited daily by the chaplain and by the warder, and were allowed books. Beyond separate confinement they were placed under no restraint. As insinuations had been thrown out respecting the treatment of those prisoners, the late Government directed their attention to the matter as far back as last March, and at that time Captain Barlow reported—

“I was present at the male prison, Mountjoy, when — saw several of the untried prisoners. When leaving the prison,—informed me that F. L., whom he states to be a very intelligent man, had spoken very highly of the kindness with which he was treated. —added the treatment of the prisoners was very satisfactory to him.”

That was last year; but Mr. Murray, the Director, reported to-day—

“I have read every letter written by or addressed to the untried prisoners at Mountjoy Convict Prison, and I have never made any complaint of the treatment except in a few cases, in which association was wished for. In fact, the prisoners have repeatedly written to their friends, expressing great satisfaction at the treatment and the food. —very lately told me that he had every reason to be satisfied with the treatment of the prisoners. The prisoners, when leaving the gaol, have invariably thanked the Governor for the kindness extended to them, and at the same time expressions of thanks have been addressed to me.”

If the House wished it he could read extracts from letters written by prisoners themselves, which bore out those statements, and which showed that every indulgence, consistent with discipline and safety, had been extended to them. He had that day carefully examined all the Prison Acts, and found that they contained no provisions with respect to the treatment of untried prisoners, so that this was entirely a matter of regulation. He could only say that it was not the wish of the Government that these persons should be subjected to hardship or unnecessary severity; and that if any instance of the kind were brought to his knowledge, he would not fail to inquire closely into it.

MR. BLAKE: The hon. Member for Clonmel should press the Motion to a division, which he deserves great credit for bringing forward and so ably advocating, unless the Government consented to its adoption. The Chief Secretary said there was no necessity for it, as the prisoners under the law, as it then stood, would be treated as untried. No doubt they were entitled to be so treated; but judging by what occurred in several cases he would cite in reference to Fenian “suspects,” he believed it was very necessary to impress the subordinates of the Government with the fact that they would not be justified in treating men not only unconvicted, but even uncharged with any crime, as if they were guilty. If the Irish Executive could themselves see their intentions carried out, he would have no apprehensions that persons arrested under the Lord Lieutenant’s warrant would be treated in an unexceptionally severe manner; but when the prisoners fell into the hands of underlings, who might be over-zealous in the cause of law and order, he much feared that restrictions and even severities might be inflicted neither justified by law or necessity, or contemplated by the Government. The late Administration, he believed, was just as well disposed to act right as the present one in the matter, and yet things were done in their name, and with perfect impunity, by their own officers, in reference to prisoners arrested under the Act the House was now asked to renew, as illegal, unjustifiable, and, he might add, as cruel as anything stated to have occurred in Austrian or Neapolitan prisons, about which the late leader of the House discoursed so very feelingly and eloquently. Now, he did not want the House to take his ipse dixit for all this; he would prove it by official Returns, and by the admissions of the Irish Executive. From these documents, it would appear that the treatment that "suspects" had been subjected to in some places was most unjustifiable. He would confine himself to the instances of Waterford, Limerick, and Cork, in all of which places it was proved to the House, by official documents and other testimony equally good, that men suspected of Fenianism were, until the matter was exposed in the House, treated worse than if they were convicted of heinous crimes. At Waterford the stipendiary magistrate, outstepping his duty (and when the prisoners had legally passed out of his control), directed certain restrictions to be placed on them, contrary to law and local regulations, which directions, with equal impropriety, were carried into effect by the local inspector. He would read a few extracts from the Return, which, he was sure, would quite delight the hon. Member for Dungannon (Major Knox), who, in his speech of yesterday, appeared so anxious that no leniency should be shown even to those who were only suspected. Hang first and try afterwards appeared to be the rule which many in that House and out of it would apply to anyone charged with Fenianism before any proof was given of their guilt. On the 20th of February, 1866, the local inspector at Waterford wrote to the Inspectors General of Prisons—

"Under these circumstances the Governor has applied to me to know whether prisoners committed under the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act for no definite period, and awaiting Her Majesty's pleasure, should be treated as convicted prisoners, that is, given the gaol allowance of food and the gaol clothing. The Governor and myself would feel much more easy if these prisoners were treated as convicted men, when such instances as quoted above could not take place."

The Inspectors General replied, 21st of February, that the prisoners ought to be treated as untried, such being the opinion of the Law Adviser of the Crown. The local inspector, however, in the face of this, preferred, as appears from the following, to obey the behests of the stipendiary magistrate:—

"Waterford Gaol, March 12, 1866.

"In reply to your letter of yesterday's date, giving cover to a notice of Motion of Mr. Blake's regarding the treatment of certain prisoners confined in the Waterford Gaol, I have the honour to state that the only restrictions to which the prisoners arrested under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act are subjected, different from those of ordinary prisoners, are in the following instances:—No intercourse with visitors outside. No interviews with legal advisers. Specifications to the above effect were given to the local inspector and Governor by the resident magistrate, Mr. Goold, and have been enforced."

Mr. Goold, the stipendiary, it would appear by the inspector's letter, reigned paramount for some weeks, his directions being adopted in preference to Acts of Parliament, the opinion of the Law Adviser of the Crown, and the advice of the Inspectors General of Prisons. The following speaks for itself:—

"Waterford Gaol, 14th March, 1866.

"Since the committal to the gaol of Waterford of the prisoners (sixteen in number), arrested under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, no visitors or legal advisers have been allowed to see them, though they have frequently applied for the indulgence, the resident magistrate, Mr. Goold, having directed the Governor and myself that no intercourse should be permitted between these prisoners and their relatives or friends outside."

This state of things went on until the 19th of March, he (Mr. Blake) having in the meantime called for Returns, and given notice of his intention to bring the matter before the House. On the 19th of March the Board of Superintendence, for the first time, thought it well to consider the matter and do their duty by taking the matter out of the hands of the stipendiary magistrate and local inspector, and directed that the prisoners should be treated in a legal manner. Mr. Blake detailed at some length the restrictions to which the Waterford prisons were subjected, and stated that when he first brought the matter before the House, that the Attorney General challenged the accuracy of his statements; but, to his credit, granted him Returns to enable him to vindicate them, which, when produced, he had to admit that the stipendiary magistrate had not done right, and yet he believed the conduct of that official had been otherwise passed over. The hon. Member having given an example in the treatment of a baker arrested under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant, in a town near Waterford, said these things had happened, and there was no guarantee that they would not happen again. Every precaution ought to be taken to prevent such outrages on law and propriety, and in no way this better suggested itself than to place on the face of the Bill, then about to pass, the record of the House, that untried men should not be deprived of the rights which still remained to them, though the constitution was suspended as regarded their personal liberty. He appealed strongly to the Government to allow the Amendment of the hon. Member for Clonmel to pass. It gave those who might be arrested not one privilege more than they now possessed, but it reaffirmed an important principle, and might have the effect of saving unfortunate men from the hardships which might be inflicted on them by over-zealous fools or petty tyrants, who would, if the clause were inserted, be unable to plead ignorance or necessity as an excuse for oppressing those having the misfortune of being placed in their power.

Mr. LAWSON suggested that under the Prison Act there were two classes of prisoners—those committed for trial and those who were convicted. Now the prisoners committed under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant did not belong to either of these classes. The late Government intimated that they ought to be treated as untried prisoners, and ought not to be subject to any discipline except what was necessary for their safety. It struck him that if the latter part of the clause were left out after "untried prisoners," that would leave the action of the local gaols unfettered.

After a few words from Major KNOX and Mr. O'BEIRNE,

LORD NAAS said, he understood the prisoners at Waterford were treated as untried prisoners.

Mr. BLAKE denied that this was the case. They were subjected to restrictions in regard to exercise, to communicating with their legal advisers, seeing their friends, and the supply of books.

LORD NAAS said, in that case the officers of the prison had acted illegally, and were guilty of a breach of the law. If his hon. Friend would agree to stop at the words "untried prisoners," and insert the words "so long as they are in confinement" after the word "deemed," he had no objection to the clause.

Clause, as amended, added to the Bill.

Mr. CRUM-EWING urged on the Government the necessity of taking steps to induce other countries to adopt the new arrangements in this matter simultaneously with this country, in order that the British trade might not suffer disadvantage.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Belgian Government had already signified its assent to join in the carrying out of the Convention, if the other powers did so, and within the last half hour they had received a telegram stating that the French Government had also given its assent. By Monday next he hoped to receive similar news from Holland. There would be no want of activity shown by Her Majesty's Government in this matter.

AGRICULTURAL GANGS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: As I see the noble Lord the Under Secretary for the Home Department in his place, I will take this opportunity of asking him a Question. It will be in the recollection of your Lordships that about a year and a half ago I moved in this House an Address praying that the inquiry of the Commission appointed to inquire into the employment of children and young persons in trades and manufactures not already regulated by law might be extended to an abuse of which we had heard a great deal, called agricultural gangs, it appearing that gangs of children were hired out to work like slaves in the county of Lincoln and other counties adjacent. I am anxious to know, Whether the Report of the Commission has been made; and, if so, whether it will soon be presented to the House? I understand the Report will contain facts which will throw much light upon the question as to whether the principle of the Factory Acts may not, with certain modifications, be applied to the children in the agricultural districts. This matter is of great importance at the present time, in consequence of a measure for the extension of the Factory Acts having been introduced in the House of Commons.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: In reply to the noble Earl, I have to state that the Report has not yet been received at the Home Office; but I have made inquiries on the subject, and have ascertained that there is every reason to expect that it will be received very shortly. The delay has occurred in consequence of the nature of the inquiry and the extensive field over which it ranged.

STANDING ORDER 182. AMENDED.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving an addition to the Standing Order No. 182, said, it would be necessary for him to make some explanation of the circumstances under which it became necessary to make the proposed alteration. In 1862-3 the Midland Railway Company obtained an Act to extend their line into London, and by that Act they were empowered to construct a bridge over a part of the churchyard of St. Pancras. In 1864 they obtained another Act, empowering them to construct a tunnel under St. Pancras churchyard, on condition, however, that the top of the tunnel should be twelve feet at least from the surface of the ground. In the course of last year the attention of the then Secretary of State was called to the method in which the Midland Railway Company were exercising their powers. A complaint was made that there had been a great disturbance of remains in the churchyard of St. Giles which was situated in the parish of St. Pancras. A memorial on the subject was also presented to the Board of Health. A gentleman also complained that his late father-in-law's grave, which was sixteen feet deep, was in that part of the churchyard of St. Pancras under which the tunnel was to be made, and as the top of the tunnel was to be within twelve feet of the surface of ground, the grave would be cut away from below. Sir George Grey had caused an inspection to be made, and from the Inspector's Report it appeared that the Company's engineer was in consultation with the advisers of the Bishop of London and the officer of the Health of the District, as to the safest mode of procedure to be adopted. In the month of December complaint was again made by an hon. Member of the House of Commons that the Company were making an open cutting in excess of their powers through St. Pancras churchyard, thereby disturbing a large number of bodies, and remains of bodies, and which he estimated at 10,000. Mr. Walpole caused another inspection to be made, and the Inspector (Mr. Holland) reported that a very great disturbance of remains had no doubt taken place—probably more than was contemplated by the Select Committee of the House of Commons; and that the Company were advised that they were not acting in excess of their powers. Under the circumstances, perhaps the method by which they were proceeding was less dangerous than that originally proposed; and he went on to say—

"The Incumbent, who was naturally very indignant at the indecent manner in which the navvies, who were at first employed, were hacking the coffins to pieces and throwing the bones about, now expresses himself quite satisfied at the respectful manner with which the remains of the dead are treated, and with the great pains taken to do a very improper thing with as little impropriety as possible; and Dr. Hillier and his assistants say that the officers of the company are not merely willing, but most anxious, to do everything he had suggested, both to guard against danger and avoid exciting alarm or giving cause for complaint."

The Earl of Belmore

Now, it might be very necessary that in some instances a railway should be made through a burial ground; but it was a matter of great delicacy, and it therefore appeared to be desirable that Committees in granting such a power should have the fullest information before them. The machinery for obtaining that information without much expense existed at the Home Office, and Mr. Walpole therefore had concluded that, with that object in view, an addition to the Standing Order should be proposed in both Houses of Parliament. He therefore moved—

Where in any Bill Application is made for Powers to take any Churchyard, Burial Ground, or Cemetery, or to disturb the Bodies interred therein, there shall be deposited at the Office of the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Copy of all Plans, Sections, and Books of Reference required by the Orders of the House to be deposited in the Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments, so far as such Plans, Sections, and Books of Reference relate to the Churchyard, Burial Ground, or Cemetery to be so taken, together with a Copy of the Notice published in the Gazette of the intended Application to Parliament; and also a printed Copy of the Bill at the same Times when such Plans, Sections, Books of Reference, and Notice and such Bill are required to be deposited in the Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments; and any Report made under the Authority of the said Secretary of State shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill.—
(The Earl of Belmore.)

Agreed to; and Standing Order, as amended, to be printed and published. (No. 26.)

HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENSION (IRELAND) ACT CONTINUANCE BILL—(No. 24.)

SECOND READING. THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, in moving the second reading of this Bill I do not feel it necessary to enter at any very considerable length into the reasons which make it necessary for Her Majesty's Government to apply to Parliament for a continuance of the extraordinary powers with which the Executive is now invested. The state of affairs in Ireland is so well known, and the circumstances have been so plainly brought before us by recent events, that I feel I ought rather to make an apology to your Lordships for the Government having held out in the Speech from the Throne the delusive hope that we should have been able at an early period during the present Session to return to the ordinary course of the law. In asking your Lordships to renew the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act in Ireland, we ask to continue a policy which was adopted by the late Government, which was accepted unanimously by Parliament, which has been continued now for nearly a year, and of which, under recent events, we feel it an imperative duty to propose the continuance for the shortest possible period, during which you will be able to judge whether it will be necessary to continue it for a further period. I am sure your Lordships will agree with the Motion I have to make, and not refuse the Government a power which in the present state of Ireland they believe to be necessary. Indeed, it is hardly necessary to apologize for the Bill, inasmuch as the House of Commons unanimously—without a single dissentient voice—have agreed to the continuance of the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act. It is, no doubt, my duty to show to your Lordships that the powers given to us under the Bill of last year have not been exercised in an arbitrary or oppressive manner. On the contrary, it has been the object of the Government to relax as much as possible the severity of these powers; and I may add that, so far from the measure being regarded as arbitrary and oppressive by well-disposed persons they look upon it as one which affords them a protection, of which they stand in the greatest need, and a relief from very serious difficulties. If we had to deal with the native resident population of Ireland, a measure of this kind would be absolutely unnecessary; for, although they are easily prejudiced—although they will listen to anything that holds out a prospect of excitement—I believe that in the main they are thoroughly and entirely loyal. I will take the opportunity of quoting a very remarkable charge addressed a few days ago to the Grand Jury of the county of Limerick by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald. The learned Judge said—

“I may congratulate you on the fact that this county, with its quarter of a million of inhabitants, may compare advantageously as regards crime with any other in Her Majesty’s dominions. None of the cases which are to be submitted to you call for any special observations from me. It seems, therefore, that the county is in a most peaceful state, life is secure, property is respected, and the law is enforced against offenders. Under ordinary circumstances it would be my pleasing duty to dismiss you with the congratulation I have addressed to you on the peaceful state of the county. It is, however, my duty further to observe that it has been found necessary by the Government to propose a further extension of the extraordinary powers with which Parliament has in its wisdom invested the Executive. You may agree with me in thinking that there is no cause for real apprehension for the safety of the country; but it is difficult to exaggerate the evils that the state of insecurity which has been produced by the acts of foreign incendiaries has brought upon the country. The great mass of the population is loyal at heart, but there is a feeling of insecurity—property is impaired in value, industry of all kinds is discouraged, and people are flying from the country, we may think without any just cause. I hope, gentlemen, that I am not exceeding the duties of my position when I say that, though the Government may employ repressive measures, yet the preventive and curative remedies are in your hands. The law which with its ordinary powers is administered by you as magistrates can do a great deal towards curing the ills of the country. You can do much by your magic presence. There should be no panic; each magistrate should stay at his post, and do his duty in his own neighbourhood. The clergy of all denominations are with us. The hierarchy of all Churches have denounced this insane and wretched movement. Every owner of property, every man of education or intelligence, every representative of industry, and even every small farmer is opposed to it. I failed to perceive, when I was judicially engaged in those matters, that anyone belonging to any of those classes was engaged in the conspiracy—none but men who have nothing to lose, aided by foreign incendiaries. Of course, when I alluded to the extraordinary powers which have been conferred upon the Government, I referred to the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, which I, for one, regard with approval, while I sincerely regret the circumstances which have rendered necessary a measure so at variance with the principles on which our Constitution is founded. All classes in the country are deeply interested in the preservation of peace and order, and in the removal of the circumstances which have made us a byword in Europe, and I have endeavoured to show that this result must be attained by our own exertions. I may conclude by saying that I believe that this Fenian conspiracy is really as abortive and unsubstantial as the ridiculous attempt at an insurrection which has recently taken place in an adjoining county.”

Now, my Lords, there is not a single word of that address, coming as it does from so impartial a quarter, to which I do not give my hearty and entire concurrence. It has been asked how is it, if the people of Ireland are so loyal as they are represented to be—if they have so little sympathy with the parties to this miserable insurrection—that none of the persons engaged in this rising have been arrested and brought to justice by the peasantry? I think the answer is very simple. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) and other noble Lords who are listening to me know that if there be one feeling in the Irish mind stronger than another it is hatred of the name of informer, and however atrocious the crime, however great the delinquency may be, the notion of the people is that if they came forward, brought the guilty to justice, and gave evidence in support of the law, they would be taunted with the name of "informer." They confound the two opposite characters—that of a person who comes forward to give evidence against those with whom he has been associated, and that of a person who appears as one of the public to bear testimony against a criminal in a court of justice. That is a singular feeling no doubt; but it is an universal one throughout Ireland; and therefore the fact that the people do not assist in bringing disaffected persons to justice does not prove they are themselves disloyal. Now with regard to the expectations held out in the Queen's Speech, as to our being able to dispense with these extraordinary powers. I will quote a few figures to show that the course of proceedings had been tending to a general restoration of tranquillity. When Her Majesty's Government came into office the number of prisoners in confinement under the Suspension Act was 330; by the 1st of September the number was reduced to 286, and subsequently it fell to seventy-three. The warrants issued for arrests were in September one, in October one, and in November five. But at the end of November fresh excitement was manifested. There was a collapse of Fenianism in the United States, and I presume it was apprehended that the imposture would soon come to an end, that the dupes were beginning to be disabused, and that it was necessary for the leaders to take some active steps to replenish the Fenian exchequer by drawing more money out of the ignorant and credulous Irish people. Every day there were reports of the landing of Stephens and the setting out of an invading army which was to come from America, and it was held out that before Christmas arrived Ireland would be in a state of general insurrection. These mendacious assertions had their effect upon the minds of excitable and credulous persons; so that in December it was found necessary to issue ninety-seven warrants; which were followed by seventeen in January, and nine in February, making a total of 130 from the month of September. The renewal of excitement led to an universal outburst

of loyalty throughout the country. Magistrates, gentlemen, farmers, and persons of all opinions came forward, expressing their readiness and determination to assist the Government in putting down any outbreak in case persons were insane enough to attempt it. The Lord Lieutenant, of course, accepted with thanks those offers of assistance in case the Government were unable to maintain their own; but, at the same time, expressed, on the part of the Government, his conviction that the powers with which the law armed them would prove sufficient, without the active co-operation of the loyal inhabitants. Fortified by these strongly-expressed sentiments of disapproval and disgust of the attempts made to disturb the tranquillity of the country, Lord Naas, on returning to town before Christmas, did express a strong opinion that we should be able to do what we all unanimously regarded as desirable—namely, to allow the Suspension Act to expire, and to rely upon the ordinary law for preserving the peace in Ireland. Whether, owing to the expectations created by the announcement of the speedy expiring of the Act, or to a belief that the Act had actually expired, certain it is that immediately after that declaration there was a renewal of excitement. Your Lordships need not be reminded of what took place at Chester—an absurd attempt, but it undoubtedly did give a certain stimulus to the disaffected in Ireland. Then came that most ridiculous rising at Cahirciveen; which was, nevertheless, sufficient to throw the whole country into confusion, to disturb its tranquillity, and to render necessary movements of troops and constabulary. But the moment that the movement showed such a front as the Government could deal with, it collapsed into the absurd and ridiculous position from which it never ought to have emerged. There is not the smallest doubt that the Government have ample powers under the ordinary law to deal with any attempt at an outbreak; but, at the same time, there are, as we know, a number of persons from foreign countries—and I am sorry to say a number of persons from this country also—who are endeavouring by every means to stimulate their dupes in Ireland, and who occasionally go over to that country and venture their own persons in furtherance of that object. It is to protect the Irish people against the inroads and assaults of these persons that we propose what in ordinary cases would be considered an arbitrary measure; but which, on the present occasion, is regarded by all the well-disposed as a necessary precaution against the attempts of persons who really have no interest in the country, and whose only object is to create disturbance for the sake of disturbance, or are actuated by still baser motives. I believe that the late outbreak, inconsiderable and trivial as it was, might have been more serious but for the information we had previously received, and for the means which we possessed under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act of arresting at once the leaders of the intended outbreak. It is in the power which it confers of arresting these leaders, and thus of checking a movement before it can produce any effect upon the population, that the benefits of the Habeas Corpus Suspension principally exists. Under the noble Marquess now at the head of the Irish Government (the Marquess of Abercorn), I am confident that this power will be administered—as it was administered by the noble Earl lately at the head of that Government—with discretion and firmness, and, at the same time, with temper and moderation. I believe the proposed renewal for a short time of this Act will be hailed in Ireland with all but unanimous approval, as it has been already received in the House of Commons. I hope your Lordships will confirm the decision at which that House has arrived, by assenting unanimously to the second reading of this measure.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read 2^a.”
—(The Earl of Derby.)

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I am quite ready to give my cordial concurrence to the proposal of the noble Earl. That Her Majesty's Government were reluctant to propose the renewal of these powers is evident from the passage in the Queen's Speech upon the subject. But the facts which have lately occurred are not only sufficient to justify, they have made it incumbent on Her Majesty's Government to take this course. Whatever may be the present state of the law, and whatever may be the future improvements made in that law, the first duty of the Government is to give security to life and property; and without this security neither the present nor improved laws can promote the prosperity of Ireland. The noble Earl has stated, and it is quite true, that speculation has been practised on the credulity of the people of Ireland; that this is not a spontaneous outbreak, but has been excited by those who came from abroad. I must say I have arrived at the conclusion that there never were baser motives on the part of any persons undertaking to be rebels and insurgents than those which impelled the instigators of the late outbreak. In the United States of America, more especially, great sums have been collected on the pretence that Ireland was about to be freed, and that the Irish Republic was about to be established; and advantage is taken of the panic created, at one time in Ireland, at another time in Canada, to make fresh demands upon the unfortunate dupes who have given their money, hoping that this great revolution is about to be accomplished, but in reality only for the purpose of filling the pockets of those who practise on their credulity. It would appear, from a passage in the Message of the President of the United States, that the Government of that country have gone even beyond what international duty prompts, and have endeavoured to interfere with the course of justice in the case of persons participating in these insurrectionary movements. For I find the President using this language—

“Some of our citizens who, it was alleged, were engaged in the expedition, were captured, and have been brought to trial, as for a capital offence, in the province of Canada. Judgment and sentence of death have been pronounced against some, while others have been acquitted. Fully believing the maxim of Government, that severity of civil punishment for misguided persons who have engaged in revolutionary attempts which have disastrously failed is unsound and unwise, such representations have been made to the British Government, in behalf of the convicted persons, as, being sustained by an enlightened and humane judgment, will, it is hoped, induce in their cases an exercise of clemency and a judicious amnesty of all who were engaged in the movement. Counsel has been employed by the Government to defend the citizens of the United States on trial for capital offences in Canada; and a discontinuance of the prosecutions which were instituted in the courts of the United States against those who took part in the expedition has been directed.”

My Lords, it will be quite right to show mercy and to exercise clemency whenever those qualities can properly and wisely be exhibited. But I do not think that any foreign Government should put forward appeals for mercy and clemency on behalf of those who have made it evident that a mercenary expedition was their only object in venturing to Ireland with a view of exciting the subjects of Her Majesty, who are loyal, to rise in rebellion against her throne, to disturb all the relations of society, and to break out into open rebellion. Her Majesty's Government, in awarding punishment, will, no doubt, take into consideration the degrees of guilt on the part of those who may be convicted, and in applying to each case its measure of punishment will extend such mercy as they feel can safely be done. But I must say that there never was more misplaced sympathy, there never was a more unjustifiable demand upon the Government of one country by another than to extend a complete amnesty to men who, having left their native land, and obtained a settlement and a means of succeeding by their industry in another country, returned with these detestable notions to invade Her Majesty's dominions. The noble Earl opposite touched on one subject which was rather painful—namely, the disposition which exists, and has existed for a very long time, among the people of Ireland always to give their sympathies against the law, and not in favour of the law—not, as in this country, to confide in the just administration of the law by those charged with that duty, but rather to sympathize with those placed at the bar as defendants, and to refuse to give evidence to convict those persons of the crimes of which they have been guilty. This is a very painful consideration. I do not wish to discuss the matter now; but whenever the time comes that the Government think it wise that this Act should expire, the consideration, of course, is one that will not be overlooked by them. In the present instance, as I have said, the first duty of the Government is to give security to life and property, and I do not doubt they will exercise the powers now asked for with discretion, and will consent to dispense with them as soon as possible. I therefore support the Motion of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, before the Bill is read a second time I wish to make one or two observations. I fully agree with what the noble Earl (Earl Russell) has just stated, that, however painful the necessity may be, it is absolutely necessary to continue the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland. I should possibly not have troubled your Lordships with any remarks but that, allusion having been made to the advice which was given to the Queen as to the non-renewal of the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act, I desire to call the noble Earl's attention to a statement made by the Irish

Earl Russell

Attorney General on the occasion of his election for Galway, which I confess somewhat diminishes my confidence in the advice which was tendered upon that question. It is quite possible that the right hon. and learned Gentleman may have been misrepresented, and, if so, I desire that my remarks may be considered as inapplicable to him. But in the report, which I take from The Freeman's Journal, I find these words—

“He came before them as Her Majesty's Attorney General in this kingdom, and he was proud to announce that upon his advice and responsibility the Executive of this country had come to the conclusion it was safe—that it was more than safe—that the people of Ireland should live under a free Constitution; and that measures which he supposed were necessary for the public welfare, although personally he might have had his doubt even of that—were no longer needed—that the time had now come when it could go forth that the loyalty and conduct of the preponderating majority of the people of Ireland were such that they were not to be kept at the mercy of a suspended Constitution.”

The point to which I wish to call attention is that the Irish Attorney General, holding a position of peculiar responsibility with regard to matters of this kind, should have stated—if he did so state—in public that he had his doubts as to the advisability of previous suspensions of the Habeas Corpus Act. I venture to think that whatever difference of opinion there may be now upon the subject, at the time the suspension of the Act was resolved upon Parliament was almost, if not quite, unanimous in that resolution. A gentleman, holding the position of Attorney General for Ireland, must necessarily be held more strictly responsible for the words he uses than if he were merely an independent Member of Parliament; and, knowing something of the Irish people, I must say that I think the observations which I have quoted would have anything but a good effect. The Attorney General went on to speak of the number of persons arrested and released; but without wishing to detract from the credit due to the present Irish Government in having been able to release a number of prisoners, I must say that many of those originally arrested were released before the late Government left office. 756 persons had been arrested up to the time that I left Ireland, and 330 or 339 were in custody when the present Government came into office; so that no less than 417 had been released under my direction. Therefore, though the present Government have acted very wisely in continuing the process of release initiated by us, I think it right to state that the Attorney General has not stated the case quite accurately. With respect to the recent most ridiculous outbreaks, I wish to say that I rejoice exceedingly that my anticipations of widespread sympathy with the leaders of any outbreak have been falsified. I trust that the total break-down of the scheme will open the eyes of the infatuated people who have recklessly spent their money and endangered their liberty in a perfectly futile attempt to upset the Queen's Government in Ireland. Before quitting this subject it would be unjust not to give due credit to the present Irish Government and the local authorities for the promptness and vigour which they showed upon the first signs of a disturbance; their conduct will, no doubt, have a marked effect upon the disaffected, and clearly show them the fruitlessness of attempting to carry out their designs. I am glad to find that a clause has been inserted in the present Bill providing that those apprehended on the warrant of the Lord Lieutenant shall be treated as untried prisoners. This is an extremely just and necessary provision; but it must not be supposed that either the late or present Government, as far as I know, have neglected their duty in this respect. It is true that when the Act was first suspended a large number of apprehensions immediately took place, and for a short time prisoners were not all treated in certain local prisons in the way we approved; but as soon as any fact of the kind came to my knowledge, I took immediate steps to remedy the evil of removing these prisoners, and in Mountjoy Prison, which is under the direct control of the Government, their treatment was quite satisfactory.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The noble Earl (the Earl of Kimberley) was good enough to give me notice of his intention to ask the question he has put with reference to the Attorney General for Ireland, and I felt it my duty to ascertain from him how far the report of his address was correct. The learned Gentleman, in reply, states that the report in The Freeman's Journal was written in the third person, and therefore naturally conveyed a less perfect report of what was actually said than if it had been given in the first person. The Attorney General informs me that the language reported in the Irish Times or some other paper was more accurate, and he states that in congratulating the country upon the probability of being able to dispense with the operation of this Act, he certainly said, "Personally, I may have had my doubts as to the necessity of that measure." The learned Gentleman says that this observation referred to a conversation he had with the noble Earl opposite at the time of the first introduction of the measure, when he sat in the other House as a private Member for Galway. The noble Earl having consulted him with regard to the state of the country, he said that, as far as he knew, no disloyalty existed in the district with which he was connected, and that he did not think at that time the measure was needed. I believe he expressed this opinion very freely to the noble Earl; and he thinks that opinion, so far as the western districts of Ireland were concerned, was perfectly just, for out of the 752 persons arrested, only twenty of them were farmers and thirty-five of them farmers' sons, while 441 were tradesmen, shopkeepers, clerks, and commercial assistants; and his opinion he considered to be confirmed by the charge of Mr. Justice Fitzgerald at Limerick. It is evident from this that the Attorney General wished to convey that at that time the general character of the county of Galway was not such as to need the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland, whatever the rest of the country might require. Of course, he did not wish it to be inferred that, in his opinion, the Act had not proved beneficial; he simply desired to express his great satisfaction at the probability of being able to dispense with it on an early day. Unfortunately, that speech was delivered a few days before the outbreaks at Chester and Kells had taken place; otherwise I think his remarks would not have been mistaken for anything more important than the record of an opinion he had previously expressed to the noble Earl who had done him the honour to consult him. With regard to the remarks made upon the Message of the President of the United States, I regret that I am obliged to discuss the subject. The Correspondence on that subject will, as soon as it is printed, be laid upon the table of the House, and noble Lords will see that while we have not disputed what can fairly be claimed by the Government of the United States, we at the same time have not admitted the right of any foreign Government to interfere with the principles which guide us in the administration of justice; and that while, on the one hand, the just wishes of the United States have not been neglected, the independence and the honour of the tribunals of this country have not been in the slightest degree sacrificed.

EMPLOYMENT OF VOLUNTEERS IN CIVIL DISTURBANCES.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ST. LEONARDS, in rising to call the Attention of the House to the Employment of the Volunteers in case of Riots or Attacks by Fenians, said, that his motives in bringing forward this subject were the difference of opinion that existed, and in order that the Volunteers of this country and the public at large might distinctly understand what their duty was in connection with the suppression of riots and tumults. In our old law books it was laid down that the sheriff was entitled to summon all the people of the county to attend him on such occasions—to call out the posse comitatus, as it was termed—and by a Statute of Henry V. the neglect to attend such summons was punishable by fine and imprisonment. But with reference to the case of soldiers and Volunteers he would deal more particularly; and, without going back to 1715 or 1745, he would call their Lordships' attention to a speech delivered in that House by Lord Mansfield in reference to the Lord George Gordon riots of 1780. Lord Mansfield said—

"It appears most clearly to me that not only every man may legally interfere to suppress a riot, much more prevent acts of felony, treason, and rebellion, in his private capacity, but he is bound to do it as an act of duty, and, if called upon by a magistrate, is punishable in case of refusal. What any single individual may lawfully do, so may any number assembled for a lawful purpose; which the suppression of riots, tumults, and insurrections certainly is. It would be needless to endeavour to prove that what a private man may undertake to perform may be performed by a magistrate, who is specially authorized by law for the purpose of keeping the peace. It is the peculiar business of all constables to apprehend rioters, and to endeavour to disperse all unlawful assemblies; to apprehend the persons so offending, and in case of resistance to attack, wound, nay, kill those who shall continue to resist."

There was evidently a mistake in the next sentence of the speech, but the meaning was clear—

"The very act of apprehending in arms the person, with every necessary power for the effectual performance of the duty prescribed by the law, and consequently every person acting in support of the law is justifiable respecting such acts, such acts as may arise in consequence of a faithful and proper discharge of the duties annexed to his office, if he does not abuse the power legally vested in him, which may, according to the circumstances accompanying the transaction, degenerate into an illegal act, though professedly committed under the colour or pretext of law. These several positions I take to be incontrovertible, with all the possible consequences which can flow from them, and to be the true foundation for calling in of the military power to assist in quelling the late riots. The persons who assisted in the suppression of those riots and tumults in contemplation of law are to be considered as mere private individuals acting according to law, and upon any abuse of the legal power with which they were invested are amenable to the laws of their country."

"The military have been called in, and very wisely called in, not as soldiers but as citizens; no matter whether their coats be red or brown, they have been called in aid of the laws, not to subvert them or overturn the Constitution, but to preserve both."—[Hansard, Parl. History, xxi. 695.]

In a later debate, Lord Mansfield said—

"When a felony was committing or committed, and no justice or constable present, men were undoubtedly to exert themselves, and if they could not apprehend they were justifiable in putting the perpetrators to death. This justification, however, depended on the circumstances of the case."—[Hansard, Parl. History, xxi. 746.]

That eminent Judge laid down the doctrine in that House, which had never been disputed, that soldiers acting on such occasions were acting as civilians, and were liable to the consequences of all illegal acts, even though committed by order of their officers. But, although a soldier, by such a rule, must necessarily incur serious liabilities by disobeying his officer, and might render himself liable to unpleasant consequences by his disobedience, there could be no doubt that if a soldier, in doing an illegal act, simply and honestly fulfilled an order given to him by his commanding officer, such conduct would not be attended with any harm to himself. Upon the debate on the 21st of June, 1780, on the Duke of Richmond's Motion respecting the conduct of the military in disarming the citizens of London during the riots—which was negatived without a division—the Lord Chancellor, Lord Thurlow, spoke in the highest terms of Lord Mansfield's speech. He said—

"The learned Lord had left him little to add on the subject. Most clearly in all cases of felony it was the duty of every man, let his professional character be what it might, to aid and assist in apprehending the felon. In cases of public outrages and tumult it was the duty of all to assist in quelling it, to apprehend the rioters, and to deliver them over to the officers of justice; and in case of resistance, or on finding that they could not stop the outrage by any other means, after it had got to the length of pulling down houses, &c., or assaulting or wounding His Majesty's peaceable subjects, then all present were warranted to proceed to extremity, and use such weapons as they were furnished with for the destruction of the rioters. Every man had a right to oppose force to force on that first principle of the law of nature as well as the law of the land, self-defence; so the military, when present, individually as private persons, or collectively under military command, if they were insulted and assaulted by being pelted with brickbats, stones, &c., had a right to repel the violence and defend themselves. And in doing so the military did nothing but what every man else was warranted by law to do; because the military in every part of their conduct, in such cases as he had stated, were bound to obey the law."

"That the military, individually, and the private citizen were equally liable to the same exercise of the civil power, and bound to pay it the same subordination, by discharging the duties imposed on them with equal punctuality and faithfulness. Lord Thurlow then entered into a very copious discussion of the power of the sheriff in regard to the calling out of the posse comitatus, which comprehended in it every individual male of the county capable of bearing arms, the sheriff having it at his option to give weapons fit for the occasion to such of them as he thought proper. In proof of what he had asserted, he stated that soldiers, when not employed on military duty, were obliged, if at quarters or elsewhere in the county, to obey the sheriff's summons whenever he called out the posse comitatus, and to attend in person to receive and obey the orders of the sheriff."—[Hansard, Parliamentary History, xxi. 738.]

Lord Chief Justice Tindal, in his charge on the occasion of the trials of the rioters at Bristol, in 1832, stated that it was—

"The duty and right of every private person of his own authority to suppress a riot by every means in his power. And the law acknowledges no distinction in this respect between the soldier and the private individual. The soldier is still a citizen, lying under the same obligation, and invested with the same authority, to preserve the peace of the King as any other subject. If the one is bound to attend the call of the civil magistrate, so also is the other; if the one may interfere for that purpose when the occasion demands it, without the requisition of the magistrate, so may the other also; if the one may employ arms for that purpose, when arms are necessary, the soldier may do the same."

With reference to the debates in that House on the Duke of Richmond's Motion it might be useful to call their Lordships' attention to what passed between the City and the Government as to the right of the citizens to carry and use their arms. The correspondence would be found in the Appendix to the Chronicle in The Annual Register of 1780, from which it appeared that the Government pressed upon the Lord Mayor "not to omit any legal exertion of the civil power which might contribute upon that occasion to preserve the public peace." The inhabitants of the City proposed to arm themselves for their protection against the rioters. The plan was to have a battalion company of fifty of the opulent part of the inhabitants, armed, clothed, and taught the manual and platoon exercise at their own expense, and not to do duty out of their own ward. Lord Amherst, then at the head of the army, wholly disapproved this intention, on the ground that "no person could bear arms in this country but under officers having the King's commission." He gave directions to the officer commanding the troops in the City—

"If any arms were found in the hands of persons except they were of the City Militia, or were persons authorized by the King to be armed, to order the arms to be delivered up to him to be safely kept until further order."

The Government and the king did not think it expedient that any person

"Should be permitted to use arms otherwise than for the immediate defence of their houses, or being under the command of persons receiving commissions from the King."

This order leading to an unpleasant correspondence between the City authorities and the Government, the latter ultimately explained that in a time like that—

"Of real danger from riots, tumults, and rebellious insurrections, a reasonable number of inhabitants armed, according to the nature and circumstances of the case, might attend the police officers as assistants to them, for the preservation of the public peace until the danger was over; but although His Majesty's Protestant subjects might carry arms for their defence suitable for their conditions, and as allowed by law, yet they could not by law assemble in bodies armed, and be mustered and arrayed without the authority of His Majesty."

The noble Earl opposite (Earl De Grey and Ripon) had addressed a letter to The Times newspaper. It concluded in the following terms:—

"The law clearly confers no power of calling out Volunteer corps to aid in the suppression of riots. In such cases Volunteers can only act as private individuals; they may be sworn in as special constables, but only in the same manner as any other person, and with the same duties and liabilities; but since the passing of the Volunteer Act of 1863 it has never, as I believe, been understood hitherto that Volunteers so sworn in were to be armed with their Government rifles and ammunition, and to be employed, as might then be the case, rather as troops than as special constables. Such an employment of Volunteers seemed to me to be a matter requiring serious consideration, and I therefore thought it most desirable that the views of the Government should be clearly stated upon the point, in respect to which the opinion expressed by the Under Secretary for the Home Department left room for considerable doubt."

He would now state to their Lordships how in his opinion the law as stated by the authorities referred to ought to be applied. The Volunteers could not, as such, be called out, or go out as a body to quell riots or tumults; their services were confined to actual or apprehended invasion, and they were not then to be called out until the Crown had communicated with both Houses of Parliament, or, if Parliament were not sitting, with the Privy Council, and a notification by proclamation. The Volunteers were not released from their duties as citizens except in being exempted from serving in the militia, nor had they lost any of their rights as citizens. Therefore, they might be compelled to act as special constables, or they might, like other citizens, assist in putting down riots, tumults, and felonies, without being so sworn, although, of course, when special constables were being sworn in every man meaning to serve his country would attend to be sworn in specially. They might be armed according to the discretion of the magistrates, or, if acting as citizens, without such authority, according to their own discretion. This must depend on circumstances. In the case of an ordinary riot or tumult the staff would be the proper weapon. If the rioters had weapons and arms, of course the citizens, whether acting as special constables or not, should have like weapons of offence. Volunteers, as such, should never interfere in riots, and, therefore, if acting as special constables or as citizens not sworn in they should not appear in uniform, or assemble or act as a corps, but should as individuals join with other loyal subjects in putting down the riots or tumults. They might use the Government arms in this service to their country. Take the case of a Fenian outbreak; of course, those who opposed them must be armed. Very many of our Volunteers were permitted by their commanders to take their rifles home with them, and, perhaps, that was the safest place for them during a riot or tumult. Clearly they might arm when necessary.

Lord St. Leonards

Why might they not use the Government arms in their custody? Of course, the general body of arms in store could not be used without the permission of the commander, and this, where necessary, he would be at liberty to grant. There was no law prohibiting this. The subject was doing the duty he is compellable to perform as a loyal subject, and he was entitled to be armed. The King's arms, therefore, were the fitting ones to be employed in the King's service. To seek arms elsewhere and leave the body of the arms open to the attacks of the rioters would be simple folly. But though so armed they ought not and need not be employed as troops, but only as special constables.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, the subject to which my noble and learned Friend has directed your Lordships' attention is one which, under present circumstances, becomes of considerable importance. We have found by recent experience that the public tranquillity and safety may be suddenly endangered, and it may become necessary to take prompt and decisive steps to meet any similar difficulties that may occur, and to put down all disturbers of the public peace with a strong hand. It is most desirable that a magistrate should perfectly well understand upon such an emergency arising what are the powers to which he may have recourse. It is clear that it is unlawful to call out and employ the Volunteers as a military force for the purpose of repressing disturbances of the peace. The Volunteer Act of 1863 enables Her Majesty, in case of an actual or apprehended invasion, to direct the lords-lieutenant of counties to call out the Volunteer corps in their counties for actual military service, and as the Act of Parliament has specified the instances in which the Volunteers may be employed as a military body, it is obvious that by necessary implication every other occasion is altogether excluded. A Volunteer, therefore, in acting at all in the suppression of riots, is exactly in the condition of any other of Her Majesty's subjects. He can act to the extent that they can act, and his obligations are precisely the same as theirs. Now, it is most important that every subject of Her Majesty should understand what are his obligations and duties in the event of any sudden riot or tumult or disturbance taking place. I would, however, infinitely prefer to give your Lordships the law on the subject, and to explain the duty of Her Majesty's subjects on occasions of this kind, on authority much better than my own. In the year 1801 the late Lord Ellenborough, who was then Attorney General, upon a case being laid before him, gave this opinion—

“In case of sudden riot and disturbance any of Her Majesty’s subjects, without the presence of a peace officer of any description, may arm themselves, and of course may use ordinary means of force to suppress such riot and disturbance; and what Her Majesty’s subjects may do they also ought to do for the suppression of public tumult when an exigency may require that such means be resorted to.”

Now, of course, this obligation becomes more peremptory in cases where the magistrate requires the assistance of any of Her Majesty’s subjects in order to put down any disturbance of the peace; and to that Lord Chief Justice Tindal referred, in the charge to which my noble and learned Friend has alluded, and which was delivered to the grand jury upon the Special Commission for the trial of the Bristol rioters. The Lord Chief Justice expressed in the clearest language what was the duty of Her Majesty’s subjects on such occasions. He said—and he spoke most emphatically—

“And here I most distinctly observe that it is not left to the choice or will of the subject (as some have erroneously supposed) to attend or not to the call of the magistrate as he thinks proper, but every man is bound, when called upon, under pain of fine and imprisonment, to yield a ready and implicit obedience to the call of the magistrate, and to do his utmost to assist him to suppress any tumultuous assembly.”

The Lord Chief Justice then explains the mode in which the assistance of Her Majesty’s subjects were usually demanded in cases of this kind—

“In later times the course has been for the magistrate, on occasions of actual riot and confusion, to call in the aid of such persons as he thought necessary, and to swear them as special constables; and, in order to prevent any doubt (if doubt could exist) as to his power to command their assistance by way of precaution, the Act 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 41 has invested the magistrate with that power in direct and express terms, when tumult, riot, or felony was only likely to take place, or might reasonably be apprehended.”

Now, a Volunteer is not exempt from serving as a special constable. The Yeomanry are exempt, but a Volunteer has no such privilege, and therefore if called on to be sworn in as a special constable, he is bound to obey. Now, my Lords, if I understand my noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) correctly, he seemed to think that when

Volunteers were called out as special constables they were not at liberty to employ any organization which they may have received to enable them to act more efficiently as special constables. If that is my noble and learned Friend’s opinion, I beg leave most respectfully to differ from him. I think that, if called out as special constables, they are not to be organized as if acting as Volunteers; but that each may join with others, and take advantage of his previous organization in order to enable him to act more efficiently as a special constable. I apprehend, also, that a Volunteer may, if called out, take his arms with him, just as any other subject of Her Majesty, if he thinks that they are necessary for his protection in the discharge of his duty. Whether when the arms of the Volunteers are collected in one place the local magistrate may order those arms to be distributed among the Volunteers for the purpose of enabling them to assist in putting down riot and tumult, is a matter on which I think it is impossible to lay down any rule. If the riot and tumult are of a dangerous description, I apprehend the magistrate may, on his own responsibility, direct that arms be put in the hands of those special constables. Of course, he must take care that he exercises that discretion with caution and prudence; but if he honestly, faithfully, and firmly exercises his discretion, I apprehend he will be protected by law in placing arms in the hands of special constables where the tumult and riot are of a dangerous description, and it is absolutely necessary that the utmost force should be used. I do not think it necessary that I should enter more fully into the matter; because my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, believing that the law on the subject should be clearly laid down, has determined to take the opinion of the Law Officers, with the view of obtaining such instructions for magistrates that, on the general question, no one will have any difficulty in coming to a right conclusion. But still a great deal must be left to the discretion of the magistrate. I am, however, convinced that if the magistrate should show the determination which the occasion may require, and act honestly, fearlessly, and faithfully, he will be protected by the law.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON must say, after the discussion which had just taken place, that the question was not in a satisfactory position. It had been laid down that local magistrates, on their own responsibility, in certain cases, might not only call on individual Volunteers to serve as special constables, and direct them to be armed as any other sworn constable, but might go further and on their own responsibility have them armed with arms and furnished with ammunition not the property of the Volunteers but the property of the Government. Whether these arms were kept by the Volunteers in their own homes or were all collected at a dépôt, they were equally the property of the Government. He must say, too, that he thought the distinction between a body of Volunteers acting as Volunteers, and a body of Volunteers acting as special constables, but armed with Enfield rifles and Government ammunition, was too fine a one. If Volunteers were to be employed to aid in putting down riots and tumult, it would be better that power should be taken to call them out under the Mutiny Act, as had been the case under the old law. If they were called out under the Mutiny Act, we should have them under better discipline. At the same time, he was bound to say he entertained very serious doubts as to the advisability of employing Volunteers for such purposes, except in the same way as all other persons who served as special constables were employed. The employment of Volunteers in civil tumults under any other circumstances seemed to him to require very grave consideration. The other House of Parliament had deliberately decided that they were not to be employed in that way. It was that determination on the part of the House of Commons which had led to the striking out of a particular clause in the Bill of 1863. It appeared to him that it was only in such a case as a general arming of the whole population that the Volunteers should be employed to quell any disturbances; but certainly, the matter was not one which should be left to the discretion of local magistrates.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, that great dissatisfaction was felt at the uncertain position of the question. The Volunteer force had been enrolled under the impression that they were never to be called out except in the case of invasion or apprehended invasion; and he doubted whether the Volunteers should be allowed to use their arms on the requisition of a magistrate. When the Volunteer Act passed their Lordships' House, it contained a clause providing that Volunteers, at the discretion, not of the local magistrates, but of the Secretary of State, might be called out in case of tumult; it went down to the House of Commons, but after a sharp discussion there the Under Secretary for War withdrew the clause. Possibly some such arrangement as was then contemplated might now be made; but the question was one that was delicate and difficult to deal with, and it would be much to be regretted if, through the state of the law, any unpopularity attached to the Volunteers. Against the notion that Volunteers were to arm themselves with weapons belonging not to themselves, but to the Queen's Government, and act independently in the case of simple riot, he felt bound to protest. A small party of them might be cut off, the rifles wrested from their hands, and serious consequences might ensue. And there was another point to which it was necessary that attention should be directed. In rural districts Volunteers usually had leave to keep their rifles in their own houses; but in towns, where the arms of three or four battalions were collected together in a magazine, some measures ought to be taken to protect the armouries.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that as many Volunteer officers had expressed to the Government a desire for instructions for their guidance in future emergencies, the Government had directed their attention very seriously to the matter. It was, no doubt, contrary to the spirit of the Volunteer constitution that Volunteers should be called out in a general way to repress disturbances, or that magistrates should think that this force especially was at their disposal to be set in motion on such occasions. There could be no doubt that the same loyal spirit which prompted the Volunteers to place their services at the disposal of the Crown in case of invasion would lead them to act as special constables, under proper guidance and authority, if the magistrates require their services for the preservation of the public peace. Then this point suggested itself. Cases might arise where the Volunteers might be called on to come forward with arms in their hands to repel a public enemy, and there might be public enemies within as well as without, when it would be very desirable that the Volunteers should be called out as an armed body. In framing any instructions it was therefore very difficult to lay down any precise line; but, keeping in view those difficulties which Volunteer officers had suggested, as well as others which had reached them from other quarters, the War Department had taken counsel with the proper authorities, and the result was that full instructions would be issued with as little delay as possible. The question of armouries being one that was supposed originally to be provided for by the Volunteers themselves, no military arrangements had been undertaken for their preservation; but the point had become one of importance, and with others would receive immediate consideration.

EARL GREY said, that the discussion that had taken place that night had placed the matter in a more satisfactory condition than it was before. He thought it clear that, except under the control of their officers, the Volunteers certainly ought not to come out with Government arms in their hands. It was highly undesirable that Volunteers should be brought into collision with the people; at the same time, circumstances might arise rendering such a course indispensable. For instance, if the 1,400 or 1,500 Fenians at Chester the other day had made an organized attack, thereby levying war upon the Government, the magistrates and officers in command of the troops would have been deserving of censure had they not armed the Volunteers and directed them to act against the insurgents. It was of the utmost importance that the law on the point should be clearly defined, because at present the position of an officer in command of Volunteers in case of a riot would be exceedingly trying and painful. He heard, therefore, with much satisfaction that the Government proposed to take the state of the law into consideration. He hoped when the matter was looked into some effort would be made to define how the Volunteer force might be employed under local authority; and, if they found it to be necessary, he hoped they would not shrink from introducing a short Bill for the amendment of the law.

EARL RUSSELL said, he did not propose to say anything on the law of the case which, no doubt, had been laid down most carefully by the Lord Chancellor. The House of Commons while they provided for the Volunteers being called out in case of invasion, had negatived their being called out in cases of riot and tumult, and it appeared to him that it would be very dangerous to introduce any Bill on the subject which would give further powers for the interference of Volunteers. Their Lordships were all aware that it had been necessary to call out the regular troops in many cases, and he did not remember a single instance in which they had not shown the utmost discretion and acted with the utmost forbearance, although exposed, perhaps, for hours to very trying circumstances. In the case of Volunteers, no doubt influenced by local feeling, or to some extent by party hostility, one could not be certain that they would act in all cases with the same forbearance as regular troops. As a matter of expediency, therefore, he hoped it would not be necessary to alter the law, or to attempt to call out Volunteers in a fashion more dangerous than the employment of regular troops—that was to say, without being under the control of their officers.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, there was one point in connection with this subject which could not be too clearly borne in mind, and that was the distinction between simple riot and insurrection. In circumstances such as those that had occurred at Wolverhampton the other day, it would be clearly unadvisable to employ the Volunteers; but at Chester, if what was contemplated had been carried into execution it would not have been a simple riot, but a levying of war against the authority of the Queen. In such a case as that, the employment of Volunteers would stand on a very different footing from an ordinary case of riot.

SPECIAL JURORS.—QUESTIONS.

MR. WHATMAN said, he wished to ask Mr. Solicitor General, Whether, seeing the frequent inconvenience and loss occasioned to suitors in the Civil Courts by the insufficient attendance of Special Jurors, any steps will be taken either to remedy this or to insure more correctness in the lists returned by the respective parishes?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, in reply, that as far as he was aware there had not been any special inconvenience attending the nomination of special jurors except in London and Middlesex, but in these places both loss and inconvenience had frequently arisen. His own observations showed that, in the great majority of instances, the inconvenience was owing to persons, who ought to know the practice of the courts better, not taking due steps to have the jurors summoned. But, besides that, there was also inconvenience in consequence of the lists not being properly rendered by the overseers, and not being properly revised in the course of the year. As far as regarded London and Middlesex the lists were made out according to an Act of Parliament, 6 Geo. IV., and no substantial alteration had been made in the mode of doing so for the last forty years. In the year 1852, when the Common Law Procedure Act was passed; another regulation was made as regarded special jury panels; but owing to the opposition that was given the rule was not made applicable to London and Middlesex. The practice was to have the lists returned in September, and then, after certain applications of exemption were disposed of, the lists remained unchanged for a year. A great deal of the inconvenience arose from persons leaving their residences between the January of one year and the January of another, and persons becoming disqualified from age or on other grounds. He was quite certain, after the Report of the Commission in 1852, it was impossible to deal with the question without taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, and after due deliberation on the part of those who were familiar with the subject. The subject had not yet been formally brought under the notice of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he wished to know, whether it is the duty of the overseers to tell jurors they are on the lists? Just before the meeting of Parliament he (Mr. Owen Stanley) received a notice in Wales, though he was over age, ordering him to be next day in the Court of Exchequer.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, there was no such duty required on the part of the overseers who made out the lists. Any gentleman who objected to have his name on the lists must go to the petty sessions and have it struck out, otherwise he would be bound to serve.

SERBIA—EVACUATION OF THE FORTRESSES.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Baron Beust, the Minister of Austria, has issued a Circular Diplomatic Note to the Great Powers, stating that Austria had advised the Porte to carry out the evacuation of the Servian Fortresses, being convinced that England and France shared the opinions of Austria on this subject; and whether the English Government have given a favourable reception to that Note; and also, whether the Porte have agreed to evacuate the Fortresses of Servia, and on what terms?

LORD STANLEY: Such a document as that referred to by the hon. Member has been issued; and, as far as Servia is concerned, the Government entirely concurs in its recommendations. As to the latter part of the Question I am not able to give any reply.

ENSIGN CULLEN AND SURGEON MORRIS.
QUESTION.

MR. GILPIN said, he wished to ask the Judge Advocate General, Whether the judgment of the Court Martial in the case of Ensign Cullen and Surgeon Morris, on a charge of putting to death two Negroes by shooting them without trial, has been officially received in this country; and, if so, whether it will be laid before the House?

MR. MOWBRAY said, in reply, that there had been two separate Courts Martial held on Ensign Cullen and Surgeon Morris, one of the charges being applicable to Surgeon Morris only. The trial in the case of Ensign Cullen was very protracted, having lasted from the early part of October to the 4th of December. The proceedings were delivered on the 1st of January at his office, and on the 8th he submitted them to Her Majesty. As regarded Surgeon Morris, the trial commenced on the 11th of December, and had not concluded when the last mail left. It was not usual to lay the proceedings of courts martial upon the table, and until the whole of the proceedings had been completed he could give no further answer.

BANQUET—CARDINAL CULLEN.
QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Ministers has been directed to the report of the proceedings at the inaugural banquet of the Lord Mayor of Dublin on Wednesday last, which is published in The Times of Thursday, the 21st instant, whence it appears that Cardinal Cullen was present on the above occasion, in the robes and capacity of a Cardinal Legate from the Court of Rome, took precedence in that capacity, and addressed the assembly on matters touching the Government of Ireland; and whether, assuming the above report to be substantially correct, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers, it is consistent with the Laws of this Country, or with International Law, that an ecclesiastic should, in the capacity of a Cardinal Legate from the Court of Rome, be permitted, as representing that Court, but without being regularly accredited to the Court of England, or recognised in any diplomatic capacity, to interfere on public occasions of an official character, by advice or otherwise, with matters touching the Government of the United Kingdom?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, since notice was given of this question I have made inquiry respecting an event which had not before attracted my attention, and I find that the Lord Mayor of Dublin did not consult the Government as to the guests whom he should invite on that occasion. But I have made inquiries, as far as I could, with decent respect to the Lord Mayor, as to the arrangements and the motives which influenced him on the occasion in question. The invitations, which included Cardinal Cullen, had certainly nothing in them of an exclusive character. I really do not know what are the political or religious opinions of the Lord Mayor; but invitations were also extended to the Archbishop of Dublin, who was prevented from attending by some accidental cause in domestic life, to the President of the Presbyterian Assembly, and to many other distinguished members of different denominations, among them the heads of the Wesleyan body. I cannot understand that any precedence was given to Cardinal Cullen otherwise than would be given to him in any society in which he might mix. Besides the Lord Lieutenant, there was no other Peer present, and therefore, according to the rules of social etiquette, Cardinal Cullen, who is recognised as a Roman Prince, took merely the same precedence to which he would be entitled in any assembly in England, public or private. I believe he appeared on that occasion in no diplomatic capacity; indeed, I believe that there is no diplomatic capacity filled by Cardinal Cullen which is recognised, and I am doubtful whether he is really what is called a Cardinal Legate from the Court of

Rome. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: He is not.] I was not quite certain on that point. I have reason to believe that Cardinal Cullen had some local rank given him with reference merely to the hierarchy of his own Church, which would allow him precedence as a Cardinal Archbishop over any other Roman Catholic Archbishop who might be present. It is pretty clear, therefore, that there is no foundation for the assumption of my hon. Friend that Cardinal Cullen acts in any diplomatic capacity in this country, or that he appeared in any diplomatic capacity on that occasion. I must take the liberty—I do not like making long answers, but I am sure the House will allow me some indulgence on this occasion of reminding my hon. Friend that a Cardinal is not necessarily an ecclesiastic. A Cardinal is a Roman Prince, and I have known Roman Princes and Cardinals who were not ecclesiastics. In fact, it is not necessary in any way that he should be an ecclesiastic. I remember a Committee of this House which, I think, was presided over by the late Sir Robert Inglis—of which, at all events, he was the most eminent Member, and that before that Committee, which was considering very delicate questions of religious interest, the late Cardinal Wiseman was summoned; Cardinal Wiseman appeared in the dress which Cardinals are accustomed to wear, and which is their right, and there were several gentlemen on that Committee whose feelings were annoyed. They protested against the appearance of Cardinal Wiseman, not only as a Cardinal, but as being in the dress of a Cardinal. Now, Sir Robert Inglis was an extremely well-informed man, though his opinions were perhaps extreme upon the question of the two Churches, and no man could suppose that he would have shrunk from expressing his opinions. He was also a man of very ceremonious manners, a highly-finished gentleman, and he perfectly well knew what was the social rank of every individual. Well, in that case, he admonished his friends on account of their zeal, which he said was perfectly uncalled for, because Cardinal Wiseman was a Cardinal, and therefore a Roman Prince, acknowledged by the laws and customs of society in this country. Sir Robert Inglis treated him accordingly with the utmost ceremony and attention. Sir, I will not say anything further, beyond expressing this feeling of my own—that I really think it is highly desirable that the Roman Catholic Prelates of Ireland should mix a little more in the world, and enter a little more into society than they have done. I really believe that it would be mutually beneficial to both parties, that it would, to a great extent, terminate asperities for which there is no foundation whatever, and that it would perhaps tend to bring about those improved relations between the followers of the two religions in Ireland which, I think, every sensible man must desire.

INDIA—COOLIE TRADE IN ASSAM.

QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, if he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House any recent Papers connected with the Coolie trade in Assam, or elsewhere; and, for an explanation of the reasons which induced the Indian Government to appoint a Protector of Coolies in Assam, and how far the result of such a precaution, if necessary, was successful or otherwise?

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE said, in reply, that an officer had been deputed to inquire into certain cases of cruelty which were said to have occurred on a particular plantation; but it was not yet known how far that appointment had been attended with a beneficial effect.

NAVY—THE "GREENWICH SIXPENCE."

QUESTION.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the survivors of the seamen who paid the sixpence a month, commonly known as the "Greenwich sixpence," which was discontinued in the year 1834, have not a claim on the Hospital on account of that payment; and, if so, what is the extent and nature of that claim?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE replied that, if the survivors of those seamen who paid the sixpence per month, commonly known as the "Greenwich sixpence," and which was discontinued in 1834, had a claim on the Hospital on account of that payment, it certainly was of a moral and not of a legal character. He could not, however, state the nature or extent of such a claim.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE.

Order for Committee to consider the Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45, read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Speaker—In rising to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to take into consideration the most important statute of modern times, it might for a moment be supposed that proposition was one condemnatory of the great Act of 1832. I can assure the House, however, that nothing is further from the intentions and from the feelings of Her Majesty's Advisers. What they wish on the present occasion, if they have the opportunity, is to do that more efficiently, and not less sincerely, which they attempted in 1859, and that is to improve and complete the Reform Act. Sir, the men who devised and carried the Reform Act of 1832 were statesmen, and their names will live in history. They encountered a great emergency, and they proved themselves equal to the occasion. A national party, a party which is nothing if it be not national, had by too long a possession of power shrunk into a heartless oligarchy. The Whig party seized the occasion which was before them, and threw the Government of this country into the hands of the middle classes. Never, to my mind, was any political experiment more successful. Never has a country been better governed, to my mind, than England has been during the last thirty years. Never during a like period have the annals of the House of Commons been more resplendent. But, Sir, there was a deficiency in that Act—I will not say an intended deficiency, but one which certainly arose from want of useful information on an important part of a great question; and, perhaps, without any offence to hon. Gentlemen opposite, I might say that omission was perhaps more naturally made by a party which, generally speaking, had built up their policy rather upon Liberal opinions than upon popular rights. The political rights of the working classes which existed before the Act of 1832, and which not only existed but were acknowledged, were on that occasion disregarded and even abolished, and during the whole period that has since elapsed, in consequence of the great vigour that has been given to the Government of this country, and of the multiplicity of subjects of commanding interest that have engaged and engrossed attention, no great inconvenience has been experienced from that cause. Still, during all that time there has been a feeling, sometimes a very painful feeling, that questions have arisen which have been treated in this House without that entire national sympathy which is desirable. Well, Sir, it is our business on this occasion, in the first and most important place, to endeavour to offer some proposition to the House which will restore those rights that were lost in 1832 to the labouring class of the country, and which will bring back again that fair partition of political power which the old Constitution of the country recognised, and which, if practicable, it seems to me that all of us are desirous should be accomplished. There is a very great difference between the period of 1832 and the period of 1867. In the period of 1832 Parliamentary Reform was a subject to fire the imaginations and excite the passions of all men. It was one which banded parties together with a heat and with a power such as very rarely occur. But on the present occasion there is great unanimity on the subject. We who have succeeded to the place which we occupy in the spirit of the Constitution, finding that question unsettled and by universal consent requiring settlement, can appeal with confidence, as I now understand, to the candid interpretation of the House of Commons upon our plans and motives, and can count even on the support, of course the discriminating, but still the not less generous support, of our political rivals.

Sir, with these feelings, I shall endeavour to speak to those Resolutions which I placed only a fortnight ago upon the table of this House. [For these Resolutions see Contents, February 11, and the Appendix.] It is only a fortnight ago that I asked the House to consider the propriety of permitting Her Majesty's Government to proceed on this subject by way of Resolution, and it was then more than doubtful whether that permission would be conceded. It has been said that the Resolutions placed upon the table are vague, and not intended to lead the House to any practical conclusion. My presence to-day, according to all Parliamentary practice, to give the explanations which the House has a right to expect, is a sufficient answer to that charge. I confess for myself, Sir, that I cannot agree with those who, in attempting to settle great questions, begin by disregarding the importance of principles. It appears to me that it is of great importance, if we are endeavouring to bring about a general un-

Rome. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: He is not.] I was not quite certain on that point. I have reason to believe that Cardinal Cullen had some local rank given him with reference merely to the hierarchy of his own Church, which would allow precedence as a Cardinal Archbishop to other Roman Catholic Archbishops who might be present. It is therefore, that there is the assumption of Mr. Cardinal Cullen acting in his capacity in this connection, and that he has appeared in any direction on this occasion. I am not like making sure the House of Commons on this point. I am not sure that the House of Commons is not a little bit of a Roman Prince against the House of Commons.

I will first ask the House to consider that portion of the question which is, perhaps, immediately the most interesting, and which has occasioned of late years the most controversy in this House—namely, the state of the borough franchise. In considering this question our anxiety has been to widen, as far as we could, the right of exercising political suffrage; and, while retaining the general character of this House, and while we endeavour to give to the working classes their old share in the formation of Parliament, at the same time not derogating from that variety of character in this House which I believe to be so important, and the main foundation of our influence and authority. We have endeavoured, in considering the question, to see whether we could not improve and increase the suffrage for boroughs, with a due regard to three important qualities—capital, intelligence, and labour. With this view we have resolved to recommend the House to adopt four new franchises in boroughs. These four franchises have no novelty to recommend them or to alarm the House, for I believe they have on several occasions been the subject of our discussions, and in all instances they have experienced a very favourable reception from the House.

the Roman should be introduced a Bill in the House of Commons to give the suffrage to the graduates of all Universities, to members of all the learned societies, to clergymen and ministers of religion, to certificated schoolmasters, and others. I should myself wish to see such a suffrage extended. In the present Resolutions, or in the Bill which, if the Resolutions are sanctioned, it will be my duty to bring in, that franchise would to a certain degree be extended, although not to that degree to which some would wish to see it carried. I believe, however, that under it a considerable number of persons, comparatively speaking, would exercise the franchise who otherwise would not enjoy it. To that point I will advert afterwards. The next new franchise that we wish to establish is a savings bank franchise. That is a franchise which has always been favourably considered, and which has been included in almost every project of Parliamentary Reform of late years, but to which one objection of considerable importance has been urged, and that is, that it is very difficult to establish and register the names of those who would be qualified under it. We hope to be able to lay a plan before the House which will be found easy and practical, and to render that franchise self-adjusting. In that case it will be a very satisfactory and important franchise. We propose that a qualification of £30 in the savings bank, with a retention of it for one year, which is a necessary condition, should be the subject of the second franchise, while the third new franchise that we should propose would be established on public property, so that any person who has £50 in the debt of this country—in the public funds—shall be entitled to a vote. The fourth new franchise is one founded upon the payment of direct taxation. We propose that every person who pays 20s. a year direct taxation shall have a vote to elect Members of Parliament. These are the four new franchises that we propose. I will give the House the numbers that the Government believe will register and record their votes under the savings bank franchise—not the numbers that may appear on the first blush qualified to vote under that new franchise, because that would be deceptive. But we believe that under the £30 savings bank qualification in boroughs there will at this moment be 35,000 persons who will register and record their votes. [Sir GEORGE STUART: Having no other qualification?] having no other qualification. We think that under the education franchise there will be 10,000 persons, the funded property qualification will be 7,000 persons, while the taxpayers will not be less than 10,000 persons entitled to vote.

Having stated the new franchises proposed for boroughs, I will ask the House to consider the question of the re-adjustment of the old franchise. The Resolutions which I have placed upon the table are connected together, and I wish to call the attention of the House to the fifth Resolution. What is expressed in the fifth Resolution is the belief of the Government that—

“The principle of Plurality of Votes if adopted by Parliament would facilitate the settlement of the Borough Franchise on an extensive basis.”

I wish to make an observation on that Resolution. In the first place, a very great error has prevailed as to the meaning which the Government associated with this plurality of voting. Our intention was that any person who possessed one of the four new franchises that I have mentioned, if he were an occupier in a borough or if he had a right to vote for a Member of Parliament, should vote, not merely for the occupation qualification, but also for any one other of the new franchises which he might possess. We believe that if that principle were adopted it might have led to results very satisfactory to large numbers of the people of this country; but we are bound to state frankly that this is not a view of the case which, if we are permitted to bring in a Bill, we shall at all insist upon. It seems to us that it is not desirable to make any proposition on these questions which we have not a fair prospect of carrying to a successful issue, and, therefore, although I myself believe that it is a principle well worthy of our consideration, for it involves nothing invidious in its character, applying alike to all classes, yet it is not one which I am now in any way recommending to the House, or announcing that we should act upon it if we had permission to bring in a Bill. It is, however, necessary that I should speak frankly to the House on the subject of the fifth Resolution.

Then, Sir, having been obliged to give up acting upon that Resolution, we had to consider the basis on which, in our opinion,

Parliament should fix the borough franchise so far as occupation is concerned. It must be remembered that Parliament has asserted the principle of rating as the basis of our electoral system. It must be remembered also, in offering the general views of the Government on the matter, that we have placed the assertion of that principle among the Resolutions on the table of the House; and therefore I will assume that on that subject there is now no question. We have, then, to fix upon some franchise with regard to the boroughs of which rating shall be the basis; and our object being that we should fix upon an authentic basis—one not nominally of ratepayers, but, as far as possible, really of ratepayers—that we should have some resting point to remain upon, and rating being now, as I hope it will be, accepted as the basis of our whole electoral system, we should recommend the House, having relinquished our fifth Resolution, to adjust the occupation franchise in boroughs upon a £6 rating basis. It now devolves upon me to show to the House what will be the effect upon the number of the constituency of the new franchises which we have proposed, and of the re-adjustment of the occupation franchise in boroughs which I have just mentioned. I must again remind the House that the numbers which I place before them are the numbers which Her Majesty's Government believe will really be added to the roll. We make all due allowance for those who do not register, and all due deductions for other classes, in respect of which I will not now weary the House. But we believe that with a £6 rating franchise, the number qualified being, I think, 203,000, there would be new voters to the number of 140,000. But we must make a deduction of 10,000 from that, because probably that proportion may be already qualified as electors. Therefore, we place the number of new voters under a £6 franchise in boroughs at 130,000. We place the savings bank voters at 35,000; we place the direct taxation voters at 30,000; the funded property qualification voters at 7,000; and the educational franchise voters at 10,000; making altogether 212,000, which is the number that, in our opinion, will practically be added to the constituency of the boroughs. It will now be my duty to call the attention of the House to what we propose with respect to the county franchise. We propose, in the first place, to extend to the counties the four new sub-franchises which I have already mentioned ; and the effect of this upon the counties will be to add to the constituency by direct taxation 52,000, by funded property 13,000, by the educational franchise 15,000, and by the savings bank qualification 25,000 voters. I must here remark, both with reference to the county and the borough franchise which depends on the savings banks, that all these estimates are made upon the old savings banks. There is no Return yet of the Post Office savings banks; but of course in time, if that national institution advances and prospers, it will have a very sensible effect upon this matter. Extending, then, to the counties those four new franchises, we propose to reduce the occupation franchise in counties to £20. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Will that also be founded upon rating?] It will be founded upon rating. This will add, after all deductions, to the occupiers having votes in counties, 82,500. The whole of the increase to the constituency of the country, in round numbers, will be 400,000.

The House will now permit me to advert to one of the Resolutions, not strictly in the order in which it is placed on the paper, but on which it would be more convenient for the general management of this subject that I should at once touch ; and that is the Resolution to which an Amendment has been given notice of—namely, No. 9—which declares—

Sir, I have heard that in dealing with this subject we have only ourselves to blame, because we thoughtlessly, and, perhaps, incautiously, supported an hon. Baronet, a Member of this House, in the last Session of Parliament, in a Resolution which we must now find very inconvenient to us. [An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear!] Sir, I can only say to those who have made that observation, and to the hon. Gentleman who cheers it, that they are under a very great mistake. After what happened, not only before that Resolution was passed, but after what has occurred subsequently and recently in this country, I think that any Ministry, of whatever party it might be formed, would not be doing its duty to its Sovereign and its country if it did not attempt vigorously to grapple with this question of bribery and corruption. And, Sir, we have given to it our anxious attention, and are perfectly prepared to act upon the conclusions at which we have arrived. This is not the occasion upon which it would, I am sure, be agreeable to the House to enter into minute details on such a subject ; but I may, perhaps, advert to one or two of the principal conclusions to which we have come, and which we shall recommend the House to adopt in regard to it. In the first place, it is our opinion—and we hope that we may induce the House to agree with that opinion—that after an election, if the decision within two months is challenged, either by the candidate who was defeated or by the electors, he or they shall be empowered to serve the returning officer with their protest ; that when that protest has been received the returning officer shall communicate it to the proper authorities—the Clerk at the table, for example, Mr. Speaker, or it may be the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas ; and that then these authorities should have the power immediately to authorize the despatch of two assessors to the spot, to hold their court and conduct their examination at the locality, and there decide upon the question at issue. Of course, these assessors are not to be sent—that protest is not to be acted upon, unless the persons making it enter into their recognizances to bear the necessary expenses of the investigation. And as we are unwilling in any way to diminish the jurisdiction of this House, or to take its real business from out of its bosom, in case we give an appeal from the decision of the assessors, we propose that it should be given in this way—that the person decided against may make his appeal to this House, and that this House may, if it thinks fit, appoint a Select Committee to investigate the question. [“ No, no ! ”] The decision of the assessors will remain fifteen days on the table. If it is not questioned it will be acted upon ; if it is questioned, the person who questions it and makes the appeal must, of course, again enter into his recognizances to bear the necessary expenses, and it will be open to the House, if it thinks proper, to act upon that appeal. The next conclusion upon this matter which we shall recommend the House to adopt is to declare that, when a candidate has been convicted of bribery, the other candidate whose conduct is proved to have been pure, although he may have been in a minority, shall be returned to this House. Sir, these are two important recommendations to which, from a desire not to weary the House, I have done very imperfect justice; because, of course, all these regulations are very much matters of detail; but I hope that I have succeeded in conveying to the House the general results at which we have arrived. We believe that their consequences will be very considerable upon the conduct of the constituencies, and also of the Members of this House.

[An hon. MEMBER: What about the punishment?] I would rather decline to enter at the present moment into the subject of punishments, and prefer to leave it till this branch of the question is more specifically before the House. I hope, although this is a subject involving very great difficulty, that we may be able to arrive at certain conditions by which inveterately corrupt boroughs shall after a certain time, and after the fulfilment of those conditions, by their own conduct lose, as a matter of course, the power of returning Members to Parliament. If the Resolutions are passed, and it should fall to our lot to bring in a Bill, we shall be perfectly ready to act upon this question of corruption by introducing clauses to carry these propositions, or propositions of an analogous character, into effect. But it will be for the House to decide whether they shall be adopted. I cannot conceal from the House that this is a subject which must lead to prolonged controversy, and as it is no doubt their desire that a Bill affecting the representation of the people in Parliament should be carried, I will not say with precipitation, but, at least, without any unnecessary delay, it will be for them to decide whether it is to be dealt with in that or in a separate measure. I can assure the House that the Government are prepared to fulfil, not only in the letter, but in the spirit, the engagements which were entered into on this question last Session, and to which they themselves were a party. If the House should be of opinion that it would encumber the Franchise and Distribution Bill or the other subjects which must necessarily enter into a measure of Parliamentary Reform too much to couple with them this matter, all I can say is that I will personally undertake to bring in a separate Bill dealing with it on the very same night, so that the passing of the Franchise and Distribution Bill would be disembarrassed of the delay which might otherwise take place.

The subject on which I have just treated leads me to the consideration of those venal boroughs which have of late so much engaged the painful attention of the country.

It is the opinion of the Government that no delay should occur in enabling the House to decide on the position of those boroughs, and that is a very relevant part of the task which if these Resolutions pass we are prepared to undertake. The boroughs to which I refer are Great Yarmouth, returning two Members; Lancaster, returning two Members; Totnes, returning two Members; and Reigate, returning one Member, to Parliament. The Government have given to this part of the question anxious and painful consideration, and they think that it is their duty to recommend the disfranchisement of the whole of those boroughs, and to transfer the seven seats thus rendered vacant to towns which have risen into importance since the passing of the Reform Bill of 1832. Those seven seats would not, of course, meet all the fair claims to the distinction of being represented in this House which might be urged; but on that subject, notwithstanding the communications which I have had made to me, the Government have been guided by the principles and feelings which are expressed in the 7th and 8th Resolutions. We have, in fact, in considering the question of distribution, entirely been influenced by the consideration of enfranchisement and not disfranchisement. We are alive to the great difficulty, and even the great danger, of rashly, recklessly, and thoughtlessly interfering with the representative system of a society so old, so complicated, and now so vast and various as that of the British Empire. We are unwilling to disturb any centre of representation, our main consideration being that in the revision of our electoral system which must necessarily be periodical, however distant, from one another the periods—we should confine ourselves, as far as we possibly can, to giving representation to those places which ought to be, and are not represented, duly maintaining at the same time that balance between the various interests in this House which, I believe, the majority of us are anxious to preserve. We have anxiously examined all the claims for representation which can upon any reasonable ground be advanced by the several communities which have risen into importance since 1832, and we have naturally, in coming to a decision upon the subject, been influenced by a triple consideration—in a great degree by population, by the distinctive interests of that population, and lastly, by locality. We are desirous, as far as we can, to maintain the distribution of representation over the country, because we feel that unequal distribution must lead to discontent. We have endeavoured to provide that each distinctive interest in towns should be fairly represented, and the towns which, after the most anxious and careful investigation, we will, if the Resolutions should pass and we have the opportunity, recommend to Parliament to enfranchise are Hartlepool, Darlington, Burnley, Staleybridge, St. Helen's, Dewsbury, Barnsley, and Middlesbrough. I stop at the next, and the House will, I trust, not ask me to mention its name. We wish to give a Member to what is called the "Black Country." In our own Bill of 1859, as well as in the Bill of the late Government, a provision of that kind was introduced. To reconcile a rating basis and a mining population is, however, a difficult task. So many and such contradictory representations from different localities have been made to me, and I have been asked so anxiously and upon such good grounds not to precipitate the determination of the Government on this point, that I am sure the House, always anxious for fair play, will allow me to describe the town to which I am now adverting as one in the Black Country. The remaining towns which we propose to enfranchise are Croydon, Gravesend, and Torquay. The House will perceive that the North of England—and that very properly—has a very large share in this appropriation, and we think it extremely desirable that if there are towns of sufficient importance in the South their claims to representation should also be acknowledged. We look, therefore, upon the enfranchisement of Croydon, Gravesend, and Torquay, as only fair and just. Before I leave the question of boroughs I will mention that it is the intention of the Government, if they should have the opportunity, to recommend to Parliament to divide the Tower Hamlets, and give to each division two Members. In so doing it will, of course, be necessary to provide that its boundaries should not be allowed to remain exactly as they were left by the Act of 1832, but that they should be adapted to the requirements of the present population; and it seems to us extremely desirable that communities so populous and extensive should be made the basis of an increased representation. By these means fourteen Members will be given to boroughs.

I now come to another part of the important subject of distribution. The House

has acknowledged that the counties in England are inadequately represented. No one, I may add, has acknowledged that to be the case more explicitly than Earl Russell himself. I remember it was from this very place that he did me the honour of stating that in one of his numerous Reform Bills he had given increased representation to the counties in consequence of the remarks which I had offered on the subject. The result, too, of our deliberations year after year, has, I think, convinced the House and the country that it is important the counties should receive a more adequate representation than they now possess. We are about greatly to increase the representation of towns, and we must bear in mind that in doing so we must diminish in a considerable degree the representative power of some of the smaller boroughs, which are generally supposed to furnish an indirect compensation to the counties for their entirely inadequate representation. What we propose, therefore, is that we should take certain counties and divide them, giving in each case a constituency composed, irrespective of the boroughs, of a pure county population, numbering 100,000, to the new Members thus created. The counties to the division of which we mean to ask the assent of the House are North Lancashire, North Lincolnshire, West Kent, East Surrey, Middlesex, South Staffordshire, and South Devon. We shall, if these proposals are adopted, have fourteen new Members for counties, and fourteen for boroughs, while the number of seats with which we intend to ask the House to deal is thirty. How twenty-eight of these are to be appropriated I have just explained; the remaining two we would dispose of as follows:—We propose to carry out a scheme which was offered to the consideration of the House in 1859, and which, though the measure in which it was embraced was not passed, received the entire approval of the House. I allude to our proposal to divide South Lancashire, as well as to give a Member to Birkenhead. Although that proposal was not then carried into effect, the vacancy created in certain seats two or three years afterwards furnished the House with an opportunity of re-considering the matter; and so irresistible were the claims of Birkenhead found to be—those of South Lancashire being also very great—that a compromise was made by giving a Member to Birkenhead and an additional Member to South Lancashire. We propose that South Lancashire should be divided, and this will make twenty-nine Members. We also propose that the House should recognise the claims of the London University.

I have now explained the distribution of seats proposed by the Government. Fourteen Members are given to boroughs, and I earnestly hope and fervently believe that Parliament will never have any cause to regret the transference of the franchise to the new boroughs. Notwithstanding all that has taken place, I believe that the real opinion of this country is opposed to the practice of bribery at elections, and I believe, too, that these communities will repudiate such practices. I expect with confidence that their Members, on whatever side they may sit, will add to the honour and utility of this House. There are, according to the list I have read, fifteen Members given to the counties, and they, no doubt, must be, considering their constituencies, men of very great importance. The presumption, therefore, is that they will add to the strength and reputation of the House of Commons. I may remark that in proposing the division of Middlesex we are proposing a plan which will at last give more peculiar representation to Kensington, Chelsea, Hammer-smith, and the populous districts in those neighbourhoods. Therefore, to the claims both of the West and East of London, which are at present most inadequately or not at all represented, the plan of the Government will afford some satisfaction. We can only carry this plan into effect by availing ourselves of the seven seats justly forfeited in the opinion of the whole House and the country, and by appealing to the patriotism and public spirit of some of the smaller boroughs in the country. The principle of this plan—a principle which I trust will always be adopted in this House—is never wholly to disfranchise, except on account of corruption, and those boroughs, therefore, to which I now allude will still remain Parliamentary boroughs; and we shall still have the pleasure of listening in this House to the hon. Members who represent them. I will not trouble the House with the names of these boroughs. [Cries of "Name!"] Their names are on the table, and when I state the principle on which the Government propose to appeal to them to curtail their superfluous representation, every hon. Member will then have it in his power to ascertain what boroughs they are. [Cries of "Name!"] That is not in the Resolutions, and to the Resolutions I mean strictly to confine myself. All boroughs under a population of 7,000 will be asked, in all courtesy, by this House to spare one of their Members. These are in number twenty-three, which, added to the seven forfeited seats, show how the plans of the Government can be carried into effect.

It now becomes my duty to call the attention of the House to other important Resolutions, which, if sanctioned by the House, will materially affect the question of corruption, because they tend to terminate the expenditure on a great scale in county elections. If the House will agree to the three Resolutions which refer to the registration of county voters, to the manner in which the voters shall be polled, and to the mode by which voters at a distance may record their votes, the Government will introduce a series of provisions in their Bill which will, I may say without exaggeration, entirely put an end to the vast expenditure now incurred in county elections. If you combine these three Resolutions with the provisions, such as I have already indicated, of our Bill against corruption, and with the course which we recommend Parliament to take in reference to those boroughs whose conduct has recently been under the painful scrutiny of the country, I think you will agree that a great blow will be dealt against bribery and corruption in the election of Members to Parliament, which will afford a hope to the country that those evils may possibly in time be entirely suppressed. Therefore, I have great confidence that the House will pass those Resolutions; and I undertake, on the part of the Government, that if they are passed we will bring forward a series of practical proposals which will be easy of adoption and beneficial in operation. The registration of county voters will then be assimilated to the principle on which the registration of borough voters is placed. The polling places will be increased. I will not say that every parish will be a polling place, because there may be some parishes with no voters; but we would have polling places so frequent, and polling districts so limited, that county elections might be carried on so economically that it would be utterly impossible to incur the vast expenditure which even now occurs. If the Resolution with respect to voting papers be adopted by Parliament, we have reason to believe that that system may be acted on with beneficial effects, and thus there will be an end of the immense abuses arising out of bringing up voters from an immense distance at a fabulous cost.

I know not that I have omitted noticing any Resolution before the House except the last, on which it is almost unnecessary for me to make any observation, because I have already on a previous occasion referred to it. I will only say that I have learnt that there exists some misapprehension of the remarks I made with respect to a Commission for settling the boundaries of boroughs. I am told that it was understood from what I said that freeholders in boroughs should no longer vote for counties. No such idea ever occurred to my mind. There is not in the Bill which I hope to introduce any attempt to disfranchise any voter. We respect the Resolution which the House arrived at on a previous occasion, whatever my private opinion may be, and I always expressed it frankly, to the effect that every man should vote where his qualification is. I am, however, satisfied to submit to the decision of the House, and all I urged on the House was to consider the question of defining the boundaries between boroughs in a just and fair manner. The House will observe that on this head we recommend the issue of a Royal Commission. If these Resolutions pass, and we are authorized to bring in a Bill, it is our intention that the Royal Commission should issue immediately, and at once proceed to act, whereas if the Commission were made a Parliamentary Commission, and if it were bound up with the Bill, the Commission could not act until the passing of the Bill.

I have now fulfilled my task. I told hon. Members who made inquiries since the time when the Resolutions were laid on the table that I had taken a note of them, and that at the proper time I would explain to the House the application which the Government recommend should be given to the principles expressed in the Resolutions. I trust that the House will candidly consider the observations I have made. It will be our duty on the passing of the Resolutions to introduce a Bill, and I think that its provisions are such as will on the whole satisfy public opinion and the requirements of the case. It will add something like one-third to the constituency, and cause a considerable addition to the number of voters belonging to the working classes. I hope, therefore, it will be fairly considered that they have resumed their ancient position in the Parliamentary scheme of this country. At any rate, Her Majesty's Government have brought forward, I will not call it an honest Bill, because that epithet has been used so often of late that it might lead to angry recrimination. But they have brought forward a sincere Bill, which they are prepared to carry. Moderate it may be in spirit, but essentially practical, and which I earnestly hope will be backed by the good feeling of an united people. I move, Sir, that you do now leave the chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. LOWE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has concluded his speech by telling us that the Government has brought in a Bill. If that statement were accurate I would not have troubled the House with a single remark on this occasion; but it is just because the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer does not conclude by asking for leave to bring in a Bill, but asks the House to go into Committee on Resolutions, that I feel bound to trespass upon its attention. I am not so presumptuous as to offer any criticism off-hand on the measure which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has laid before us, nor have I the slightest objection to the speech in which he has introduced the Resolutions. I think it however my duty, as an independent Member of Parliament, to call the attention of the House very seriously and very earnestly to the position in which we find ourselves placed, both with regard to the Government and with regard to the constitutional practice of the House, in reference to the course which we are now asked to adopt. There may be circumstances connected with party which would make it difficult for other Members of more weight than myself to make these observations; but being, at the present moment, independent of party, though I hope not for long, I can speak what I think, and what ought to be said, but will not be said, unless by some outcast like myself. Now, Sir, I wish to speak with all good humour of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but unfortunately, in order to explain fully what I mean, I am compelled to do a somewhat ungracious thing, to take a little retrospect of his conduct during the past fortnight. This day fortnight he made a speech of two hours and a quarter long in which—unlike his speech of one hour and a quarter to-night, which told us everything—he told us nothing. I listened to it, as I believe we all did, with the utmost attention, and the only two things which I could derive from it were that he was exceedingly anxious to sharpen the difference between town and country, and to make the House understand, that come what might—notwithstanding any measure they might introduce—it was absolutely absurd to think that the Government could go out upon a Reform Bill. These two things I clearly understood, but as to the rest, really I could understand nothing, neither why the Resolutions were brought in, what they were, nor what they were to do. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman did not so much as allude to that Resolution, which, if I am not mistaken, is destined to play the most important part in the whole list—namely, the one which refers to plurality of voting. Nor did he mention voting papers. Indeed, so inveterate was his reticence that he would not even place the Resolutions before us by the usual notice, but left us for twelve hours, until the newspapers came out in the morning, in perfect ignorance of their terms. The effect of that has been unfortunate, because an opportunity has been lost of putting the House in possession of the wishes and opinions of the Government, and we have spent a whole fortnight, which ought to have been devoted to the consideration of the plan of the Government, in puzzling our brains to try and find out what the plan is, and I believe that the Government themselves have been engaged in pretty much the same operation. I say all this breeds delay, because it is impossible that we can go into Committee to-night and debate the plan of the Government which has been only just explained. Indeed, I maintain that the plan of the Government, clearly and ably stated, as it has been by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is really not before the House at this moment. It is like a balloon in the air. We are not in contact with it. The Resolutions of the Government have no more to do with the plan of the Government than Squire Thornhill's three famous postulates had to do with the argument he had with Moses Primrose, when, in order to controvert the right of the clergy to tithes, he laid down the principles that a whole is greater than its part, that whatever is is, and that three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles. This delay is much to be regretted, because I believe the House is really in earnest and wishes to come to the consideration of the question of Reform; so that I am justified in saying that it was very unfortunate that the past fortnight should have been wasted. I must say also that it appears to me that it is very much the fault of the right hon. Gentleman. In the first place, we had a speech which told us nothing; then we had Resolutions which told us little more than nothing; then we had the reasons (which came afterwards, instead of before) given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, why Resolutions were proposed instead of a Bill. I certainly myself could not conceive why they should have been proposed. We know why the Indian Resolutions were proposed. It was to found a Bill. They were precise and accurate—the heads of the Bill which was afterwards brought in, and in fact, after they were proposed and adopted there was little more to do than to clothe them in the technical language of an Act of Parliament. For instance, the first Resolution said that a Secretary of State should be appointed, and that all the power then held by the Board of Control, the Court of Directors, and the Court of Proprietors should be transferred to him. That was something like a Resolution. It was so drawn that it could be made into a clause of an Act of Parliament. If the right hon. Gentleman had put his Resolutions on the present occasion in that way, although I am not partial to the mode of proceeding by Resolution, I should have thought it captious to have objected to them. But the Resolutions which he has now moved are mere hungry and empty abstractions, which give us no definite idea whatever. They are simply abstract propositions, which can neither be said to be true nor false, and only derive meaning when applied to the details of the thing with which we have to deal, which is not abstract, but concrete. We are not accustomed in England to the discussion of mere general principles which a philosophical mind may extract from the details of a measure, but what we ought to have before us is some real and definite scheme. So this House has proceeded for centuries past. In this case, so far from that, I assert that the Resolutions which the House is asked to discuss do not in the least involve the matters which the right hon. Gentleman has opened to us to-night; and, if we pass them all, do not commit us to one statement he has made. If the Resolutions were made use of to conclude or to exclude something, or to mark out the limits of the Bill, I could understand them, but they really do nothing of the sort; they neither conclude nor exclude anything, and, if they did, they would be still open to this objection, why not do so by a Bill? I have no secrets to tell, because I know none; but it is perfectly notorious that there have been changes of opinion in the Government within the last fortnight on this question of Reform, and it is equally notorious that whatever difficulty the Members of the Government found in reconciling their differences of opinion, they never found any at all in making them fit into the frame of these Resolutions. They really are no framework at all, but an elastic band, which will hold whatever you choose to put into it. The first Resolution enunciates the general principle of the extension of the franchise. What trifling is this when the right hon. Gentleman has told us this evening that he proposed a £6 rating franchise for boroughs and a £20 for counties, with other collateral franchises. Why, Sir, if he had brought in a Bill with that provision it would have got rid at once of the first four Resolutions. The first four Resolutions do not help us to those proposals, yet the proposals are said to depend on the four Resolutions. The first Resolution states that the number of voters should be increased; the second, that the qualification should be reduced, and collateral franchises provided; the third, that no class shall predominate over the rest—no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will argue that such is the effect—and the fourth declares that the basis shall be rating. They tell us nothing, they prove nothing, they do nothing, whether we pass them or leave them. He might have struck the whole four out of the list, for they are all included in the single proposition of a £6 rating franchise. The right hon. Gentleman makes a statement of one set of things, over which statement the House has no jurisdiction, and then asks the House to vote upon another state of things. The right hon. Gentleman said, on Friday night, that he was going, in pursuance of the practice of Parliament, to explain the intentions of the Government with reference to the Resolutions submitted to the House. I should like to know where he finds such a practice of Parliament. Parliament, whatever faults it has, at all events has maintained its character as a business-like assembly. But is it business-like to introduce a number of abstract propositions, withholding the concrete scheme, and to ask Parliament to waste its time in the discussion of abstract theses almost too general to be submitted to boys in a debating society. I maintain that there is no precedent whatever for such an extraordinary course as that which has been taken. I racked my brains to find out the reason why it was taken, and I could find no other than the disciplina arcani, which affords a convenient method for the development of any particular doctrine that happens to be wanted. The right hon. Gentleman, in answer to a question from the noble Lord the Member for Huntingdonshire (Lord Robert Montagu), took us into his confidence, and told us why he introduced the Resolutions, and the reason is so incredible that I could hardly trust myself to state it to the House if I had not the words in my pocket to refer to. The right hon. Gentleman, in effect, said that both Whigs and Tories had tried their hands at Reform, and had failed. Therefore, said the right hon. Gentleman, the argument is irresistible that no Government hereafter ought to be turned out on the question of Reform; and he drew the collateral inference which tended to the same conclusion, that no party spirit ought to exist upon this question, but that it should be put aside altogether. Having advanced so far he went a step further, and his Parliamentary experience suggested to him that the way in which the Government was likely to be defeated on Reform was by means of abstract Resolutions, because on a former occasion some evil-minded person had moved an abstract Resolution and had defeated a Government upon it. Therefore his mode of reasoning was, if we do not move abstract Resolutions others will; and, to prevent their turning us out by them, we will take all the abstract Resolutions we can think of upon the subject and move them. This is actually the precise reason the right hon. Gentleman has given to the House for introducing these Resolutions. It was that he might bind over the House to keep the peace. We were to enter into recognizances towards the Government not to move any abstract Resolutions at all to torment them. The right hon. Gentleman is a much better tactician than I am;

but I doubt most extremely whether this was a sound way of proceeding. The House will remember the fairy tale of the princess, of whom it was foretold that she should be killed by some sharp instrument. The King banished from the court all the sharp instruments he could think of; but fate would be accomplished, and the princess was killed by the sharp point of a spindle. So, Sir, if it be the will of the House of Commons to turn out any Government, and to perform the operation by the way of abstract Resolutions, it is not thirteen, or even thirty, which would exhaust the possible number. Human ingenuity would be found equal to the task of framing yet one more for the purpose of effecting the object. But, Sir, I would ask, is it because Whigs and Tories have alike failed to carry a Reform Bill, that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues are to enjoy absolute immunity against the consequences of failure? What right have they to petition to have the mark of Cain set upon them, that nobody should kill them? I confess that I should have thought just the contrary—I should have thought that the very fact that men upon both sides had tried and failed—though no reason against future trials—yet ought to operate as a reason why you should not relax the penalty which awaits such an attempt. Surely if Governments with majorities, and Governments with minorities, have alike tried and have alike failed, the House ought not therefore to relax the Parliamentary safeguard it possesses—the power of holding the Ministry responsible for failure, the proper check on rash and ill-considered undertakings. If men undertake such a task, who have not the strength or the union to carry it through, I think we should not unduly endeavour to discourage them; but I can imagine nothing more unreasonable, in a matter of such grave importance, than to relax those safeguards which are of the highest possible value to us and to our posterity, relating to a question which ought to be entered on with the greatest deliberation, and with all the calmness, wisdom, experience, and moderation that can be given to it. As to divesting ourselves of party spirit—if we can so divest ourselves while considering this question, why not get rid of it altogether? But, Sir, party spirit is inherent in the minds of public men. Therefore the wise men who framed our Constitution said—with that true practical

English instinct which would not assume that men are not actuated by the motives which do actuate them—We will take human nature as we find it, and as we find the evil existing we will neutralize it by opposing party spirit to party spirit. Thus it is that we have the party spirit of the Government met by the party spirit of the Opposition, and we find that by the collision of both, ideas are struck out which benefit the public interests. It is the best safeguard we have; and I should think that nothing was so undesirable as that it should be removed. So far, therefore, from the argument of the right hon. Gentleman carrying conviction to my mind, it has had precisely the contrary effect; and I think that we are bound, especially in this instance, to adhere to the safeguards which exist.

Look at the constitutional relation existing between the House and the Executive Government. It was only the happy obstinacy of William III. which prevented the Executive Government from being altogether excluded from the House; but on the terms upon which it has remained its presence has been most beneficial: it has received support from us, and we from it. What was the condition upon which the Executive remained? On the condition in which alone it could remain consistently with its duty. It was that the Members of the Government should be as responsible for its acts as if they had not seats in the House; that their duties should not be absorbed in their duties as Members of Parliament; that they should owe one duty to Parliament as Members of the House, and another duty to it as Members of the Executive Government; that while the Parliament on the one hand has the power directly or indirectly to make or unmake the Government, on the other hand it should not use its power in order to coerce its liberty. If the Government is to continue responsible, it must continue free. What is it that the right hon. Gentleman now proposes? With "candied courtesy" he addressed the House in language which, as the 658th part of it, I was a little ashamed to hear, and he said—If the House will only take us into its counsels and co-operate with us in this measure, we shall receive with cordiality, with deference, nay, with gratitude, any suggestions you like. In other words the right hon. Gentleman said: "Say what you like, do what you like, but for God's sake leave us our places." I think that, pathetic as may be the tones of the entreaty, the supplication addressed to the House by the right hon. Gentleman ought not to be granted. I think we ought to hold the Government to that responsibility which all Governments undertake who bring in great measures of organic change in the Constitution. The right hon. Gentleman proposes that we should go into Committee with the distinct understanding that the Government should not be responsible for anything which is to be proposed; but that every man should be left to move any Amendment without the hand of his party leader upon him to restrain him, and that we should put the Constitution into a kind of alembic, and take the chance of what comes out of it. I say, Sir, that that is a wild, dangerous, and unconstitutional course. It puts me in mind of what happened to the children of Israel when they were desired to throw all their gold, jewellery, and ornaments into the fire. There came out—what? A calf. Now, Sir, permit me to say a word for myself and some other Members of this House. We bore rather hard upon the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire last year; and here, before I go any further, let me make an apology which it is due I should make to the House. Some time ago I wrote a letter to The Times in reply to a correspondent, in which, trusting too much to my memory, I stated that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had made an apology in this House for something that he had said with regard to some words of mine, which have been much discussed and censured. I am sorry to say that I made a mistake in that letter. If you refer to the 125th page of the right hon. Gentleman's public speeches, you will see that there was an apology for another matter, not for the one to which I referred. I can only say now that I am very sorry for it, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept this expression of my regret. There is no place where it can be better offered than here. Well, Sir, I was about to say that we bore rather hard upon the right hon. Gentleman. We said that he treated us with reserve; but I must say that his reserve was openness itself as compared with the miserable instalments of information furnished us by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The right hon. Gentleman never gave us the slightest information upon any part of his plan when he was repeatedly asked to do so, and he asks us now whether we will accept a plan to which the Government is neither pledged nor bound in any way. It is quite competent to the right hon. Gentleman to come down to this House to-morrow, and to say that the Government has changed its mind; that it is not pledged to anything in the shape of a Bill, and to leave the House with these Resolutions absolutely in vacuo. I need not point out that his speech is made in relation to nothing before us, save what we have in these abstract Resolutions, abstract Resolutions which may be taken or left without reference to the speech. I therefore beg most earnestly to press on the House the extreme inexpediency of going on with them. What possible good purpose can they serve? If we vote them all in a lump, what can we do except disgrace ourselves? Is it creditable to be fighting things of this kind? I am not going to waste time and criticism upon them. Some of them are ambiguous, and susceptible of two or three meanings, some of them mere abstractions. They do not furnish any foundation for a Bill, they are not instructions for a Bill, and the framers of a Bill will not be in the least assisted by them. The Bill itself, when it is introduced, must stand on its own merits, not on theirs, nor will the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues be in any way preserved by them. On the contrary, I believe that they will prove a trap for him, and whether that was the intention or not, their introduction will prove a fruitful source of delay, for it will be altogether out of his power to prevent any Member of this House from moving Amendments or substantive Resolutions as often as they like upon them, when in Committee. If it be the will of the House we may waste weeks or months in Committee. On the other hand, we shall have a Government, duly installed in office, renouncing its responsibility. Sir, I think this is one of the most dangerous positions possible. It is the duty of the Executive Government to give advice to this House, to initiate its business, and to decide on what propositions shall be brought forward on important public occasions. It is the business of the House to decide on the acts of the Executive Government, and, if it does not approve them, to censure them. If the House allows itself to be induced to take a consultative position—if it begins a measure which Government ought to begin, and allows itself to be asked questions and to give its views to the Government, the House will be taking away the responsibility of the Executive Government. By so doing it will expose itself to the unpopularity, and will embark upon the path which has been fatal to so many legislative assemblies. Never, in the history of the world, was there known a legislative assembly with such powers as the House of Commons that has had the moderation to confine itself within its own legitimate functions and to abstain from using, or rather abusing, its powers to coerce the Executive. When we abandon that safe course of moderation which has been handed down to us by our forefathers, we are in a fair way of transforming this great legislative instrument into something like a convention, and reducing the Executive Government into the station of clerks who fulfil our orders, instead of, as they now do, guiding and leading us, forming the connecting link between the Sovereign on the one side, and the public of this country on the other. The consideration of these Resolutions in Committee is absolutely useless and worthless. I defy anyone to suggest any useful purpose which it may serve; but it may do incalculable mischief by setting the whole thing adrift, so that no man can tell where it will stop. I do not want to take any course hostile to the Government, who I trust will meet the House half way. I am in hopes that they will see that there is reason in what I say, and that they will withdraw these Resolutions and undertake to bring in a Bill. We have to-night heard a statement which would be a sufficient preface to the introduction of a Bill. Nothing is needed but its reduction into clauses. The consideration of these Resolutions would be an exercitation which would be most discreditable to the House of Commons, and most prejudicial to the interests of the public. We have much legislative business in arrear, and we ought not to waste time upon empty propositions, many of which do not at all apply to the measure. I therefore earnestly press upon the Government the propriety of re-considering the question. I shall refuse my assent to your leaving the Chair, if it be only to record my protest against the encroachment upon most valuable Parliamentary usages and traditions, to which we owe it that we have in this House been able to discharge both Executive and legislative functions without injury and indignity to either.

I might conclude here, but, encouraged by the kindness of the House, I am anxious to say one word for myself upon this question of Reform. The House is well acquainted with the position that I have taken up. I consider that the burden of proof is on those who attack our existing institutions, and that I am bound to hold to what exists until something better is shown. That was, is, and always will be, my opinion; but I believe that I am nearly solitary in entertaining it. I have never been able to persuade anybody to adopt the process that I have recommended:—"Examine our institutions, see what is wrong, and then amend it." I have never been favoured with any answer. The recommendation has been simply ignored, and the reply seems to be, "How can you say that a Reform Bill is not wanted when I have one ready drawn up in my pocket?" All I can say is that I am not going to weary the House any more by defending the ground that I have unsuccessfully maintained; and I desire in the future to be regarded as ready to go heartily and honestly into any proposition for Reform that is laid before us, and to do anything that I can to make it an efficient and useful measure. I say this in order that it may not be thought that, in what I am about to add, I am acting in a spirit of hostility towards any measure that may be proposed. But I do think that the position which we now occupy is a most unsatisfactory one. You see what the Government have proposed. They ask us to go into Committee upon the Resolutions, but no one can see what may come out of that Committee. It was said, at the time of the old Reform Bill, that we were within twenty-four hours of a revolution. I believe that we have been within much fewer hours than that of household suffrage. I am not going to argue the question; but I, in common with a great many other Members of this House, hold household suffrage in very considerable dread. It was for that reason that I most unwillingly opposed the Bill introduced by the Government last year; because I believe that any resting-place that you suggest between the present franchise and household suffrage will be a very temporary abode. It seems to have been carried in this House, not by argument, but by acclamation, that we are not to remain as we are, but to commence that course which leads direct to disaster. It reminds me of what may frequently be witnessed upon the Alps. You see before you a snow slope, down which you are invited to slide, to which you reply, "No, I should like to go as far only as that rock, and then I will dig in my pole a little deeper, and will pull up." You try the experiment, and you find that you turn head over heels and go headlong to the bottom. That is a homely illustration of my views and of those of many Members of this House. To those who are satisfied with household suffrage, or to those who think that they will find a resting-place in a £5, £6, or £7 franchise, I have, of course, nothing to say; but of those who, like me, are convinced that the first is ruinous and the second impossible, I earnestly beg that they will re-consider the whole question. Time will be required for the preparation of the Government measure. That time will not be thrown away if it is employed in a little examination of the principles of Reform. It appears to me that the principle of a fancy franchise is of itself a bad one, because I understand by it an arbitrary connection between two things which have no necessary connection with each other. When you fix upon an incident, like that of a man being an M.A., or of his having a house of a particular value, or anything of that kind, upon which to found the franchise, you put together two things that have no necessary connection with each other. Such a view is a most imperfect one, and does not and cannot exhaust the question. What I desire is that we should go a little deeper into the question, and try if we cannot find some better principle than that. If we are to invent new machinery for determining who shall have a share in the full office of citizen, and in deciding upon the government of the State by appointing its governors, it seems to me that we ought to consider not a man's property, his status, or such things as that, but his relations towards the State, the full citizenship of which he claims. The principle you ought to seek to establish should be drawn from his performing his full duties towards the State. I therefore hold that, if we were going into the thing anew, the proper foundation of a Parliamentary franchise would be the bearing of all State burdens. Instead of fastening upon some particular incident, you should look at the man in reference to the State whose welfare you intrust to him. It seems to me that a man so poor that he is excused on the ground of poverty from bearing any burdens due to the State, though entitled to the rights of a citizen, is not in a condition to impose burdens upon others, because he is imposing upon others burdens from which he himself is on the ground of poverty excused. I think, further, that the franchise should not attach to any particular kind of property, because that is a clumsy way of getting at classes. It is an awkward thing to give a vote because a man has a house of a certain value; and then because a man is an M.A. We ought to have some principle that will take in those above the line of £10 as well as those below. It is right that the élite of the working classes should be admitted to the franchise. That is all that was professed to be done by the Bill of last year, though the words of my right hon. Friend were rather wide, and I am not aware that more is proposed this year. It is a great omission in the Bill of the Government that they do not deal with the important question of lodgers. If universal suffrage finds its way into this country it will be through the lodger franchise if neglected. You will go on lowering the franchise for houses until there comes to be a great disparity between tenants and lodgers, and then the lodgers will get it removed; and as everyone is either a householder or a lodger, unless like Diogenes he lives in a tub, or sleeps under the dry arches of Waterloo Bridge, you will get a very low franchise indeed. This is a matter that calls most imperiously for arrangement. How are all these things to be reconciled? It seems to me in a very simple manner. If you retain the existing constituencies in boroughs, and add to them all payers of income tax, you will go a great way to do what I want, by giving a gradual and safe extension of the power of voting, and if you consider the income tax too high you may lower it. Look at the advantages you would gain. You would include the upper classes who are now without the franchise. I lately received a letter from a correspondent who told me of three managers of public companies in a county town who received salaries of £1,000 a year each, but not one of whom had a vote. You would settle the lodger question in the most satisfactory manner. You would admit a great number of the working classes—certainly the élite—because £2 a week is by no means high wages for a skilled artisan. Therefore, if we were arguing this question in the Republic of Plato, instead of in free Romuli, I should have great hopes of this proposal, and that not only for what it does, but for what it does not do. It does not, under the form and pretence of admitting persons to a voice in the Constitution, give them all the power in the State. It does not, while speaking of the élite of the working classes, hand over power to the poor in a body. And it would have this safeguard, that such a payment of income tax, being not something different from the franchise, but being the franchise itself, could not be separated from it; and further, that the franchise being attached to a burden, the tendency to lowering is corrected, because as you lower the franchise the burden becomes more onerous, and therefore, instead of always having a tendency towards enlargement—towards universal suffrage—the income tax franchise carries with it its own check. I do not, under the circumstances of the case, expect that anyone will pay any attention to this opinion; but I am bound to say that, if not right in itself, it is a specimen of the direction in which we ought to look for the extension of the franchise. There may be some other plan which persons who are better informed than I am can devise for carrying out the idea; but it is in the direction of the public burdens, rather than of rent or rating, that we should look for the enlargement of the franchise. I hope that, anxious as the House is for the settlement of this question, they will not think it necessary to act in a spirit either of panic or precipitation. Nothing of the kind is needed. There was never less excuse for such feelings. The meetings that have been held throughout the country have died away and left scarcely an echo behind. Though organized at considerable expense, and supported by the most unsparing misrepresentation and abuse—they have failed to take hold of the mind of the nation. As for the “metropolitan demonstrations,” they have demonstrated nothing except the impotence and vanity of their authors. It is not by men decked with ribands or bedizened with scarves that the foundations of ancient monarchies are shaken. I believe that the mind of the public at large, of the educated public, of the possessors of property, is singularly well disposed towards settling this question. The agitators who go about the country preaching manhood suffrage, nothing that we can do, or that any set of reasonable beings can do, will satisfy; but the great mass of the country would, I believe, be satisfied very easily indeed. Let us, then, give up this miserable auction—this competition between two parties which can bid the lowest, at which the country is put up for sale and knocked down to the person who can produce the readiest and swiftest measure for its destruction. We have this matter still in our own hands. Let us bid a long adieu to shams and pretences. Let us deal with the matter frankly. Let us call upon the Government to withdraw their Resolutions, to introduce a Bill, and to bring the matter to an issue fairly and plainly in the old English fashion, and deal with it in our own downright way. There is no danger—there is every safety in such a proceeding. But there is enormous danger in throwing the question loose before the House. Every Member will be urged by his constituency, and we shall be hounded on by a portion of the press, who will point out one Member after another who seems to hang back in the race for bringing down the institutions of this country as speedily as possible to the level of democracy. Therefore, I appeal to you to act boldly and decidedly. Touch the nettle with timid hand it stings you, and you drop it; grasp it firmly you are unhurt, and tear it up by the roots.

MR. BRIGHT: I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has not taken some definite mode of bringing the proposal he has made to the decision of the House; because I think there never was a proposal made to this House—I speak of his observations on the abandonment of the Resolutions—that more entirely agreed with the almost universal feeling. I am not speaking of what is thought on this side only I speak also of what is thought on the other side of the House. I do not believe among the ranks opposite me there is a single Member of the Treasury Bench who really believes that the course that has been taken by the Government is a wise one, or one that ought to be persisted in. Hon. Gentlemen show it in their faces. They feel beyond all question that their principal Minister in this House has led them into a very ludicrous position—and not them only, but that there is great danger of his leading the House also into it. His speech, which we have heard to-night, and which is so definite, shows how much easier it is to make a speech which says something than a speech which says nothing. The right hon. Gentleman took two hours to say nothing a fortnight ago, and one hour to-night to say a great deal. If the latter had been delivered a fortnight ago, during the whole of this time we should have had an opportunity of fairly canvassing the proposals of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) was doubtless correct in his assumption that probably up to Saturday last the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) and his Colleagues had not decided what to propose. They come forward now with a statement which clearly makes the Resolutions out of place. The officers of the Government to whom these things are generally intrusted put every single proposal of the right hon. Gentleman's speech into a Bill, in correct language, so as to be laid on the table this day week. I say, therefore, with the right hon. Gentleman below me, to go into a discussion on the Resolutions is merely a waste of time. But to go into a discussion of them with a view of treating them as we were invited to treat them a fortnight ago would be much more than a waste of time, for it would be to throw this question of Reform, which, after all, is a question of some seriousness, into a Parliamentary chaos, and at the same time it would depreciate, to an immeasurable degree, the character and the power in future time of the Executive Government in this House. The right hon. Gentleman a fortnight ago flattered us by telling us how superior we are to certain legislative assemblies in other countries, and he referred, amongst others, to the one which sits at Washington. Now, I undertake to say that there has been no proposal made to this House, during the four-and-twenty years I have been here, which has tended so much to Americanise the House of Commons—the chief legislative Assembly of this country—as the proposal which the Government has made to-night. What takes place at Washington? Mr. Seward, Mr. Stanton, and other eminent men, heads of departments under the President, do not make their appearance in the House of Representatives, or even in the Senate. These two Assemblies discuss any measures they like; they pass any measures they like, and it is not necessary that they should consult the President or his Ministers. So here. Ministers are to sit on that Bench, and, as a newspaper which has lately been doing its best to

lash the Colleagues of the right hon. Gentleman into some obedience to his views, says, the right hon. Gentleman is to stand at the counter in a decorous garb, as if he were in Swan and Edgar's, and ask whether there is "anything more, gentlemen, you would like?" I say, then, that the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne ought to be taken. The Government should withdraw these Resolutions, which will serve only to waste our time and to embarrass the question; and then they ought to bring in a distinct and definite Bill this day week, and submit it, manfully, to discussion and the decision of Parliament, as was done, by the right hon. Gentleman who sits on these Benches, last year. What becomes of all your arguments against the right hon. Gentleman? Was it not one of your first arguments that the plan he submitted to the House was crude and ill-adjusted? But was there ever anything submitted to this House before, by any Minister of the Crown, so ludicrously crude as the proposal which the right hon. Gentleman has submitted by the Resolutions which are on the table? Did not nearly every speaker I see before me, either of his own invention, or, what is more likely, following the lead of somebody now on the Treasury Bench, say last year that the measure introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was fragmentary to the last degree; and that it would be quite out of the question for Parliament to decide what should be done till they saw everything? Did not the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) make a speech which Gentlemen opposite, having great credulity, believed to be unanswerable. But, unanswerable or not, it amounted to this:—that Parliament would not agree to a certain thing, at the invitation of a Minister, till they saw precisely that which the House would be likely to agree to in regard to some other proposal affecting the general question. Hon Gentlemen opposite must find themselves in a curious position. You have been kept in the dark, we are told, until half past two to-day. What was told you at half past two is, of course, not publicly known. But you have heard to-night from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman what are the proposals he is willing to make to the House, if the House will pass a certain number of Resolutions which have really almost nothing to do with the proposals he wishes us hereafter to discuss. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) has made some reference to the sketch of a Bill which the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) has shadowed forth. Not knowing what the House will do with regard to the Resolutions, whether we shall go into Committee on them or not, I shall take the liberty, on this first occasion, of saying a few words with regard to the proposed measure. Let me ask the House what it is that is wanted by the country, or, if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne takes objection to the phrase, I will modify it so far as to say, by those who ask Parliament to grant some considerable measure of franchise extension? It is notorious to every man—the right hon. Gentleman himself will not deny it—that meetings have been held at which many hundreds of thousands of persons—I speak of the aggregate—have attended, and it is known to every man living in the districts in which those meetings were held, that the universal sympathy of the working classes went with the persons present at them. What have they asked? They ask the House of Commons that the barrier, which was put up in 1832, shall be thrown down—some that it shall be thrown down to let in the bulk of those who are disfranchised, so that they may come in; whilst multitudes of others ask that it shall be carried so far only that a large portion, such as would sensibly affect the representation, shall be admitted. The Bill introduced by the Government last year proposed, at an extravagant computation, which no man can prove to have been true, to admit about 204,000 persons to the franchise. These would have been admitted by the abolition of the ratepaying clauses in the Reform Act as it stands, and by having no ratepaying clauses for the new voters of values from £7 to £10; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire assumed that the entire number of new voters would be 204,000. Now, what is it the coming Bill proposes to do? Instead of a £7 rental, it proposes a £6 rating qualification, which will vary according to the system prevailing in different boroughs. In some, possibly, there may be a few persons to whom it would be about the same as a £7 or £7 10s. rental; but it will vary from £7 to £10, and I will undertake to say it would not be equal for all the boroughs of England to an £8 rental franchise. The right hon. Gentleman argues that that would admit 130,000, and he proposes other franchises, of which I will say no more now than that, generally speaking, persons who are investors in the funds, or who pay direct taxes, or are investors in savings banks, or who possess education such as is supposed in his scheme, must have votes at present. The right hon. Gentleman's computation is framed, like his computation of 1859, upon nothing better than the loosest guessing; and I do not think it is worthy the consideration of the House, in a question of reducing the franchise and admitting the working classes to vote. He said he took it that the House had decided the question of rating last Session, and therefore he chose a rating franchise. He knows perfectly well it is not the best franchise; but it served to destroy the last Bill, and to overthrow the Government. It served a Minister who now preaches a total absence of all party spirit, and he proposes that we should accept the rating franchise as a thing settled definitely by Parliament. But why, when he came to the county franchise, did not he accept the vote come to last Session relative to the county franchise? This House, after a debate and a division upon an Amendment, moved by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole), decided in favour of a £14 qualification for the counties. Why has not the right hon. Gentleman the liberality and the manliness to accept an accidental, if you choose to call it so, but certainly a deliberate vote of the House of Commons, which was favourable to the extension of the franchise in the counties, when he accepts one that was unfavourable to its extension in the boroughs? The right hon. Gentleman proposes to enfranchise 130,000 new voters in the boroughs, and 82,000 in the counties; he extends to the counties those most childish qualifications of a £30 savings bank investment, a £50 investment in the funds, and the payment of 20s. direct taxation. Why, under this Bill, a ratcatcher who keeps four dogs would pay a direct tax to the amount of 20s., and, of course, would come into that new constituency, which the right hon. Gentleman says is to save this country from destruction. I ask the House, whether they believe that the project of the right hon. Gentleman, putting out of consideration the distribution of seats, will settle, or do anything to settle, the question of the franchise? The right hon. Gentleman assumes that the House is almost unanimous for something, and is willing to accept and pass a Reform Bill. But, there may be a great and substantial difference, a perilous difference, between a Reform Bill and Reform. I tell the House, in all honesty, for I never use subterfuge in speaking on this question, that if you permit your Minister to go so far, unsettling what now exists and settling nothing, you permit him to do whatever mischief may lurk in his proposal; and, if you will not let him go further if he were so disposed, you cripple him from doing an act which I will venture to say that twenty years hence every man of you who may be living will rejoice that there were Ministers at this day to do. Have you not read what has been in the public papers during the last six months? Have you not heard or read what has been said at public meetings of every kind? There have been more than 1,000 public meetings; at every one, the doors were open, and any man could come in, whatever his opinions, and the all but unanimous vote of these meetings has been in favour of something much larger and more complete than the plan of the right hon. Gentleman. There has not been, so far as I know, during the whole of that time a single real public meeting which has asked for, or even hinted that it would like, a proposal like that which the right hon. Gentleman has submitted to the House. I am appealing to hon. Members opposite in their new position. You are not anti-Reformers now. I believe the season of transformation is almost over at the theatres; but it appears to extend so long and so far as this in the House of Commons. Last Session there was no language too violent for you to use against the moderate proposals of the then Government, and you will have now to get up and to unsay all you said, and to try to say the exact opposite in support of the present Government. But I will not quarrel with you for that; you have as much right to change your opinions as the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) has to change his. His speech to-night—though he may quarrel with me for saying so—is a wiser speech than any I heard him make last Session; and if he advances and improves at the pace at which he is evidently travelling, I have no doubt that, before this question is settled, we shall have something very lucid from him in favour of a substantial Parliamentary Reform. But hon. Gentlemen opposite have become Reformers. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) is a Reformer now, and I will not charge him with wearing a mask. Eight or nine years ago, when the present Chancellor of the Exchequer came down in the same office to the opening of Parliament, he had two Colleagues by him (Mr. Walpole and Mr. Henley), and at the end of a fortnight or three weeks, when the Reform Bill was introduced, those Colleagues retreated to the back Bench, and one of them told the House that during that period he had worn a mask and was tired of it, and he wished us to believe it was a very unpleasant process. The right hon. Member for Huntingdon, the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne), the President of the Board of Trade (Sir Stafford Northcote) are not wearing masks. They have cast off the musty habiliments of last year, now come before us as Reformers, and hon. Gentlemen opposite have agreed to follow them. If I use words of ridicule on that change of opinion, do not for a moment believe that I regret it. I am very glad you are Reformers; what is more, you will be glad of it too hereafter; and your children, when they look back on the records of this Parliament, will judge you the more favourably as the more honestly, generously, and completely you do the work which now apparently you are permitting Ministers to try to do. Last Session I took the liberty of telling hon. Gentlemen opposite that though they got rid of that Bill and of the Government, they would not get rid of the question of Reform, and that they would have to settle that with the great people of the United Kingdom; and now they come down to Parliament and are trying to settle it. Do not try to settle it in a hocus-pocus fashion, which many in this House would agree to without reference to persons outside. Persons outside know that this House is not in favour of any far-reaching or complete measure of Reform; and if it had not been for the great pressure outside, neither the present Government, nor that which lost office last Session, nor any which has existed for the last fifteen years, would have undertaken such a great and dangerous question. But if it be such a question, why will you not attempt at least to step so far forward as that we can meet the views and the honest sympathies and desires of the most intelligent and resolved portion of that great body of the people which is now excluded? If you tinker this little Bill, if you stick to this £6 rating franchise, you touch the lips but leave the palate dry. The great body of the people will repudiate the measure; and I venture to say that in the very first Session of Parliament which is held after the elections under the Bill, you will have further propositions made to the House, certainly with respect to the franchise, and I believe also with respect to the distribution of seats. The right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) some years ago, just before he was Leader of your party, made a remarkable speech on another question, in which he showed how very awkward and almost impossible it was for a Member of this House, in office, to undertake to carry great questions, to which, when in Opposition, he had been constantly opposed. I will give you a quotation from the speech he then made, which shows what the right hon. Gentleman might now have said if he had been sitting on these Benches. It was on the subject of the endowment of Maynooth, for which Sir Robert Peel had introduced a Bill. He (the right hon. Gentleman opposite) opposed the Bill on account of the men by whom it was brought forward. He said—

"I do not think that the Gentlemen who are now seated on the Treasury Bench are morally entitled to bring such a measure forward. This measure, Sir, involves a principle, against which the right hon. Gentleman and most of his Colleagues have all along signally struggled. When I recall to mind all the speeches and all the Motions, and all the votes which have emanated from the present occupants of the Treasury Bench on this and analogous questions. . . . I consider that it would be worse than useless to dwell at any length upon the circumstances which induce me to adopt this opinion. And are we to be told that because those men who took the course to which I have referred have crossed the floor of this House and have abandoned, with their former seats, their former professions, are we to be told that these men's measures and actions are to remain uncriticised and unopposed, because they tell us to look to the merits of their measures, and forget themselves and their former protestations? . . . I appeal to the noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell), the hereditary Leader of the Whig party, he will, I am sure, not withhold his concurrence with the principles I have laid down. That noble Lord, the representative of Mr. Fox, will not gainsay the motto of that great Leader, 'men not measures,' and I would ask hon. Gentlemen on this side, how has the opposite system answered for them? You have permitted men to gain power, and enter place, and then carry measures exactly the reverse to those which they professed in Opposition, and carry those measures by the very means and machinery by which they conducted the Opposition and by which they gained power. You are reconciled to this procedure by being persuaded that by carrying measures which you disapprove of and they pretend to disrelish, they are making what they call 'the best bargain' for you. Here is a Minister who habitually brings forward as his own measures those very schemes and proposals to which, when in Opposition, he always avowed himself a bitter and determined opponent. . . . But let me ask the admirers of 'the best bargain' system how they think the right hon. Gentleman would have acted had they been introduced by the noble Lord opposite."—[3 Hansard, lxxix. 561.]

I might say, by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) who sits there. Now, do not let it be supposed that if hon. Gentlemen opposite are anxious to carry a real, substantial, conclusive, and satisfactory Bill, if they are ready to support such a measure, do not let them suppose for a moment that because I am not of their party, or because they have opposed all the propositions made upon this subject, and those which I have been concerned with in particular, I shall factiously oppose their Bill. But, having now turned round and become Reformers, having concluded at half past two to-day that they would allow the right hon. Gentleman to appear in a new character as a Reformer in this House, I ask them for their own sake and for his sake, and for what is worth infinitely more than their reputation, or his official position, I ask them for the interest of this great cause, and for the satisfaction of an excited and anxious people, that this measure, if it is to be passed this Session, shall be one at least which shall release me, and every other man who is in favour of Reform, from any further discussion and agitation of the question during our Parliamentary lives.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the last words of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down furnish to my mind the very strongest argument in favour of the proceeding to which he objects. He taunts my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to a speech of his on a former occasion, as if that speech shows that in the proposal he is now making he is retracting the opinions he formerly professed. According to the argument of the hon. Member my right hon. Friend has only just become a Reformer. But the hon. Member knows perfectly well that in the year 1859 my right hon. Friend proposed a measure to this House for the extension of the franchise which, with regard to the savings banks, with regard to education, with regard to funded property and direct taxation was, in effect, the same as the measure now before the House. What is the use, then, of digging out quotations from Hansard which have really no relevancy to the question before us? But the hon. Gentleman says he desires a settlement of this question. How, I would ask, can he have that except by proceeding in such a manner as will enable the House to come to an agreement on the subject? The hon. Gentleman further, objecting to our mode of proceeding, says that we on this side opposed the Bill of the late Government because it was a crude and fragmentary measure. We did object to it as a crude and fragmentary measure. It related only to one part of the subject—the suffrage. It was crude and fragmentary in that. It did not touch the question of re-distribution. It was crude and fragmentary in that. It did not touch the question of corrupt practices at elections. The same objection applies. But the Resolutions now before the House embrace all these points. Instead of being crude and fragmentary they constitute a large and comprehensive measure, and one which I firmly believe, if the proceedings now suggested by the Government are carried into effect, will be more likely to lead to a settlement of this question than any proposal which, during the last fifteen years, has been brought before the House. My right hon. Friend the Member for Calne, followed by the hon. Member for Birmingham, take great exception to proceeding by Resolutions; and they both invite the Government to withdraw these Resolutions. My belief is that it would be an utter mistake to withdraw the Resolutions; and I think there are reasons, and cogent reasons, why we should endeavour to do what we can towards that which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer so strongly, as well as so fairly and so frankly, urged upon us—namely, the complete settlement of this question. There are two things which are of immense importance. The one is, that after all the discussion this subject has undergone we should come to a satisfactory, and, if possible, a conclusive settlement, in the present Session. The other is—not as my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne seems to intimate—that the Government should abandon all responsibility in the matter, but that they should, by a series of Resolutions laid before the House, enable the House to co-operate with them in eliminating those points upon which we are agreed, and to pronounce its opinion upon those subjects which it has been thought necessary to introduce into a measure of Reform. We shall thus be, for the first time, furnished with starting points for the settlement of the question. For what has happened? We have had six different Bills on the subject within a period of fifteen years. We have had Bills rejected without having ever come to a conclusion on any one point, except that of the rating qualification in boroughs. [An hon. Member: And the county franchise.] Yes, and the county franchise. These are the only points on which you have come to a conclusion after fifteen years of discussion. Now, if you are desirous of arriving at a settlement of the question, every Resolution which you pass embodying a principle will form a good foundation on which to proceed hereafter. You may bring in Bill after Bill, and yet be as far as ever from the attainment of your object. But again, my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne seems to think that the Government are going to abandon their Executive functions in dealing with this subject, and are not prepared to stand or fall on the principles which they deem to be necessary with a view to its solution. Now, no such language as that ever escaped the lips of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Government will stand or fall on those principles which they believe to be vital and just, and therefore essential to the proper working of the Constitution. If that be so, is it of no advantage that hon. Members on both sides of the House should have an opportunity of discussing, in detail, the principles upon which it is proposed to legislate? Is to afford them that opportunity an unfair way to treat the House, or does it not rather put them in the fullest possession of the whole subject? This consideration furnishes the second reason why I think it desirable to proceed by Resolution. A third, which ought, it seems to me, to have great weight with hon. Members is this—that if we were to proceed in the first instance by way of Bill, there would not be that facility for bringing forward the various views entertained on this question by hon. Members which, in Committee of the Whole House when discussing the Resolutions, will be afforded. In my opinion Parliament will gain a great advantage by forcing the course which we propose [for adoption on those who advocate one set of measures within the House and another out of doors. We have heard of demonstrations and public meetings throughout the country, some of which have been attended by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), whose avowed object was not to support any measure which he has proposed here, but one which went far beyond any such scheme. He assumed to himself the merit of being a Reformer in the spirit of the men by whom those meetings were convened; but he will not venture within these walls to submit to our notice proposals which they regard as the only ones calculated to effect a permanent settlement of the question. We have in the House of Commons at the present moment more than two parties. We have those who hold Conservative opinions. We have those more moderate Liberals, usually designated as the old Whig party. We have the philosophical Reformers. We have what are called the advanced Liberals. Between the two former parties the difference which exists is slight, both with regard to the franchise and the re-distribution of seats. A liberal measure acceptable to one would be also to the other. When, however, we come to the philosophical Reformers, and the advanced Liberals, as represented by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), and the hon. Member for Birmingham, it will be seen they will have no fair opportunity of laying their views on this subject before us, unless it be in Committee of the Whole House. The former could hardly introduce his opinions in a Bill. It is true we know the opinions which are entertained by the hon. Member for Birmingham with respect to the re-distribution of seats from that memorable schedule which he drew up in conjunction with the hon. Member for Edinburgh; but then I should like to have his propositions before us in the shape of a Resolution, so that we might see whether his scheme or ours will turn out to be the more in accordance with the feelings of the House. The same remarks apply to the question of the reduction of the franchise. Instead, therefore, of our having adopted a course of proceeding calculated to impede the settlement of this question, or to prevent hon. Members from laying their views before us, I cannot help thinking that had those been our objects they would have been more completely secured if instead of Resolutions we had introduced a Bill. My right hon. Friend the Member for Calne touched on certain principles upon which in his opinion we ought to proceed; but the principles which he lays down are those, I would remind him, on which our proposals are based—namely, that taxation and representation should go together. The hon. Member for Birmingham says that the Bill of last year did away with the ratepaying clauses, but one of the main objections to the measure was that it proposed to enable those who did not pay to govern; while we contend that the franchise ought to be given to those who do pay, in order that taxation and representation might go together. I forbear from entering on the present occasion into a full discussion of the Resolutions of the Government, because they are not distinctly before the House. I venture to say, however, that in principle our measure meets the requirements of the case. It is rooted in well-known principles, principles which are a part of the Constitution, and are therefore likely to last. It embodies in its provisions a large and free extension of the franchise; but while it does that it embraces those Conservative elements that will ensure permanence and prosperity to the Constitution and the country.

Mr. LAING said, that in the re-distribution scheme of last Session it was proposed to take forty-nine seats in all from the smaller boroughs, and to assign seven of them to Scotland. He wished to know how the present Government proposed to deal with that country with respect to those seven seats. He did not speak as an advocate of Scotch interests, when he said that the necessity for Scotland obtaining every one of those seats was based on principles of justice and expediency, if a reform of the representation were to be attempted at all. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had informed them that in accordance with his scheme twenty-three seats would be taken from the small boroughs in England, in addition to which he would have seven others at his disposal, in consequence of the very proper disfranchisement of four boroughs on account of bribery. The whole of those seats, he added, were to be devoted to increasing the representation of English counties and towns; but he made no mention of the important question how the increased representation of Scotland was to be secured. He should like to know from him, under those circumstances, whether he meant to add seven to the total number of Members in that House, or, if not, in what manner he intended to meet the just claims of Scotland. Did he propose, for instance, that while English counties, with a population of 150,000, should be made up to three Members, Scotch counties with 300,000 should remain with a single Member? Was it seriously proposed that a Member was to be given to the London University, while the Universities of Scotland were to remain without having representatives allotted to them? But the complaint he made as a representative of Scotland was of minor importance, compared with that which he made as a representative of the United Kingdom—namely, that there was a general want of finality in the scheme proposed by the Government. In his opinion, finality should be made the cardinal point in any scheme of Reform, and acting upon that belief he had, on one occasion, during the last Session, given his vote against the party with which he generally acted, on the ground that the Government scheme did not include re-distribution, and was therefore not final. The great danger consisted, not so much in a large and liberal reduction of the franchise, as in the prevalence of the idea that the Constitution required perpetual tinkering and patching up. The Government scheme of last year proposed to take away forty-nine Members from the small boroughs, and to deprive all small boroughs, with a population under 8,000, having two Members, of their second Member, whereas by the present scheme only twenty-two Members were to be taken from them, and it was only from boroughs with a population of under 7,000 that the second Member was to be taken away. If they were to make a great and comprehensive settlement of the question of Reform, they could not reasonably expect the country to be satisfied with any scheme of re-distribution which left a second Member to any borough with a less population than that of 10,000. In addition to this, there ought to be some grouping of small boroughs. He did not say that the system of grouping proposed last year was perfect. No measure of Reform could be said to be a final solution of the question which left two Members to Chippenham or Bridgnorth with a population of 7,000, while large and important cities, the centres of the great branches of national industry, like Dundee or Merthyr Tydvil, had only a single Member. The same objection that applied to the re-distribution part of the Government scheme equally attached to that portion of it which related to the lowering of the franchise. He felt that there was much force in the observation of the right hon. Member for Calne that if the £10 franchise were once departed from, household suffrage would inevitably be forced upon the country. He had therefore hoped that the present Government would have adopted at once a household rating franchise, coupled with certain tempering provisions calculated to prevent the ascendancy of mere numbers, instead of endeavouring to stop at the half-way-house of a £6 rating franchise. It was evident to him, from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that some such proposal was not far from being one which he, unshackled and free to produce what he thought the best scheme, would have laid before the House on this occasion; for he told the House very distinctly that he thought the system, not of plurality, which would obviously be invidious, but of duality, might have been adopted with great public advantage; that as the Government represented persons and property, so, in respect of persons, every man who lived in a rated house ought to have a vote, while in respect of property, every man who paid by direct taxes to the State should have a vote; and that if the two qualifications happened to be united in the same head, he should have a double vote. If a large and comprehensive scheme based upon household rating suffrage, coupled with reasonable checks, had been brought forward by a Conservative Government and supported by the Conservative party, it might have been accepted even by very advanced Liberal Members as a fair solution of this question. If the only difference between the Bill of the present Session and that of last year was a £6 rating against a £7 occupation franchise in boroughs, and a £20 rating against a £14 occupation franchise in counties, he was afraid the country might ask why the House of Commons had not come to some settlement of this long-vexed question last year, instead of forcing the Ministry to resign, and of exposing the country to long-continued agitation. Without committing himself to any expression of opinion as to the course it might be thought proper to adopt, after due deliberation, with regard to these proposals, he must express his strong opinion that the scheme in respect of the re-distribution bution of seats was glaringly imperfect, and could not stand; and, with respect to the franchise, the opposite principle to that proposed would have been the wiser and more Conservative solution of the question.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I do not propose to go over the controversial portion of the ground occupied during this debate, and occupied in common by my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne or my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham; but I think they deserve our thanks, as they have been the means of eliciting from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department the declaration which is undoubtedly important, and which is supposed to be—I do not say whether it is, because I am not, perhaps, a competent judge on that point—but which is supposed to be entirely different from the declaration we received from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the occasion of his first bringing these Resolutions before the House. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department—and I do not want in any degree to establish the fact of the supposed contradiction—enables me to express the great satisfaction with which I listened to him when he said—I use nearly his own words—that it is the intention of the Government to stand or fall by principles which they may deem vital in the settlement of this question. This important declaration shows us that the Government are conscious of the weight of the question which they have taken in hand, and that they will justly endeavour to fortify themselves with all that authority that accrues to a Government in the prosecution of such a subject by the knowledge that it stakes its existence upon it. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman opposite has to-night laid before us, with very considerable clearness—when I take into view the multitude of points embraced in so wide a scheme as that laid before us—I say with considerable clearness—the principal outlines of the plan of the Government, and he has likewise conveyed to the House the intention of the Government that we are to be called upon to follow the method of procedure originally indicated when bringing these Resolutions first before you. I will divide the little I have to say into two parts, and will first advert to one or two points connected with the plan itself. This is not an occasion on which at a moment's notice we ought to be called upon or expected to give a distinctive opinion on the character of the measure. But I will make an observation or two which may tend, without introducing asperity into the debate, to clear up certain points, and bring out some explanation. I wish to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government by what information to be presented to the House, they sustain the estimates of the number of persons to be admitted to the franchise by the various changes contemplated which he has stated. That, he will perceive, is a matter of considerable importance, and I frankly own I am the more desirous of being in possession of that information, because as to a certain portion of his figures I listened to them with some incredulity, and it is most desirable we should be right in the matter. The most important point in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman is that part which related to the number of persons to be admitted to the suffrage by the lowering from a £10 annual value to a £6 rating; and I dwell the more pointedly on this subject, because it was one which it was our duty to consider in the course of the last year, when we were in possession of figures provided by the most competent authorities, and when we endeavoured to estimate for ourselves as accurately as possible the number of persons to be admitted to the franchise by the reduction from a £10 annual value to a £6 rating. The right hon. Gentleman stated the number at 130,000; but, according to the best computation we were able to make, the number did not exceed 105,000. I am desirous that we should go to the root of the matter. And here I may allude to the total amount of enfranchisement which he proposes in boroughs, although, according to my view of the matter, it is not very necessary to consider that portion of the borough franchise which does not concern the labouring classes. Whatever may be the effect upon the vote of this or that Gentleman, I will state the estimate I form of the difference between the plan of last year and the plan of the Government this year with respect to the number of the labouring classes proposed to be enfranchised in boroughs. I admit, with the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) and the hon. Member for Birmingham, that we gave a liberal and, perhaps, lax definition of the class “working men,” but we proceeded on the definition to which we have been accustomed. We, by the provision for reducing the value from £10 to a £7 gross estimated rental by the provision relating to the class of compound householders, and the provision relating to lodgers, estimated in the boroughs an increase in the suffrage to the extent of 200,000, the whole of which essentially belonged to the labouring classes. The franchise we proposed, with respect to depositors in savings banks, we considered of such limited operation that we could not venture to state any figure which that franchise might possibly produce. We believed it to be unexceptionable in principle, but that its effect would be inappreciable. Instead of 200,000, the right hon. Gentleman admits no more than about 100,000. I take the effect of the £6 rating would be the admission of 100,000 persons to the franchise. The admission to the franchise, for degrees and certificates, will have no appreciable effect on the labouring class, and the franchise arising from money in the funds will have no operation in that direction. With regard to the franchise connected with savings banks, whilst I must confess that I am doubtful on many points as to that franchise, in the form it has for the first time assumed in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, yet, even if he gets his 35,000 real and true voters, and not fag-got voters, they could not be properly taken as fair representatives of the labouring class. The number of artizans and mechanics who deposit in savings banks is unfortunately very small. And what is more, in the old savings banks there are found as depositors a considerable number of persons who have been in a situation assimilated with the labouring class, but who are the most dependent portion of them—namely, domestic servants, and therefore cannot be counted with the independent portion of the labouring classes. My hon. Friend the Member for Wick has referred to the important question of finality, and I may use the word, because we all understand what is meant by it. The hon. Member for Wick and the hon. Member for Birmingham are not far distant in their views. The hon. Member for Birmingham gave utterance to what I presume to be a common sentiment when he said that our desire was to get rid of the subject for the remainder of our lives. It is in that sense that I spoke of finality. I confess we did believe in the formation of our measure that a liberal admission to the franchise was essential to anything like finality. Therefore, when I point out that the popular element admitted by the present plan of the Government is little more than one-half the number included in the plan of the late Government, I am not currying favour with those who may prefer agitating for perpetual change when I claim credit for having by a liberal boon endeavoured to close agitation. But there is a question more important than any question of mere numbers, and that is the question of principle. We were content, in default of any more definite rule, to make a considerable selection of the superior portion of the working classes. Our principle was to make such a selection in the same mode as the selection made by the Reform Bill of the middle class, and to have regard to the line then drawn. I am well aware that there were many in this House honestly dissatisfied with the line then drawn. They wanted something more distinct—something more in the nature of a formidable barrier, marking off the ground between those who were admitted to the franchise, and those who were not so admitted. On this point I am desirous of asking the right hon. Gentleman a question, and I hope he will excuse me if it is somewhat minute. Does his extension of the franchise embrace only those who are rated at sums over £6, or does it embrace all those who are rated at £6 and upwards? If it embraces all those who are rated at £6 and upwards, I must observe that his proposal is precisely in the same condition as ours, with a total want of any fence, or hedge, or barrier. It is so open in the abstract to argument that you have no security against its being carried farther. It is still more open to objection than our proposal, for we, by a liberal concession, sought to put the question at rest, but the right hon. Gentleman, by granting only a moiety, gives a premium for continual agitation. I did not hear him state any provision with regard to compound householders and lodgers. That portion of the subject is so important that I presume he would have included these if they were intended, and perhaps the omission will be supplied hereafter. There is one portion of the plan to which I refer in terms of satisfaction, and that is the bold proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman with respect to certain corrupt boroughs. I must not be understood to speak of any Report except those I have seen. I have read Reports concerning two boroughs, and I must confess that I think upon the whole, whether disfranchisement for a very long period might have sufficed or not, undoubtedly, if the Government make a proposal for their total disfranchisement, I shall not object. The right hon. Gentleman might derive some encouragement from the warm and lively cheer which he received from this side of the House at that passage in his speech. I am glad he has given in the engagement—conditional perhaps in terms, but substantially unconditional—that the very important general change which he contemplates in the law relating to bribery and corruption will not be saddled upon the Bill relating to the franchise. The proposals of the right hon. Gentleman touching matters of the utmost delicacy as connected with the rights and privileges of Members of the House, deserve the most careful and above all the most impartial consideration. Provisions relating to bribery and corruption are matters which do not affect one party more than the other; and I trust we shall consider the question calmly and with open minds, for to treat it as a subject which bristles at every point with old controversies, and anticipations of new ones, would be most unfortunate. I am glad therefore that the House will not be called upon to consider these proposals as a portion of the Bill relating to the representation of the people. I would make the same remark as to the Resolutions relating to the registration of voters for counties, and to the provision for diminishing the distance that voters have to travel. As regards both those Resolutions, the object which the right hon. Gentleman has in view is excellent, but it will involve much consideration in detail, and many difficulties will have to be surmounted. I would suggest that the separation of those matters also from the great question of the representation of the people would be a measure well calculated to advance the proper settlement of the question. I will not trouble the House with any other remarks on the proposals which the right hon. Gentleman has submitted, but I come now to the question of procedure. I think the right hon. Gentleman cannot have failed to notice, as truly remarkable, the precise concurrence of opinion between my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham and my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman does not suspect those two most distinguished Members of this House of a corrupt collusion. When I came down to the House I was entirely ignorant that there would be any such manifestation of concurrent opinion; but that manifestation comes from Gentlemen pretty widely separated by their opinions, and whose separation in opinion has been certainly not unconnected with tolerably brisk political conflict. That concurrence of opinion is not a mere accident; it is a significant indication of opinion in this House. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Walpole), who is rather deeply responsible in this matter—for it was he who, with the most benevolent intentions, launched last year the idea of proceeding by Resolution—could not fail to become aware that, in the manful and energetic defence he was making of the Government he was not sustained by the expressed approval of his party, nor, after the question had been so pointedly raised by Members of such importance as the two I have mentioned, was the slightest indication given to countenance that method of proceeding. This is in my opinion a very serious matter, and for this plain reason, among others, that it is intimately connected with the question of time, which in dealing with a subject like this within the limits of a Session, becomes, not of secondary, but of primary importance. I do not wish at all to recede from the ground which I originally took with regard to that. If it is the view of the Government, if it is their distinct conviction, that procedure by Resolution is preferable to procedure by Bill, I must say that I entirely differ from the view; but I waive the difference. One thing, however, I contend for, and I put it to the Government, and that is, that if we are to proceed by Resolutions it should be by Resolutions that really embody the plans of the Government. Why, Sir, even the Government themselves would be embarrassed by the terms of their own Resolutions. Here, for instance, is a Resolution which says—

“That, in revising the existing Distribution of Seats, this House will acknowledge, as its main consideration, the expediency of supplying Representation to places not at present represented, and which may be considered entitled to that privilege.”

Now, what construction does that bear? Does it bear any other construction than this, that whatever number of seats the Government may be anxious to dispose of by its plan the principal part of them will be given to those communities which are at present unrepresented? The words drawn up in the Resolution will only bear that construction, and that must have been the intention of the drawer of the Resolution. But the right hon. Gentleman's proposal does not carry out that intention; on the contrary, it divides equally the number of seats which are to be given to new communities and to old ones; indeed, there is a majority of one in favour of old communities. That is one instance of the uselessness of Resolutions of this kind. Then, again, there is the third Resolution, about the predominance of classes, of which I must say that in its abstract character it is more like a proposition for the Oxford Debating Society than a proposition from the right hon. Gentleman opposite. It is more like a proposition for a class than a proposition to be submitted, and gravely submitted, to a Senate. Independently of that, I must say that the discussion of such a proposition ill accords with that admonition bestowed on us in the Speech from the Throne to charity, and moderation, and mutual forbearance. It would be impossible, when we consider all the former debates on the Corn Laws, and many other debates that would be raked up, if we were to go on. The sorest points of the question are all touched by raising in that indirect manner the question between class and class. For what purpose is it to be raised? The proposition itself is a truism. If you have a proposal for a £6 franchise that distinctly and intelligibly defines your view of the manner in which the relations of class and class are to be disposed of so far as regards the political franchise. The acceptance, rejection, or modification of that proposal will define the practical opinion of the House on the subject. What can be the use of debating these matters in the abstract when we are to decide them in the concrete, at a time when it is admitted on all hands that whatever differences there may be the thing of the most cardinal importance is that we should get forward with dispatch and expedition? When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department expressed his opinion in favour of Resolutions, on what ground did he recommend them? He recommended them upon this distinct, clear and forcibly stated ground, that by means of these Resolutions he, or rather the forms of the House, would coerce and compel every man, with a peculiar idea on the subject of the representation of the people, to produce it here and have it debated and decided, and all this as a preliminary to Reform. He distinctly challenged one well-known gentleman, and the challenge applied to many more, and the right hon. Gentleman used the argument, as it appeared to me, in the most forcible language. Taking the whole of that part of his speech bodily, sentence by sentence, and word by word, there could not be a better speech against proceeding by Resolution. Remember what these ideas are. Remember that they are not the mere crotchets of idle and light-minded men. Many of the most acute intellects in the country have been busy for years past on the subject of our representative system, and from closet and study have emerged many schemes, with regard to which it is quite true that we must, at the end of our discussions, find that they are not well suited for practical adoption, but they would have to be debated with respect, and could not be got rid of without long and intricate discussion. But all this is to be dealt with by us, not in Committee on the Bill, but in Committee on preliminary Resolutions, which define almost nothing with regard to the nature of the Bill. I take it for granted that there is no intention of pressing any proceeding to-night. It is quite evident that the position of the House is fundamentally altered by the proceedings of this evening. Until this evening we were wholly ignorant of the plans of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman has, however, laid before us in considerable detail, and for the most part with considerable clearness, the nature of those plans. I assume, therefore, that we do not proceed to-night even to move you, Sir (the Speaker), out of the Chair, because that Motion would itself constitute a very important step, and the House should be left perfectly free, even on that preliminary step, without giving an opinion. I assume that we shall not be called upon to proceed this evening, and probably the more convenient course on this great matter will be that the next Government night, if it be agreeable to the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues, should be taken for the purpose; but that the interval which, I think, may be claimed, and I am sure the claim will be admitted in the interests of the liberty of the Members of the House—the interval will, I trust, have its value to the Government. I am not taking the part of an opponent of the Government in urging upon them this recommendation. I put it to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, who regards the dignity of Parliament as much as any man who sits within these walls; and I put it to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has studied the history of the country and the Constitution, that this House has never been called upon to discuss Resolutions, necessarily of a vague character, subject to every kind of difference and interpretation, open to every man to construe in his own sense, and all this at a time when behind these Resolutions there lies a clear and definite plan announced to us. This position is novel, and I cannot venture to prognosticate what inconvenience might arise from it in the discussion; but, at any rate, I press on the Government that it is a mode of proceeding such as the House of Commons has never been called upon to adopt. The right hon. Gentleman said the other night that he thought the Government in a matter of this grave character were entitled to point out the method of procedure. I do not think that any undue impatience has been manifested with regard to allowing that function to be exercised. I will undertake to say that if we had definite Resolutions before us, framed so as to embody the main proposals of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, we might, rather than inconvenience or obstruct the House, proceed upon them; but I do hope, and this is the last word I shall say, that we shall not be called on to proceed upon Resolutions such as those which are now before us. It is not compatible with the character and dignity of the House, nor with the desire expressed by a large portion of the House, to proceed with due despatch and diligence in the prosecution of the subject, thereby preserving and vindicating, not only among ourselves, but in the face of the country, the character and credit of the House of Commons, which would otherwise be grievously imperilled, that we should allow it to be said that we did not exercise a sound and strict judgment with regard to all the steps in which we may proceed to the settlement of this question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said: I need not, I believe, upon this occasion trespass at any length upon the time of the House. I differ from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) with respect to a portion of the figures in this case. I believe that my estimate is the correct one; but that is a subject which can be much more conveniently discussed at a subsequent stage in our proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman called my attention to the position in which the House is placed by the mode in which it is proposed that we should deal with the general question of Reform; and he has drawn a powerful argument against our entering into a consideration of the Resolutions from the circumstance of the extraordinary concurrence of opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Birmingham and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. That agreement is no doubt very striking. But there is one thing perfectly evident, and that is that both the hon. Member for Birmingham and the right hon. Member for Calne are very anxious that the proposed Bill should not pass; I am not therefore surprised that they should speak of the course we have pursued in so hostile a spirit. However great may be the divergence of opinion between them, no attempt has been made by them to disguise their desire that our measure should not be a successful one. I hope, however, that this is not the feeling of the House generally; and Her Majesty's Government do not certainly share their opinions, because we are most anxious to introduce and to pass a Bill upon this subject. As far as the Resolutions are concerned we shall be prepared to do everything in our power to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman and of the House. I do not mean to insist on any Resolution that would lead to mere idle controversy. I am referring to those points on which there is no necessity for taking the opinion of the House. But many of the Resolutions are really of a very important character. I should certainly like to have a distinct opinion of the House on such subjects as the registration of voters, the employment of polling papers, and the payment of the travelling expenses of electors; and I am particularly anxious that the Resolution with regard to the Boundary Commission should receive the sanction of the House. It is of the greatest importance that the labours of the Commissioners should at once be commenced; and I should be perfectly willing when we get into Committee to begin with the thirteenth Resolution. With regard to the other Resolutions, I have no doubt that the House would on reflection take a sensible view.

of them, and would adopt those that it is desirable to have passed. It will be for us to consider whether there are not some among the Resolutions that need not be brought before the House. [Cries of "Withdraw!"] I would sooner come to an understanding upon this point when we go into Committee. We might then pass these Resolutions to which there can be no objection; and with regard to one or two others, on which it is not necessary to offer an opinion, I should not attempt to press them. I cannot have any objection to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman that we should not proceed with the Resolutions to-night. I think it is a very reasonable one; but I suppose that we might proceed to their consideration on Thursday next. ["Hear, hear!" and renewed cries of "Withdraw!"]

MR. ROEBUCK: I would beg of the right hon. Gentleman, and of the House, to consider whether the mode of procedure adopted does not amount to trifling with the question. I give the right hon. Gentleman full credit for desiring to pass some Bill. Any stranger who had been here the other night, when the right hon. Gentleman addressed the House on this subject, must have thought that he was putting a trick before it. I am sure he does not desire to do that. What possible good can follow from our passing the Resolution about a Boundary Commission? The Queen has power to issue a Commission, and to invest it with power to make certain inquiries. What, then, can be the object of passing this Resolution, except the wish to ascertain beforehand what may be safely put into the Bill? I do not think that that is a position proper to Ministers of the Crown. Let the right hon. Gentleman, on his own responsibility, tell us what he thinks is right, and embody it in the clauses of a Bill; then the House can accept or reject as it thinks proper. That is the constitutional mode of proceeding; but the tentative process of ascertaining what will pass the House, in order that he may bring in a safe Bill, will do no honour to the right hon. Gentleman, and if acquiesced in will do none to this House.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING - MAXWELL said, he wished to take an early opportunity of expressing his disappointment that the claim of Scotland to some increase of representation had not been acknowledged on this occasion as it had been in former Bills. It contained prosperous towns and Universities larger than that of London, which were unrepresented, and he would beg of those Members of the Cabinet who represented Scotland to impress the facts on their Colleagues. He also gave notice that on Friday, on going into Committee of Supply, he would ask a question on the subject, to which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would give an answer which would not disappoint the just expectations of the people of Scotland.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Before calling upon the House to resume the discussion of this question, I trust the Government will lay upon the table an amended copy of the Resolutions, showing those it is proposed to omit, the alterations it is proposed to make, and the order in which they will be taken. The right hon. Gentleman laid great stress on the boundary question; but I believe a Resolution to be quite unnecessary. It is quite competent for the Government on its own responsibility to issue a Commission to revise boundaries. Of course, its Report will have to be confirmed by Act of Parliament before it can take effect. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether he is not departing from the invariable practice in asking the House in Committee to address the Crown; and I would put it to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether an Address to the Crown for a Commission has ever been adopted except by both Houses. I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he will lay on the table the statistics on which he has made the calculations with regard to the number of voters who would be admitted into borough constituencies by the proposed franchise?

MR. WARNER said, they were all anxious for a settlement of that question; but it was obvious that such a result could not be obtained by such a proposal as that which had just been laid before them by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He suggested that it would be a better and simpler arrangement to keep the existing franchises as they were, and in addition introduce a measure of household suffrage in the boroughs, with the restriction, that no person who was excused from payment of taxes on the score of poverty, should be entitled to a vote. That seemed a fair way of dealing with the question; it would disfranchise nobody, and would add greatly to the representation of the country.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE thought the mode of proceeding by way of Resolution was exceedingly objectionable, inasmuch as it would retard instead of advancing the question. There was scarcely one of the Resolutions for which he could vote. He hoped the Government would see that persistence in the course they had adopted would simply waste valuable time. The best plan would be to introduce a Bill at once. At the same time, so far as he had heard the provisions of the Government plan explained, it was the most ridiculous attempt to settle the question that he had ever heard propounded.

CRIMINAL LUNATICS BILL—[BILL 41.]
(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Attorney General.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WALPOLE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, its object was of some importance. As the law stood, when a criminal was found lunatic, either at the time of his arraignment or after the verdict of the jury, the Crown had power to deal with such lunatic; and, on a criminal lunatic being cured of his lunacy, the Crown had power to order his discharge; but the Crown had no power to discharge a criminal lunatic, when quite recovered, unless he was set entirely free. The object of the present Bill was to enable the Crown, instead of entirely discharging such a person out of prison, to impose such conditions upon the release that the individual should be subject to a certain amount of surveillance. The Bill also provided that a criminal lunatic might be removed to a county asylum on the expiration of his sentence.

Motion agreed to.

TRADES UNIONS BILL—[BILL 18.]
(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners, Sir Stafford Northcote.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. HADFIELD said, he did not rise to oppose going into Committee, but simply to state that, in the first place, five years, the limit of inquiry now proposed, would be insufficient; and, in the next place, that unless the principle of exemption from punishment was extended to the perpetrators themselves of the crimes the truth would not be come at. He was no apologist for a man who took the life of another, but in these cases the man to reach was the briber of the assassin. The limitation of the Bill to outrages committed within the last ten years would prevent the investigation of matters about which valuable evidence might present itself. For instance, there had just appeared in the papers a case which had occurred in 1856, and of which a prisoner had just made a confession. The Commissioners would be stopped from inquiring into that transaction.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 2 (Limits of Inquiry under Act.)

MR. NEATE thought that though the inquiry into the general effect of trades unions and that into the Sheffield outrages were both to be made under the Royal Commission, a proper distinction should be drawn between the two branches of proceeding. He thought that the Commission should be remodelled, and that there should be a Special Commission to make the subordinate inquiry. He would move an Amendment that the names of the Commissioners to whom it is proposed to give Parliamentary powers should be inserted in the Preamble.

MR. ROEBUCK reminded the hon. Member that this was not a Parliamentary Commission. It seemed to him that there was unnecessary confusion in the matter. A Commission had been appointed to inquire into trades unions generally. Then, beyond this, there was the particular case of Sheffield. This Bill proposed not only that there should be a general Commission, but that the Commissioners should appoint independent persons to conduct the whole or any part of an inquiry under the powers of the Act. But nobody knew at present who were to be the three Commissioners, and the question was, whether these Special Examiners should be appointed by the Secretary of State or by the Commissioners.

MR. WALPOLE explained that the object of having the Commission was to inquire into the subject of trades unions generally; but, as incidental to that inquiry, it would probably be necessary to inquire into certain acts of intimidation that might have been practised by these associations. The clause, however, did not refer to this latter subject, but was confined to inquiries into outrages in Sheffield. The masters and men at that place wished for inquiry to clear up the question whether the trades unions were or were not guilty of these outrages. If the Commissioners wished to make similar inquiries elsewhere, they could only do so on having the sanction of the Home Secretary. If the Amendment were agreed to, the Commissioners themselves in a body would have to go to Sheffield, which would considerably increase their labour; but as the Bill stood, one or more Commissioners might go to Sheffield, or they might appoint an Examiner to go down and take the evidence. He would, however, consider whether he could not insert some words on the Report which would remove any ambiguity on the point.

MR. NEATE said, he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

MR. GOSCHEN proposed the omission of the words, "or wrong," on the ground of its indefiniteness.

MR. WATKIN said, one of the complaints at Sheffield was of men's dinners being thrown into the fire. Now, acts of this kind did not amount to intimidation or outrage, but would come within the category of a wrong.

MR. POWELL said, that acts, which at first appeared mere wrongs, might turn out on further inquiry to be gross intimidation. He objected to the powers of the Commission being narrowed by the omission of the word "wrong."

MR. GOSCHEN thought the Committee were bound to be most particular in the wording of the clauses, because the workmen were not represented in that House.

MR. ROEBUCK thought it desirable that the words should be retained on the ground that they embraced acts which could not be described as outrages or intimidation. He should not like to have his dinner thrown into the fire, and if such a thing were done, he should be anxious to find out the author. Moreover a workman often found it very hard to pay for his dinner.

Mr. Walpole

MR. WALPOLE said, one of the things most complained of by workmen at Sheffield was their wheelbarrows being stolen, and he doubted whether such annoyances could be better included than under the term "wrong." In his opinion, the omission of the words would operate to the disadvantage of the workmen.

MR. AYRTON said, he could see no objection to the word "wrong." It was reported that the masters combined in refusing to employ members of trades unions. This was a great wrong, and perhaps it might be necessary to inquire into the conduct of both masters and workmen.

MR. SAMUELSON suggested that acts of the kind alluded to might form part of the general inquiry; but that the Sheffield investigation should be limited to more serious offences.

MR. FOSTER suggested that the words "unlawful act" would be better.

After further discussion, Amendment withdrawn.

MR. W. E. FORSTER suggested that the power to extend the inquiry in exercise of the powers of this Act to any place but Sheffield should be omitted.

MR. WALPOLE said, it would not be desirable to preclude the Commissioners from extending their inquiry into outrages similar to those at Sheffield committed at other places. One principal object of the Bill, however, was to inquire into the particular outrages of Sheffield. He would frame an Amendment on the Report, which would, he thought, meet the objection. He now moved to substitute "ten" years for "five" as the limit of the inquiry of the Commissioners into cases of outrage.

MR. HADFIELD moved, as an Amendment, the substitution of "fifteen" for "five," contending that the longer term was necessary to cover the inquiry.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought his hon. Friend's object would be attained by leaving the limit as proposed, but inserting the words "without the written sanction of the Secretary of State," in the second section of the clause, which would enable the right hon. Gentleman to extend the inquiry over any period that might be necessary.

MR. WALPOLE believed, that the limit of ten years was sufficient, being anxious to confine the powers of the Commissioners to such a period as both workmen and masters were inclined to agree upon, instead of pushing it back to a time regarding which differences might arise.

Amendment (Mr. W. E. Forster) negatived; Amendment to substitute "ten" for "five" agreed to; words "with the written sanction of one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State" inserted; a further Amendment, to add the words "at the request of the Chairman of the Commission" (Mr. W. E. Forster) agreed to.

Clause 5 (Indemnity to Witnesses.)

MR. HADFIELD moved to omit from the clause the words in lines 32 to 38, which except from the indemnity the actual perpetrators of the offence.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the actual perpetrator of an outrage might be only a poor, ignorant, wretched creature, who was incited to do the deed by somebody else, who was the real criminal. Bearing that in mind, how would this clause, as it now stood, work? At Sheffield, a man's house was blown up, and although a very large sum was offered, they could not discover the offender, because there was only one person who really was the criminal, and he would not give evidence against himself for any sum of money. The consequence would be that if they allowed the words excluding the perpetrator from the indemnity to remain in the clause, neither the real perpetrator himself, nor the person who had incited him to the act, might be discovered. But he was informed, on very good authority, that if they pardoned the actual perpetrator of that crime, the latter would come forward and tell them who had instigated him to commit it. He therefore suggested that the clause should undergo amendment in this respect.

MR. AYRTON said, the question was as to whether they could permit a man voluntarily to announce himself as a criminal, and thereby exempt himself from punishment?

MR. POWELL cited the general Act, relating to corrupt practices at elections, wherein it was provided that all persons giving evidence fully and truthfully were to be declared exempt from punishment on account of any acts which they might then admit. As exemption was given in this general Act from the consequences of confessed crimes, he thought a special Act of the nature of that before the Committee should surely contain a clause of exemption; and he also thought that the exemption, if given, should cover all crimes confessed, whether great or small. Their object was, not so much to get at the actual perpetrators of past crimes, as to know how to prevent their recurrence in future.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, speaking as a resident magistrate of Yorkshire, objected to the proposed Amendment, on the ground that, as the police had not given up all hope of discovering the perpetrators of the Sheffield outrage, it was unwise to give them an opportunity of coming forward and saying, "I did this crime, and now you cannot punish me."

MR. BARROW said, it was essential that the actual perpetrator should be indemnified, if they wished to get at the real truth of the matter. The real perpetrator of the offences committed at Sheffield was the briber rather than the actual offender.

MR. ROEBUCK thought it very remarkable that those who desired, above all others, to punish the offender in a special case, were endeavouring to make the inquiry totally inefficient. Without complete indemnification, the Bill would be totally useless, in his opinion.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the police were on the track of some of the men who had perpetrated these outrages, and might discover them; and therefore it would seriously interfere with the course of justice, if they allowed this Amendment to pass.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that his object was that no punishment at all should be administered.

MR. GOSCHEN remarked, that in that case the hon. Member desired to compound with justice, to let off criminals, in order to get evidence upon a political question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, there was a manifest difference between an inquiry into the question of a crime with a view to punish the criminal, and an inquiry into the existence of a crime for the purpose of ascertaining, if possible, its connection with certain economical principles. In the one case, it would be manifestly absurd to offer pardon to the criminal, if he would but confess; in the other case, truth, and not punishment, was the object. Having carefully considered the question, it appeared to him that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) was right, and that the objection made to the course which he suggested must be made subordinate to the important purpose of having the real facts of the case elicited for the information of the Commission.

MR. W. E. FORSTER was surprised to find the Home Secretary, who was responsible for the peace of the country, and also the Attorney General of England, approving of an Amendment, the object of which was to give a power to acquit the perpetrators of a crime who should come forward and make a clean breast of it, simply because they wanted to ascertain facts to guide them to legislation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the hon. Member's argument would have some force if the inquiry was got up in order to screen criminals.

MR. AYRTON said, the House should consider what it was asked to do. Examiners were to be appointed by the Commissioners, and they were to have power to pardon murderers. That was the most extraordinary legislation he had ever heard of since he had had a seat in that House.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN contended that the real question was whether one criminal should be let off with a view to putting an end to a series of dreadful outrages. For his own part, he was of opinion that the object in view could be best secured by the adoption of the Amendment.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) was under a curious misapprehension. He had stated that it was proposed to give power to the Examiner to let a criminal off. Nothing of the kind. The Act of Parliament said that if the man did so and so he should be pardoned, and not the Examiner.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES desired that there should be a full and searching inquiry, and he was convinced that the result would be to show that several of the outrages had not been committed by trades unions or any person connected with them. He hoped the House would not agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Secretary for the Home Department how it came to pass that he had changed his views on the question at issue since the drawing up of the Bill?

MR. WALPOLE replied, that when the proviso in question was inserted in the Bill he entertained grave doubts as to whether indemnity should be granted to the actual perpetrator of the outrage. It had since been represented to him, however, that if that were not done the inquiry would be so hampered that it would be impossible to arrive at the real state of things. He had therefore come to the conclusion that the best course to adopt was to support the Amendment, believing that that course would enable the Commissioners more readily to ascertain whether the charge brought against the trades unions was or was not true.

MR. AYRTON thought that the power of committing any man, if he declined to answer questions put to him, was objectionable. The Commissioners might ask a man who was concerned in the outrage if he had had a share in it, and if he declined to answer he would be committed, while, if he did answer, he must of necessity criminate himself. The principle was contrary to the one always adopted, and had no precedent in the administration of justice in this country.

MR. ROEBUCK thought there were some Gentlemen who were strongly inclined to support every proposition tending to render the measure abortive. If a man were asked whether he had blown up the house he would, if innocent, at once reply in the negative, while if he were guilty he could still tell the truth and claim to be indemnified. It was the man's own fault if he refused to answer, and, as none but the guilty would make such a refusal, he could not see any force in the objection.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL also reminded the House that inasmuch as the Act sought to gain an open confession, the perpetrator of the outrage could claim an indemnity on acknowledging his guilt. If a man, therefore, refused to answer the questions of the Commissioners, he fully merited his commitment.

Amendment agreed to; first and second Provisoes struck out.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

In reply to Mr. AYRTON,

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL stated, that the persons committed to prison under the provisions of the Bill would not be committed for a longer time than until the end of the Commission.

Preamble amended and agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Thursday. [Bill 58.]

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished, before the adjournment of the House, to refer to the statement made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that Dr. Wiseman had been examined before a Committee of the House in his capacity of Cardinal. It was not the fact that Dr. Wiseman had attended the Committee in the capacity stated by the right hon. Gentleman. He (Mr. Newdegate) had referred to the proceedings of the Committee on Catholic Charities, and from these had found that the case was very different to what had been stated. It was quite true that Dr. Wiseman, when he became Cardinal, was summoned before the Committee, but he declined to appear. It was, however, eventually determined to summon him, and the result was embodied in the Minutes of the proceedings of the Committee, of date the 30th of June, 1851, as follows:—

"Motion made, and Question proposed (Mr. Anstey), that Dr. Wiseman be summoned to attend and to be examined before this Committee." "Amendment (Mr. Keogh), that the word 'Dr.' be omitted, in order to insert, instead thereof, the word 'Cardinal.' Question put that the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Question. The Committee divided—

"Ayes, 9.—Mr. Anstey, Mr. Heald, Sir R. H. Inglis, Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Shafto Adair, Mr. Fitzpatrick, Mr. Drummond, Mr. Marshall, Mr. Hutt.

"Noes, 1.—Mr. Keogh."

The Committee re-assembled on the 17th of July, 1851, and the Members present were—

"Mr. Headlam, Lord John Manners, Mr. Shafto Adair, Sir R. H. Inglis, Lord Henry Vane, Mr. Anstey, Mr. H. Drummond, Mr. Hardcastle, Mr. Fitzpatrick, Mr. Hutt; Mr. Thomas Emerson Headlam in the chair. The Right Rev. Nicholas Wiseman, D.D., called in and examined."

It would therefore be seen that no precedent existed, as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but, on the contrary, the Committee decided by 9 to 1 against allowing Dr. Wiseman to appear before them in his capacity of Cardinal. He was afterwards examined as the Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman, and was only recognised as a Bishop and Doctor of Divinity. He (Mr. Newdegate) hoped the House would excuse him for having made this statement. He had only done so because the Chancellor of the Exchequer had inferred that there was some precedent which might sanction what was done the other day at the banquet given by the Lord Mayor of Dublin. The real facts, however, went to prove that the precedent of the House was exactly diverse to the proceedings at Dublin.

THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN (the Earl of BRADFORD) reported the QUEEN'S Answer to the Address of Friday last, as follows:—

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee read.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH presented a Petition of a Committee of inhabitants of Rugby and neighbourhood, interested in Rugby School. The Bill, he remarked, gave powers to the governing bodies and masters which might be exercised in such a way as to injure very materially the privilege of persons entitled to send their sons free to the school. All that the petitioners asked was that before such powers were exercised they should have an opportunity of communicating with the governing bodies on the subject. That, in his opinion, was not by any means an unreasonable request.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I apprehend that there is some little difference between giving notice to a public body, which has a special interest in the subject, and giving notice to the inhabitants generally. If my noble Friend will put the proposed Amendment in my hands, it shall be taken into consideration before the Report is brought up. I had hoped, however, that the Bill would go down to the other House in precisely the same form as was approved by your Lordships last year.

House in Committee; an Amendment made; the Report thereof to be received on Monday next, and Bill to be printed as amended (No. 29.)

OFFICE OF JUDGE IN THE ADMIRALTY,
DIVORCE, AND PROBATE COURTS
BILL—(No. 11.)—(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, in asking your Lordships to read this Bill a second time, I beg to express my opinion that it is one of considerable importance. By its title it is a Bill to provide for the execution of the office of Judge of the Admiralty, Divorce, and Probate Courts; but it is virtually a proposal for a union of the three courts of Admiralty into one, preserving, at the same time, the separate power, jurisdiction, and authority of each. Such a proposal has already been in the contemplation of the Legislature. When the Probate Court was established in 1857 provision was made in the Act that, on a vacancy occurring in the Admiralty Court, the Judge of the Probate Court should become Judge of the Admiralty Court also; and that on a vacancy occurring in the Probate Court, the Judge of the Admiralty Court, with his consent, should become Judge of the Probate Court. In the same Session the Divorce Court was established, and the Judge of Probate was made Judge Ordinary of that Court. Of course, it was supposed that the business of the three courts would not be of such an amount as that it might not be disposed of by a single Judge; but experience has shown the increase of business to be such as renders it impossible that one or even two Judges can do the business of the three courts. I will call attention very briefly to the increase of business that has taken place in all of them. I will take first the Admiralty Court, which is presided over by an eminent person, of whom it is impossible to speak too highly, my right hon. and learned friend, Dr. Lushington. The business of that court has increased to a wonderful extent. In 1841 there were 237 causes tried; in 1866 there were 657. Among those are many collision cases involving a considerable amount of property; in a recent case — that of the Amazon and the Osprey — the damage to the former was estimated at £60,000, and that of the latter at £20,000. It is to be observed, that witnesses are now examined in that court vidé voce, instead of by an Examiner, and the questions are frequently very complicated and embarrassing. While in 1841 the number of collision cases tried was forty-nine, in 1866 the number was 264. The business of the Admiralty Court is of a most important description; and, though small salvage cases and cases of seamen's wages have been withdrawn from the court, its jurisdiction has been extended to the ownership of vessels, mortgage claims, and damage to cargo; and I anticipate that in a short time the business will be still further increased. There is a Bill which I expect will be very shortly in your Lordships' House, by which it is proposed to extend the ancient jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty over insurances, freights, charterparties, general and particular average, and other maritime matters. As to maritime contracts, Justice Story, in the case of "De Lovis v. Boit," observed—

"The next inquiry is, what are properly to be deemed 'maritime contracts?' Happily, in this particular there is little room for controversy. All civilians and jurists agree that in this appellation are included, among other things, charterparties, affreightments, marine hypothecations, contracts for maritime service in the building, repairing, supplying, and navigating ships, contracts between part owners of ships, contracts and quasi-contracts respecting averages, contributions, and jettisons, and policies of insurance."

All this business, which is now in the Superior Courts, will be restored to the Court of Admiralty; and I am quite sure that, although these causes are at present satisfactorily disposed of under the existing system, yet I believe that persons connected with maritime affairs would prefer to have those important matters determined by a maritime court, rather than before juries consisting of persons who are not ordinarily conversant with such questions. I think I have shown your Lordships that the Judge of the Admiralty Court, from want of time, is not only incapable of undertaking the duties of another court, but that it is extremely probable he will be hardly able to dispose of all the business of his own court, and therefore the notion of making him Judge of the Probate and Divorce Courts also, seems to me quite unreasonable. Turning to the Divorce Court, I may remark that at the time that court was established it was supposed that as regarded the number of cases, the first year or two would be exceptional, as it was probable that persons who could not afford the expenses attendant on an application to your Lordships' House had waited to take their proceedings in the Divorce Court, knowing that its establishment was in contemplation. Unfortunately, it has turned out not to be the case, for since the first year the business has increased very largely. In 1858 the number of petitions for alimony was 40; in 1865 the number was 86. In 1858 there were 376 motions; in 1865 there were 708; in 1858 the summonses were 163; in 1865 they were 726; in 1858 the causes were 58; in 1865 they were 256; in 1858 the judgments were 52; in 1865 they were 260. Of course, most of those cases are of great importance and of great length; and it frequently happens that if exceptional cases, such as declarations of legitimacy which are tried by this Court, arise, the business accumulates, and falls into arrear. Then as to the Probate Court, in 1858 the number of causes was 380; in 1866 it was 538. In the former year the number of trials was 27; in the latter 59. Now, I think I have shown your Lordships sufficient by these statistics to convince you that what was contemplated by the Legislature in proposing that these three Courts should be under one head and one Judge, who would dispose of the business of all, is utterly illusory, if I may use the expression, and that it is absolutely necessary to provide for the discharge of the business of the three Courts in a more efficient manner. One proof of the inability of each of the Judges of those Courts to do more than the duty of one of them, is, that though the Judge of the Probate Court and the Judge of the Admiralty

Court may sit for each other, on no occasion that I am aware of has either of them done so, not being able from want of time. Another most important circumstance is this:—Formerly the Judge of the Admiralty Court and the Judge of the Prerogative Court—which may be said to correspond to the Court of Probate—used to attend the sittings of the Privy Council, and it is very desirable that these civilians should be members of that tribunal, in which questions of maritime and civil law continually arise. During my time the occasions on which the Judges of the Admiralty, Probate, or Divorce Courts have been able to attend the Judicial Committee have been so rare as scarcely to be worth mentioning. I think, therefore, I have laid the foundation for the proposition that it is necessary that provision should be made for the execution of a portion of the duties devolving upon these Judges in their several Courts. What I propose is that a Court should be established consisting of a Chief Judge and two other Judges, each of whom shall have the same power in any of the three Courts as the Judges of these Courts now possess. By the Bill it is provided that in each of the Courts they shall be able to exercise all the powers and authorities belonging to the Judge of each; but the jurisdiction, authorities, and powers of the Courts are to be kept separate and distinct. In this way I propose to obtain a judicial power which can be concentrated and turned in any direction in which it is required. It frequently happens in the Admiralty Court, for instance, that there is a necessity for the despatch of causes; the witnesses, being generally seamen, are of a migratory description; and it is frequently of the greatest possible importance to be able to examine them at once. Owing, however, to the state of the other business of the Court, the Judge is constantly prevented from entering upon these causes, and the evidence is obliged to be taken before the Examiner. This is a most unsatisfactory way of proceeding; because, upon paper, which is all that the Judge has before him, one witness looks as well as another. Under this Bill it is proposed that there may be two Courts of Admiralty, two Courts of Probate, or two Divorce Courts sitting at the same time, and thus the business of all these Courts will be disposed of with much greater despatch. The three Judges will also constitute a Full Court of Divorce. Your Lordships are perhaps aware that in order to constitute a Full Court of Divorce at present it is necessary to borrow from the Common Law Courts two Judges, who, being called upon only occasionally to administer a kind of law to which they are unaccustomed, are perhaps led to yield their own opinion too much to that of the Judge Ordinary; and may not exercise their independent judgment to the extent it is desirable they should do:—so that, practically, it is an appeal from the Judge Ordinary to the Judge Ordinary himself. There will also be a Full Court for granting new trials. I have now explained to your Lordships, sufficiently I think, the general objects of the Bill; it is probably unnecessary to enter into minute details, which can be better considered in Committee. I know that my noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth) has turned his attention particularly to this subject, and I hope with some confidence that we may have his assistance and support. There is a further advantage which I propose to gain by the constitution of this new Court in the way that I have described, and that is, that the Chief Judge will be released from time to time, and so enabled to attend the Judicial Committee, and thus add to the strength of that tribunal. My noble and learned Friend evidently considers this a point of some importance; because last Session he laid a Bill before the House for the object of adding strength to the Judicial Committee. If the Bill should receive your Lordships' sanction, I expect that I shall have the satisfaction of establishing a most high and important Court, governed by the principles of civil law, in which Court will be collected a body of advocates learned in that law. I need hardly say that if war should unhappily occur, the prize causes will be tried in the most solemn, and decided in the most satisfactory manner; and even if questions of International Law should arise, provision may be made for having them determined in that Court. I perhaps may add a word regarding one of the clauses of the Bill relating to the Court of Arches. The Dean of Arches is a Judge of high authority and dignity, appointed by my most rev. Friend the Archbishop of Canterbury. Now, the Dean of Arches is in this extraordinary position: he is a Judge, as I have already said, of high dignity and great authority, but I believe his salary hardly amounts to £40 a year. [The Archbishop of CANTERBURY: Not £4.] Well, I will strike off the 0, and leave the salary at £4 a year. Of course, the most rev. Prelate finds it extremely difficult to appoint a Judge who has not some other means of supporting the dignity of his high office. Formerly, the course was to appoint the Judge of the Prerogative Court. Latterly, the office has been held by my right hon. Friend, Dr. Lushington. Of course, one must make some provision for vacancies occurring in the office of Dean of Arches, and what I propose is that the most rev. Prelate should have the power of appointing one or more of the new Judges to this Court. I am certainly anxious for the success of this Bill. I believe it will be one of great utility, and that it will provide a well constituted tribunal for the administration of justice in the Courts of Admiralty, Probate, and Divorce, and I trust your Lordships will grant the measure a favourable consideration.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD CRANWORTH said, that he gave his cordial assent to the principle laid down by the noble and learned Lord, that the judicial power of the country should, if necessary, be strengthened; and their Lordships, he thought, would be very reluctant at any time to be niggardly in affording sufficient judicial strength to all the important Courts of the country. During the short time last year that he had the honour of holding the Great Seal he looked into the question, and found that if the time had not actually arrived, it was fast arriving, when some addition of strength must be made to almost all the Courts. But he was bound to say that the two Courts which seemed to him least to require such an addition were these very Courts of Probate and Divorce and of the Admiralty, and nothing which he had heard from his noble and learned Friend had convinced him that his opinions on the subject were erroneous. His noble and learned Friend had referred to the figures supplied by the gentleman who held the office of Registrar of the Admiralty Court—and of his fitness in every way to discharge the duties of that office no one could entertain a doubt—and those figures certainly showed a great increase of business. Returns, however, merely stating the number of causes heard constituted a most fallacious test, unless they knew what the nature of those causes was—and no difference was shown between those which were important and those which were unimportant. The number of days during which the Court was occupied formed a more reliable indication of the business done; and from this point of view also a great increase had taken place; for whereas in 1841 the sittings of the Court of Admiralty had been held only on thirty-eight days, in 1866 they covered 147 days, which, at the rate of six days in the week, would be between twenty-four and twenty-five weeks. In the previous year, however, the sittings had only been ninety-nine; and one great cause of the increase in the year 1866 was the Banda and Kirwee Booty case, which by itself occupied the time of the learned Judge for above a month. Deducting those sittings from 147, the number would be reduced to about 125; and taking an average of five years, as it was right to do, the sittings of the Court would be only 111 days, or about eighteen weeks and a half during the year. He did not think those figures represented such an amount of labour as to call for the assistance of a second Judge. The Returns with regard to the other Courts did not afford the means of calculating the number of days which they had sat, but only the number of causes heard. He admitted that it would be of great advantage if some high judicial functionary were appointed, whose duty it would be to attend the sittings of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; but he confessed he did not see any great reason for the appointment of additional Judges to the Courts referred to; and he did not think his noble and learned Friend had made out a case for any increase of the judicial staff in the direction referred to. He was not one of those who thought the House of Commons wanting in liberality in providing salaries for new Judges when a good case for appointing them was made out; but he calculated that the Bill under consideration would involve an expenditure of £17,500 a year, and that, he thought, the House of Commons should not be asked to provide, unless it could be well assured that the business of the Court would increase to an extent justifying such an expenditure. It was true that his noble and learned Friend had spoken of a Bill now pending in the House of Commons which proposed largely to extend the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court; and if that Bill passed a good case might be made out for the appointment of the new Judges. If, indeed, that Bill had passed the House of Commons and was before their Lordships, it might be that no objection could be raised to the noble and learned Lord's Bill. He would therefore recommend their Lordships to give the Bill a second reading, and postpone its further consideration until the Bill now in the House of Commons, referring to the Admiralty Court, had been disposed of by that House, and that then the two measures should proceed together. He did not object to the appointment of new Judges, if a necessity for them should be shown, and concurred in the proposal to put them on the same footing as other Judges as regards salary; but he contended that it was contrary to every principle of legislation to recommend a great increase of salary, and the constitution of a great Court before they were sure the business of the Court would increase to an extent justifying such a course. A precedent for carrying out his proposal for postponement was to be found in the conduct of their Lordships with reference to the Bankruptcy Bill introduced by Lord Westbury; they declined to create one of the Judgeships he recommended, on the ground that it was not clear he would have sufficient work to occupy his time. As to the introduction of a body of advocates learned in the civil law, he thought his noble and learned Friend rather sanguine, because the greater part of the business of the Court would be ordinary common and statute law. He quite approved, however, of the principle contained in the Bill, which proposed to bring into one Court the consideration of various descriptions of law; for he believed with Jeremy Bentham that every Court ought to administer all law.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that the business of the three Courts combined would be sufficient to occupy the whole time of the Judges. If those Courts were not fully occupied now, how was it that the Judges did not give their attendance at the Judicial Committee, where they were seldom seen, although they were qualified to sit there. The answer was that they would be glad to give their assistance if they had any spare time. His only desire was to see a good and useful Bill passed—one which would answer all the purposes intended—and he had no desire to press the measure on the House without sufficient information. He had not the slightest objection to act on the suggestion of his noble and learned Friend, and would accordingly, after the second reading, consent to the postponement of the Committee.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA BILL.

(NO. 9.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

LORD CAMPBELL: My Lords, the notice I have given will at once convey to your Lordships the intention to raise the only question on the Bill which can divide opinion—namely, whether it ought to stand over the Nova Scotia General Election, as a large body of petitioners desire, or be hurried through the Legislature.

My Lords, the noble Earl the Secretary of State, together with his Colleagues, no doubt deserves praise for having introduced the measure first into this House, as such a course was likely to advance its dignity and credit. But would that dignity and credit be maintained if no debate was tolerated on a subject which involves the fate of interests not to be surpassed, and territories hardly to be calculated; above all, if silence was imposed, and unanimity exacted, on topics which beyond our walls are variously agitated? On Tuesday the whole evening was consumed by speeches from official men in favour of the measure. On Friday the Committee came on at an hour which made discussion quite out of the question. The same thing occurred last night. By interposing now, I take the latest moment to advert to views which should have had a more effective organ; but which, if they were not adduced at all, the injurious conclusion might perhaps be drawn, that great measures ought not, until they have passed the other House, to be submitted to your Lordships.

My Lords, the Nova Scotian claim, endorsed by 30,000 persons, is founded mainly on a circumstance which has not yet been even hinted to your Lordships. And yet it is not doubtful or unknown, since, in the course of the vacation, it was referred to in a published letter by so conclusive an authority as the Under Secretary of the Colonies. A series of events has taken place in Nova Scotia on the franchise. The old 40s. freehold having been deserted as a basis, innovations were adopted which led on to universal suffrage. Universal suffrage called into existence the assembly by which the resolution to empower delegates was carried. It involved so much corruption as to lead to its repeal. The next General Election will be held in May, under the amended system which experience has prompted. The question is not, should a great inter-colonial scheme affecting Nova Scotia be referred from the Assembly to the people; but should it be determined by a body whose foundation is condemned when the delay of weeks might ascertain the judgment of a body whose foundation is unquestioned.

My Lords, the authority of Mr. Pitt has been advanced to show that Parliaments may join kingdoms without consulting the electors. On a point so abstract, Mr. Pitt was not unnaturally led to favour the solution by which his policy was vindicated. Locke, in an essay, has maintained the opposite opinion. But, granting the doctrine of Mr. Pitt to have been sound, and that of Locke to be mistaken, Mr. Pitt never ventured to maintain that an Assembly, whose essential principle had been recently discarded, ought to be permitted to cast into new and foreign combinations of existence the society it governs with a contested right and an invalidated efficacy. Neither philosophers or statesmen as yet have countenanced the principle. The power by which the Resolution was adopted is not the power to which Nova Scotia wishes to confide its destiny and government. Are they not entitled, on a matter which affects name, dignity, existence, commerce, and defence, to appeal from a system their intelligence rejects to a system their intelligence has chosen? But, my Lords, beyond this, the facts are not such as to imply, even on the part of the Assembly whose verdict would be so far from unimpeachable, a clear decision for incorporating Nova Scotia in the project now before us. The Bill is founded, I believe, on what is termed the Quebec scheme of 1864. When the Resolution, which alone engages the Nova Scotian Parliament, was in debate, its whole tenor, as our papers show, were against that project. The Leader of the Government was understood distinctly to renounce it. Our lights, indeed, may be imperfect upon this part of the subject, and I will not dwell upon it. But one thing is clear, the preamble of the Resolution comes before us in full and perfect authenticity. The preamble lays down the expediency of confederating British North America. But the decision of Prince Edward's Island, and Newfoundland, have been fatal to that object. It is one line of conduct for Nova Scotia to become combined with British North America, and another line of conduct for Nova Scotia to become isolated, or, at least, divided from the maritime dependencies. The conference at Quebec, in 1864, grew out of a conference at Charlotte Town, in Prince Edward's Island, of which the purpose was to combine the latter colony with Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. The original impressions from which the Resolution gradually sprung, would therefore now appear to militate against it. The whole history of the movement to unite the maritime dependencies, affords a fair presumption that Nova Scotia would not willingly, or without long deliberation and much division, separate her fate from that of the communities to which she had been so long and uniformly gravitating. We cannot, therefore, be surprised at the appeal which has been made, or the petitions which support it. The noble Marquess (the Marquess of Normanby), who has lately governed Nova Scotia, in an interesting speech, and in a warrantable manner, has endeavoured to throw doubt on the reality and power of the movement he referred to. He attributes 30,000 signatures to the machinery and eloquence exerted to obtain them rather than to any genuine conviction in the body of the people. Remarks, such as the noble Marquess made, might bear on any agitation at any time, in any country, and they have too large a sweep to be conclusive for their object. On what refers to Nova Scotian opinion, it would be presumptuous in me to controvert the noble Marquess. But the task has been already done by one more qualified to meet him. If the noble Marquess is disposed to reduce the agitation to a shadow, the noble Earl the Secretary of State enhances its importance. The noble Earl insisted that, if the limited delay in question was conceded, the whole scheme would be defeated. My Lords, by whom and what would it be in such a case defeated? It would not be by Canada, or by New Brunswick, to whom no reference is called for, and whose opinion is pronounced, but by the Nova Scotian movement, numbers and convictions of which the noble Marquess questions the existence. My Lords, I cannot but think the noble Earl the Secretary of State has been too prodigal in his admission. Looking to the evidence before us, I cannot take advantage—at least not to the full extent—of what he liberally offers. The appeal to the legitimate constituency might evidently bar the accession of Nova Scotia to the project; but wishing to avoid exaggeration—even when an adversary on the immediate question sanctions and invites it—I cannot go so far as to maintain it would inevitably do so. I will not lay down, what the noble Earl in substance has advanced, that the General Election which he fears would be quite certain to restrict Confederation to New Brunswick and to Canada. I do submit that we are bound in justice to appeal to it unless some Imperial necessity forbids us so to do. My Lords, if that necessity existed, we all know that it would have its origin in Canada. We know, also, that the noble Viscount (Lord Monck), who has just crossed the wintry Atlantic to enlighten the House upon the Bill before us, would never have omitted to explain it in his speech on Tuesday last. He did not point to such an exigency, either as regards the vulnerable frontier or the party complications of the colony he governs. Men of Parliamentary ability may sometimes lose command over a portion of their argument; but this essential link would never have escaped him. The noble Viscount did, indeed, remark that one central Legislature was better framed than four or five dispersed assemblies for the purpose of defence; but he certainly did not suggest that such a central body might control the operations of an army; and if he did, would scarcely recommend it to our confidence. The only military writers who have gone into the question of how far Confederation would increase the strength of British North America are two officers of artillery named Weber and Bolton, stationed in the garrison of Halifax, as well-informed as they had every reason to be impartial on the subject. The conclusion they support with masterly acuteness is that no further power of defence would accrue to these dependencies from a project which neither adds to population, or revenue, or to strongholds, which does not multiply armed men or bring new military genius into action, or mass together troops which would be otherwise divided. No exigency, therefore, to which this measure would respond is stated to exist as a reason for anticipating the Nova Scotian General Election. My Lords, if no exigency is in the way of an appeal to it, can it be said that no policy imposes and requires it? My Lords, unless I thought it did so I should not have come down to this House to-night, and still less have ventured to address it. The real issue—looking to Imperial security—which facts bring before us, has not been yet suggested to your Lordships. It is not whether British North America ought to be combined, but whether of the two combinations which will come into existence, the Canadian and the maritime, Nova Scotia ought to be attached to the latter or the former. My Lords, we must depart from general ideas, and weigh the very situation which presents itself before us. Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland have declined to join the Confederacy. If they eventually resolve on joining it Nova Scotia is nearly certain to share their resolution, and the question is disposed of. To hurry Nova Scotia in that direction is superfluous. But if Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland persist in keeping out of the Canadian or Continental system which invites them, the issue plainly is, with which of the two divisions ought Nova Scotia, for Imperial advantages and objects, to be blended. And that question can only be determined by referring to another—namely, whether or not, looking to the future, the retention of Nova Scotia may be important to the Empire. My Lords, that question opens large considerations, which I have no desire to approach, because it is enough to show the point to be a doubtful one in order to arrive at the conclusion that Nova Scotia ought not to be violently urged, against intelligible claims, into the Canadian system of the two which British North America exhibits.

Arguments may be used to show that Nova Scotia ought to be eventually abandoned, and arguments to show it ought to be eventually retained. On the one hand, it might divert a portion of our naval force from objects more important. It must, like Aden, Malta, Gibraltar, augment the national expenditure. On the other hand, in wars with France and the United States it has been found essential as a basis. Its geographical position renders it defensible. Bermuda, wanting coal, could never possibly replace it. If these considerations are only difficult to balance, if no maturity of judgment on them has been reached, they would suffice to prove that no step is wise which tends to pre-determine the detachment of Nova Scotia from our colonies. But how would this step do so? My Lords, it will not be denied that when Nova Scotia is attached to the system which the Bill creates it will most likely share its destiny and movement. It would scarcely be possible to break the artificial unity we now propose to organize. Is that unity itself without a germ of separation from the Empire? Is not a centrifugal direction, if not a centrifugal velocity, imparted to it? My Lords, I am led to think there is, without at all impugning it as regards Canada and New Brunswick, from a few circumstances which cannot fail to strike us. The new system will have a magnitude not much in harmony with the character of a dependency. Its type—that of federation—will be one under which dependencies have not as yet, I think, in any age been governed. But the language of the noble Earl the Secretary of State is still a graver omen of the future. The noble Earl has spoken of a new Power qualified to exist by the United States in dignified equality. But to let your Lordships see more fully the grandeur of the national conception he has formed, he added that Russia would hardly stand in a higher order of communities. I neither blame the calculation or repudiate the policy; but I submit to this House that, until we are prepared to surrender Nova Scotia, with the harbour, the garrison, and depôt it affords, it ought not to be abruptly and harshly plunged into a system over the destiny of which so little practical control appears to be anticipated by its founders. My Lords, I am perhaps exposed to the remark that Nova Scotia ought not to be incorporated in the scheme, if my view is just, whatever be the verdict of the General Election. But on questions of this kind it is allowed that colonial wishes and Imperial advantages should weigh together on our policy. Reproach will scarcely fall on individuals because they ask for less than argument would warrant. It would rather descend on Governments who resist a limited demand when policy would vindicate a more unqualified concession. A more unhappy moment could not be selected for sending the Bill to the other House of Parliament, unless the avowed object is to bar deliberation and make a chorus to repeat the statement of a Minister, or tribunal to register the edicts of his office. Distracted by a prospect which affects its own existence, the House of Commons cannot give its mind to British North America. I well know that the noble Earl the Secretary of State will be deaf to this consideration. He has now embarked on a career of irresistible velocity—

But I do venture, in no factious spirit and for no factious end, to appeal a single moment to his Colleagues, and to ask them whether I have at all misstated the events as regards the Nova Scotian franchise. Is the principle unsound that when the basis of a Parliament is seriously changed the amended system should determine questions vital to the people? Are we prepared, on military grounds, to part with Nova Scotia? Has the Bill, as it now stands, no tendency to separate it? Is it, therefore, a judicious course to repel the constitutional, the legitimate, and moderate demand that the verdict of the General Election in Nova Scotia should be listened to? When ought justice to control and generosity to influence if not when interest is dark and policy uncertain? When ought a scrupulous, a liberal and high-minded path to be adopted by a State if not when every other path is full of insecurity? The colonial measures of the Government will be scrutinized with more than ordinary rigour. The course of hurrying this Bill with unexampled haste through both the Houses, in order to defeat a claim which cannot be refuted, and to accelerate a loss which ought, at least, to be delayed, will never gain the approbation of posterity, even if in the distracted and heated times in which we live it should by any chance escape the censure of the public. The noble Lord moved that the Bill be read a third time that day month.

An Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Month.")
—(Lord Campbell.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: Considering how fully I trespassed on the patience of the House some days ago in respect to this subject, I do not think it will be necessary for me to go into all the arguments and precedents referred to by the noble Lord opposite, more especially as the larger proportion of the topics I dealt with on that occasion are identical with those brought forward by the noble Lord this evening. It is right for me to say at once that it is utterly impossible for me to agree to the Motion of the noble Lord for two or three reasons, which, I think, the House will at once admit to be conclusive. In the first place, the delegates who are at present in England, to the number of fourteen or sixteen, are gentlemen accredited by their own local authorities—they are the heads of opposite parties, or are the chiefs of important departments; they have been detained long in England awaiting the negotiation and passing of this measure, at great personal inconvenience to themselves, and, I must also say, to the great public inconvenience of their respective localities. I therefore greatly object to Parliament now, without any real and valid reason—and I can hardly admit that any such reason has been urged this evening—detaining these gentlemen for a fortnight or a month longer. And then as to the question of these 30,000 petitioners. We have never had any explanation as to who these petitioners really are. I believe the population of Nova Scotia is upwards of 250,000. Now, I am willing to take it as a fact, on the word of the noble Lord, that 30,000 of these are petitioners against this measure, but I must say that the evidence of that fact is wholly wanting. I understand that a petition has been presented in "another place;" but no petition whatever against this measure has been presented to your Lordships; and this House, therefore, is in no way cognizant of this petition. There are, indeed, various petitions in the blue book, which I laid upon the table of the House some time ago; but I found, as I stated when this Bill was read a second time, that all those petitions, one only excepted, were signed by the chairmen of the meetings, no statement being made either as to the number or the character of the petitioners on whose behalf they were signed. Then the noble Lord has founded an argument on the circumstances of some recent alterations in the franchises of Nova Scotia; but really, if this House is to go into all the intricacies and details of colonial government there can be no end to the matter. Such a course would have the effect of raising questions on every clause of the Bill. The House has simply to ascertain who are the constituted authorities of Nova Scotia, whom we are bound to listen to, and whose opinion we are bound to accept. Now, what have they said? In 1861 the then Parliament of Nova Scotia passed a Resolution in favour of Confederation in general terms. In 1863 that Parliament was dissolved, and a fresh Parliament was elected, and is in existence at the present moment. Well, it was only in June last that that Parliament came to a distinct Resolution in favour of Confederation — a Resolution as distinct as words could express it. That Resolution empowered certain gentlemen to proceed on their behalf to England to negotiate with Her Majesty's Government the terms of a measure to carry that vote into effect. These accredited envoys were accordingly sent, and the terms have been negotiated and embodied in this Bill. It appears to me that it is not competent for us to look behind that vote of the Nova Scotian Parliament, and to inquire what other parties may be in the colony, and under what circumstances the colonial local authorities and Legislature were elected. If responsible government means anything it means this—that you not only give to a colony free institutions, and enable the inhabitants to elect their own Parliament, but you also undertake, in matters of colonial policy, to deal only with that colony through the legally constituted authorities. Any other view of the case would lead us to endless difficulty. The fact is that in all cases like the present there must be a certain amount of opposition. The measure might be the most perfect that could possibly be framed; but, looking to the state of colonial society, there must be inevitably a certain number of dissentients. The noble Lord opposite says, "Delay this measure for another month in order to give time to the Nova Scotian Parliament to expire by the natural efflux of time, and see what the opinion of a fresh Parliament will be." Now, if I mistake not, the Nova Scotian Parliament expires in June, and the Canadian Parliament in July. Therefore, if you postpone this measure to June, you must also, in common fairness, again postpone it till after July, in order to give the Canadian Parliament an opportunity to express their opinion also. If this were done I would ask the House at what time it is likely that the measure would return to us, and in what shape it would return? The truth is that this measure has been brought about only at the sacrifice of great personal and local interests; and when I reflect how great that sacrifice has been, I feel quite astonished at the result which has been attained. A great responsibility would rest on Parliament in this country if they deliberately invited opposition to the measure by remitting the subject again to the colony, and stirring up every dissentient person to come forward and agitate the question. I do not say that this measure is a perfect one, for it is impossible that it could be. There are defects in it, no doubt; but, at the same time, the enormous advantages of the measure so completely outweigh its imperfections that I have no hesitation whatever in pressing it upon Parliament, and in urging that it may be speedily passed into a law. For these reasons I do not feel it my duty to accede in any way to the request of the noble Lord opposite. The Bill passed through the second reading in this House without any substantial objection being made to it, and I trust it will also be allowed to pass through the other House of Parliament.

LORD CAMPBELL said, in explanation, that he had never advocated a further reference to the Assemblies of Canada or of New Brunswick. He did not even think it would be essential to refer to that of Nova Scotia, which would soon be called into existence. The language and the indications of the General Election might alone suffice to point out whether Nova Scotia should be incorporated in the scheme, or left in the position of Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland.

Amendment (by Leave of the House) withdrawn: Then the original Motion was agreed to: Bill read 3^d accordingly: Amendments made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.
 OBSERVATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said: Mr. Speaker—I think it would be convenient to the House that I should take the earliest opportunity with respect to the subject of discussion yesterday of stating the course which the Government proposes to pursue with regard to that matter. The great object we had in view in bringing forward the Resolutions which were the subject of yesterday's discussion was really to secure for the propositions, which we hoped in a legislative form to introduce to the House, a fair and candid consideration. Now, it is impossible to conceal from myself, from the many observations that have been made by Gentlemen of authority in this House, and particularly the right hon. Gentleman opposite, that there is, if not a formal, yet, I would venture to say, a moral understanding and engagement that any Bill which the Government may bring forward on the subject of Parliamentary Reform shall receive a fair and candid hearing. Indeed, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets the other night, immediately followed by the right hon. Gentleman, seemed to enter into an engagement that the second reading of the Bill would meet with no difficulty. [Murmurs, and "Hear, hear!"] I do not wish to put a severe interpretation upon anything which has been said by Gentlemen in the course of our debates; but, from the spirit of courtesy that has been exhibited by the House, I think it right to take the earliest opportunity of saying that Her Majesty's Government, considering all that occurred in the House yesterday, and with a feeling on their part still that their mode of procedure would be extremely advantageous for the advancement of the question, and every day more and more convinces them of the propriety of the course they took. I say Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that they should best promote the course of public business and their own object in dealing with this question in not asking the House to proceed any further with the consideration of those Resolutions, but to allow me, on the earliest practical opportunity, to introduce a Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: When?] Of course, it is impossible exactly to fix a day. ["Oh, oh!"] The Reform Bill is not like a Road Bill. Considerable preparation will be necessary; but I should really think that probably in a week's time—"Oh!" and "Hear, hear!" I will not make a formal engagement, but my own opinion is that on Thursday week at furthest I shall have the honour, with your permission, of introducing a Reform Bill to this House. [For the Resolutions see Contents February 11 and Appendix.]

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman having referred to me upon a matter that is of considerable difficulty and importance, I find it necessary to follow the statement he has made, out of the usual order of business, although I do not say out of the discretion which he may be entitled to use under the circumstances—I find it necessary to follow that statement by a very few words, and lest any difficulty may arise on the question of Order, I think this is an occasion on account of the public interest attaching to the question on which I may properly conclude with a formal Motion for the adjournment of the House. As the right hon. Gentleman has made known to the House the intentions of the Government, I cannot avoid saying that great trouble would have been saved if he had announced that intention at the time when the whole reasons for the course, which he is now prepared to take, were placed in his possession by my hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) and by others who followed on that occasion. I am bound also to state to the right hon. Gentleman what, perhaps, he is not aware of, that, some minutes before the announcement he made to the House, I had myself placed in the hands of the Clerk a Motion to this effect, as an Amendment to the Motion that you, Sir, do leave the Chair on Thursday next in order to go into Committee—

"That Her Majesty's Government, having informed the House of the principal provisions of the Bill which they propose to introduce for an Amendment of the Representation of the People in Parliament, it is the opinion of the House that, under present circumstances, a discussion of the Resolutions now before it must tend to delay the practical consideration of the question, and that it will be for the public advantage that the plan of Her Majesty's Government should be submitted to the House in a definite form."

That Motion does not go so far as the right hon. Gentleman has gone; because, if carried, it would have left it open to Her Majesty's Government to take their choice between the re-construction of their Resolutions and the introduction of a Bill. But I do not hesitate to express my opinion that the course which the right hon. Gentleman has now announced, of the immediate introduction of a Bill, is the course most advantageous to the interests of the subject. Further, I will venture to say with reference to a momentary expression of impatience when the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the necessary delay, that the delay, whatever it may be, is a delay necessarily inherent in the mode of proceeding which has been adopted, and therefore is a delay for which the right hon. Gentleman cannot be liable to any blame on the present occasion. It is necessary that a certain time should be expended in the consideration of the details of the Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman will, I am sure, take care that such time shall not extend beyond what is absolutely necessary. I wish to cause no misapprehension to the right hon. Gentleman or anybody else with reference to the other important topic to which he adverted when he said that he had obtained from my hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets and myself something like an engagement that no opposition would be offered to the second reading of a Bill if introduced by Her Majesty's Government. With respect to that point, I must say that anything which tends to compromise or limit the discretion of Members of Parliament in any matter of proceeding is too important to be left a subject of misconception of any kind. I will therefore recall to the mind of the right hon. Gentleman exactly what took place. The question raised in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets, and in the remarks which I ventured to make, was not the question of opposition to the second reading of any Bill introduced by Her Majesty's Government in the usual and ordinary manner; but it was a question whether a particular point in some portion of that Bill was to be selected and embodied in a Motion, and then made the means and occasion of opposition to the second reading of the Bill. That was the immediate question in discussion, and I am desirous of not being misunderstood. I state this in vindication of my own liberty of action, and that of every Gentleman on this side of the House who could be presumed, in the slightest degree, to be interested or concerned in any remarks that might have fallen from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets and myself. It is our duty to preserve our discretion free and unfettered as to the Bill of Her Majesty's Government when presented to us—inasmuch as it must necessarily come before us in a form far more developed than it could possibly have been in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. It will be our duty, as Members of Parliament, in a matter of so much importance, deliberately and advisedly to make up our minds whether we can consent to the second reading of the Bill or not. Thus far, however, I will go. I will express a confident hope, and further, a very earnest and sincere desire, that we may find that Bill to be such that we cannot only assent to it, but even promote and expedite its passage through its earlier stages, so that if it be conducive to the public interest, we may join issue with Her Majesty's Government on those subjects, be they many or few—and that is a point upon which at the present moment I cannot give an opinion—upon which we may, unfortunately, be compelled to differ from the conclusions to which Her Majesty's Government may have come. For that purpose the Committee would evidently be the place. I admit that there are many circumstances in which, when great differences of opinion prevail and numerous and important Amendments are likely to be proposed, so as, if accepted, to be calculated to give an entirely different character to the Bill, it is often convenient that, without waiting for the Committee, issue should be joined on the second reading. But that is a question on which entire liberty of action should be reserved to us all. I shall be glad, however, if we arrive at a conclusion that the second reading may be supported, and that our differences may be brought to issue on the discussion of clauses in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—

MR. BRIGHT: As the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is in the mood for receiving advice from this House, I rise for the purpose of making a suggestion which some Gentlemen on this side may disapprove, and to which many Gentlemen opposite may think it is not in their power to accede. Still, I believe no wiser suggestion in favour of efficient

Parliamentary proceeding in a great question was ever offered to the House. I wish to recommend to the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether the advice which I gave to the Government of Earl Russell a little more than a year ago would not be wise advice for him to take—that is, to introduce his Franchise Bill by itself. I promise hon. Gentlemen opposite that if the right hon. Gentleman will do so, I will not read to them any portion of the speech made by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) last year. I make the suggestion with perfect honesty and sincerity, believing that it would be greatly to the interest of Parliament, and also that it is the duty of the right hon. Gentleman to take that course. What is it that you want particularly? Apart from the question of what is good in Parliamentary Reform for the whole nation, and in which every class may be said to be equally interested, you have this other special thing that you want. You want to remove an acknowledged grievance on the part of the excluded working classes. Suppose that the question of seats is not meddled with this Session, or next Session, or even the Session after that, yet we may all be conscious that it is a question that will sometime have to be dealt with. But it is not a question that creates differences between one great class and another. No class has any special grievance with respect to that particular evil in our representation. But the other question, that which refers to the exclusion—and notwithstanding the figures on the table, practically the almost total exclusion of the working classes—is a very different question; and I venture to say that every day that it is left unsettled it is charged with evil to all classes in the country. Take the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman as he sketched it last night. The universal feeling in the House, I think, is, that the plan on which he proposes to deal with the question of the re-distribution of seats is very incomplete and very unsatisfactory. It is as bad, at any rate, as the plan which was offered to us last year. Whether it is worse or not, I will not undertake to say. It is so bad, that I am quite sure that any time which the House might expend upon it, with a view to make a Bill of it as it is, would be time wasted, and it is one of those questions which the House would find the greatest possible difficulty in altering either in the Resolutions, which have been withdrawn, if it had been included in these Resolutions, or in the Bill which is to be submitted to the House. In fact, I do not know how we could, wishing to improve a Bill, really make anything useful out of the re-distribution plan which the Government has submitted to the House. Why should we not take the course of dealing with the franchise first? There were quotations made last year from what pretended to be a speech of mine, in which I said that if the franchise were extended, Parliament would be more popular—I hope it would—and that there would be a better leverage afterwards to deal with the questions of the little boroughs. Does not the right hon. Gentleman at this moment wish he had some leverage by which he could deal with those little boroughs? Are there not now in this House hon. Gentlemen who, if they sat for other constituencies, would wish the Parliamentary representation of such little boroughs exterminated? We have all an interest in getting rid of the representation of those little boroughs, and distributing the Members, whether amongst counties or large boroughs, at least amongst free and independent populations of the country. Such representation is bad for the Members of the House, and it is corrupting and evil to the little boroughs themselves. But you find every time when a Bill is brought in on the suffrage, as was done last year, and as is to be done this, it is clogged with this additional difficulty. When you have the chance of settling that paramount question of uniting the non-voting class with the present voting class, you have not the common sense to do that which is most wanted, which is the work of the hour and lies in your way. Why not leave for a subsequent Session—for two or three, or even half-a-dozen Sessions, or till after a General Election if you like—I am not at all particular as to time—the other question. I say, in the name of all that is patriotic, you ought to make up your mind to settle this question of the franchise without reference to the question of the re-distribution of seats. I have only noticed what I said in a public speech, for I had no communication with Lord Russell or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. I should have said it if this Government had been in power, and I say it now because I am satisfied it is the wisest course to pursue in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues will find their course infinitely smoothed by adopting the advice which I give them in all frankness. If he will make a change now—and he may do so with the utmost consistency, considering the many changes that at the present moment are said to be taking place—he may bring in a Bill in such a shape that there will be no disposition on this side of the House to contest the second reading; and in Committee there would be so few points to settle, that some hope might be entertained of its passing the House. But as to the Seats Bill, it is so unsatisfactory, so incomplete, so ridiculous for all purposes, that by bringing it forward at the same time you would be only clogging a matter which is absolutely necessary and may be done, with a thing that is not so necessary and cannot be done. I say, therefore, that to deal with the two together is not a statesman-like mode of dealing with this question. I have relieved my conscience by making this statement. The right hon. Gentleman will believe me that I give the advice from an honest wish and conviction that as we are in a difficulty on this question, every man should, if he can, help to smooth the way out of it, and enable us to do something satisfactory to the great body of the people. The right hon. Gentleman having received so much courtesy and so many kind offers from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, I have shown him this courtesy and made him this offer. After the many difficulties which hon. Gentlemen opposite have got into since the meeting of Parliament, I am not quite sure that they may not take a little advice from this side of the House, and I believe that what I have suggested will smooth their course as much as any advice that has been hitherto given them. The right hon. Gentleman, I hope, will consider it between this and next Thursday, for it is quite clear that if he cannot bring the whole Bill in next Thursday, he will be able to bring half of it in, and we may have a fairer and better Franchise Bill if he would devote his whole attention to that particular branch of the subject.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, the hon. Member for Birmingham having, on former occasions, assumed a monopoly of honesty on this question of Reform, I am not surprised that on this occasion he should go a step farther and claim a monopoly of wisdom. He knows that he has not the slightest chance of being supported by the great body of Gentleman who sit on his own side of the House; but he is nevertheless so persuaded of the wisdom of the course suggested, that he does not hesitate to recommend it to my right hon. Friend. It is not, however, new advice. It is advice which a former Government adopted. Strange to say, the hon. Gentleman forgot to tell us the result of that advice. I should like to know Earl Russell's opinion of the advice which was given to him. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman, before we adopt his recommendation, will allow us to ascertain whether Earl Russell is satisfied of the wisdom of the advice on which he acted last year. The hon. Gentleman went on, in a mode which is rather inconsistent with the speedy despatch of public business, to discuss at considerable length the proposals of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the re-distribution of seats. I will not on this occasion follow so very inconvenient an example. I will only say we are of opinion that our scheme is one which can be sustained by argument when the proper time comes. It does not appear to Her Majesty's Government that the course which the hon. Gentleman suggests is more likely to be successful now than it was last year. I hope, however, the hon. Gentleman will not think that we are receiving his advice in any other spirit than that in which he offered it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

IRELAND—EMPLOYMENT OF THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.—QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a Question relative to certain alleged proceedings of a large police force under Sub-Inspector Gilpin, in Dingle, on the 15th instant?

LORD NAAS said, in reply, that the statement in the newspapers was not altogether correct. Sub-Inspector Gilpin exercised his men in the street, but he was informed that there was no firing on the occasion. The County Inspector and the Inspector General had, however, expressed their disapproval of this proceeding.

SCOTLAND—COLLECTORS OF TAXES. QUESTION.

MR. E. CRAUFURD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether there is an intention of making a change in the office of Collectors of Taxes and Distributors of Stamps in Scotland by transferring the duties to officers of Customs or Excise, or otherwise, as vacancies occurred in the present appointments?

MR. HUNT: In Scotland, Sir, distributors of stamps are also collectors of taxes, which is not the case in England. It has within the last three or four years been the practice, upon the occurrence of vacancies in distributorships of stamps in towns where there are collectors of Excise, to transfer the duties discharged previously by the distributors of stamps to the collectors of Excise. In Scotland this arrangement has at present only been effected at Dumfries and Glasgow; in England it has been carried out in fourteen places, and the change will be carried out throughout the United Kingdom as opportunities offer. It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government, as at present advised, to transfer the duties of distributors of stamps and collectors of taxes to officers of the Customs Department.

STORM SIGNALS OF THE BOARD OF TRADE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he has received Memorials or Communications from the Meteorological Society of Scotland, mercantile bodies at Leith, Glasgow, Dundee, Aberdeen, and Edinburgh, or from any of them, or from other bodies in Great Britain or elsewhere, respecting the discontinuance of Storm Signals by the Board of Trade, and whether he will lay such Memorials before the House; whether he has considered the greatly increased cost of the proposed plan of sending Meteorological data by telegraph to seaports, instead of a short recommendation as heretofore from the Board of Trade to "hoist storm signals;" and whether the proposed plan may not prove abortive in many instances from the parties at the ports not being "experts" in the interpretation of meteorological phenomena?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, the Board of Trade has received various memorials and communications from several mercantile bodies on this subject, but I am not aware that direct communication has been received from the Meteorological Society of Scotland. I have no objection to produce all the memorials that have been received. The purport of them has been correctly described by the hon. and gallant Member; they are all expressions of regret at the discontinuance of the signals. With regard to the probable cost of the proposed plan, I may mention that the committee of the Royal Society proposes that the information spoken off should be given to those places which may express a wish to have it, and are willing to bear half the expense of the communication. No applications have yet been received, so that I can hardly say what the probable cost would be. With regard to the third part of the question, it is not probable that any place would be willing to bear half the expense of the information unless they had the means of properly interpreting the local phenomena of the district; and the committee of Lloyd's Society are of opinion that the plan proposed is the most likely method of carrying out the object in view.

MR. M. T. BASS said, he wished to know, whether it would not be advisable to erect some midland station as well as the stations on the coast?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I am not aware that this point has been particularly brought under the notice of the committee, but I will draw their attention to it.

IRELAND—WATERFORD COUNTY ELECTION—THE 12TH LANCERS AT DUNGARVAN.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having regard to his answer on Thursday last (to the Question of the hon. Member for Tralee), to the effect that if the sixteen men of the 12th Lancers had broken away from the control of their Commanding Officer and had charged along the Quay of Dungarvan he (the Secretary of State for War) should consider further inquiry necessary, it is to be understood that, notwithstanding the sworn testimony of the witnesses on both sides before the Coroner, the official Report of the Officer in command denies that the sixteen men charged along the Quay, or, if they did charge, denies that they did so without orders; and whether the Officer has given, or has been required to give, any explanation to show how stabbing through the breast with a lance Harbour Master Keily, who admittedly was not one of the mob, and was standing near the door of his dwelling at a considerable distance from the scene of alleged stone-throwing, was, in the language of the Report, "unavoidable?"

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, in my answer to the Question put to me on Thursday, I read a verbatim copy of the official report of the officers commanding the 12th Lancers at the affair in question, which concluded by saying that "the men carried out the orders of the magistrates, communicated to them through him." With regard to the latter part of the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, the officer in command has reported that he was on the other side of the bridge at the time in question. Any question arising out of the finding of the jury would be a matter for civil inquiry, and if the hon. and learned Member puts any question respecting it to the Law Officers for Ireland they will be able to give him an answer.

MR. SERJEANT BARRY said, he would call the attention of the House to the subject on another occasion.

QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, that he begged to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department a Question of the greatest importance, of which he had not had the opportunity of giving him any notice, as to Whether any communication has been received from the authorities of Wolverhampton in reference to certain Roman Catholic riots that have taken place there, and whether he has received any explanation from the stipendiary magistrate of the town on what grounds he had refused protection to a gentleman there—Dr. Armstrong—a gentleman of high position, who appealed to the Magistrates publicly for protection against the rioters, and was publicly refused it? In justification of this assertion he (Mr. Whalley) held in his hand a letter from the district, saying that in consequence this gentleman had received several threatening letters from persons who signed themselves Fenians, and he had written to him (Mr. Whalley) in a state of genuine alarm that these threats would be carried into effect. He attributed it to the fact of his having been publicly denied protection by the Stipendiary Magistrate.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I have only to inform the hon. Member that I received no communication from the stipendiary magistrate with reference to the riots or to the particular matter involved in the Question of the hon. Member. If he had been good enough to give notice of those Questions before coming down to the House, I could have made inquiries at the office if any communications had been received up to the moment of my leaving.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had only received the information since he entered the House.

PRINCESS OF WALES—REPLY OF HER MAJESTY.

The Comptroller of the Household reported Her Majesty's Answer to the Address, as follows:—

"Your loyal and dutiful Address on the Birth of the Princess, My Granddaughter, has afforded me much satisfaction; and I thank you for the renewed assurance of your attachment to my Person and Family."

ARMY (INDIA AND THE COLONIES).

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MAJOR ANSON said, that after the military events of last year no apology seemed to be required for bringing under the notice of the House the duties performed by the British army in India and the colonies. The Indian and colonial duties of the British army were very different from the duties performed by the armies of other nations, and were the main reason why it was more expensive and less fit for the purposes of war than the army of any other country. Our Empire was composed of a larger number of different races—many of whom were of a warlike character—than any other Empire in the world. We were also more scattered than any other nation. It was often said on the discussion of these questions that the British army was an army of defence, and not of aggression. He did not object to the term "army of defence," but only to the spirit in which it was used. The army had many duties to perform other than the defence of this country. In the first place, the defence of Canada and the North American colonies must mainly depend upon the British army, although, no doubt, they would receive a loyal and gallant assistance from the militia and population of Canada in the defence of a frontier of 1,000 miles in extent. The maintenance of our maritime supremacy must also depend upon our garrisoning with a sufficient force such places as Malta, Gibraltar, Halifax, Bermuda, the Mauritius, and other places which it was necessary to garrison for the refuge and provisioning of our fleets. The British army was also necessary for the defence of commercial communities, such as China, the Straits settlements, the West Indies, and colonies like New Zealand, the Cape of Good Hope, Australia, &c. In those places, in case of a war with a great maritime Power, so far from—as was the general impression—our being able to bring reinforcements from those colonies to the mother country, we should, on the contrary, be obliged to send reinforcements from the mother country to those colonies and military dependencies. That would entail an enormous amount of duty on our army in time of war. In the late Russian war it was very different, because we were able to shut up the fleets of that country in their own harbours; but in the event of any future war with a great maritime Power we should find circumstances greatly changed. He now came to the case of India. The duties to be discharged there by the British army were even more onerous than in the case of the colonies, and the importance of them could hardly be exaggerated. Years ago, when we were consolidating our power in that country, a large Native army was absolutely necessary. We had little or no fear of mutiny or disaffection in its ranks—in the first place, because we kept it actively employed, and next, because we kept alive the feelings of hatred and animosity among the different races and castes. But when the Punjab had been annexed, and a period of peace came, the Native army sank into a state of idleness. The English army had been greatly reduced; the Native army had gradually begun to feel its power, and the Government of India felt its power also. The consequence was that the bonds of discipline gradually relaxed in the Native army, which finding itself in possession of all the great fortified places and artillery of the country, felt that it only had to stretch out its hand and snatch the power from us. During the Crimean war rumours of disaster to our arms began to be spread about in India, and the result was that the lethargy which overtook the administration there after the consolidation of our power was rudely broken upon by the great Mutiny of 1857. A great many persons had tried to explain the causes of that mutiny, which he thought was, perhaps, the most natural occurrence that had ever taken place in the history of the world. They had been told by various authorities that the real cause of the mutiny was the injustice of our rule in India, our denial to the Native Princes of the right of adoption, our interference with their religious feelings and customs, the land question, and, last but not least, our policy of annexation. If these authorities were right in their conjectures, the Native army would have been backed up by a popular rising or by the Native Princes. But, on the contrary, with the exception of a very few small districts and a few robber chiefs, there was no popular rising of any kind. Others, again, had attributed the mutiny to the issue of greased cartridges to the troops, which so insulted their feelings that they thought it necessary to rise, because they feared they were to be forcibly converted to Christianity. If that had been the real cause, the population would have broken out into rebellion, too; because, if the army were convinced that it was intended to convert them by force to Christianity, they certainly would have had the support of the people. The Returns he held in his hand were quite sufficient alone, without going into anything else, to account for the mutiny of the Bengal Army. It appeared from the Adjutant General's Returns for 1857 of the numerical proportions and local distribution of the Native army and the British troops respectively in Bengal and the North Western Provinces of India in that year, that an enormous disparity then existed between the strength of the two forces. In the seven divisions, from Calcutta to Peshawur, we had 195,000 Native troops and 17,000 British troops. In the Lahore, Scinde, and Peshawur division, there were 12,000 British troops to 70,000 of the Natives. In the Meerut, Cawnpore, Presidency, and Dinapore division, there were 5,000 British troops to upwards of 90,000 of the Natives; and in the Cawnpore division there were 35,000 Native troops to only 1,500 British soldiers. Those figures were quite enough to explain the cause of the mutiny. His object in reverting to the time of that outbreak was to impress on the House the real danger they had to fear in India. Until this country had accomplished its mission in India, until we had educated and civilized its inhabitants—which it was our duty to do without reference to the consequences to us—until we had taught them to govern themselves, there was no fear of any danger to our Empire from anything except the Native army which we had raised, trained, armed, and disciplined ourselves. No doubt things had greatly changed since 1857. At present we had a very much smaller Native army in India than we had then, and on the other hand a much larger force of Europeans. At this moment there was not the slightest danger of a rising in the Native army there. But we ought to look at the position we must hold in that country in case of war, and of any great strain being put upon our military power at home. At present we had to maintain an army of 65,000 men in India in order to keep that country quiet, and overawe, as it were, the small force of Native troops which we had now. But in time of war we should be obliged to draw largely from that force of Europeans. In the present day, when communication between Europe and India had become so rapid, and in India itself was being so quickly developed, India would vibrate much more to the occurrences in Europe than she had hitherto done; and those who possessed in that country the power to disturb us there would be more likely to take advantage of their opportunity than they ever were before. The duties the British army was liable to perform in time of war were not small. Moreover, the enormous amount of foreign duty it had to perform at all times was a serious drawback to it during peace. There was a curious circumstance to begin with connected with the British army, and that was that the influence of age upon the mortality of the soldier increased from the time he entered it, while in most other armies it decreased up to some ten or twelve years' service. The last Army Sanitary Report furnished an illustration of this. He need hardly point out to the House that the great amount of tropical service performed in India, China, the Mauritius, and other places, must have a very serious effect on the physical condition of our soldiers in case they had to undertake a hard campaign in Europe. It was utterly impossible to expect these men to compete in marching with foreign troops who spent their lives in their own climates. That was a very important matter when they thought of the enormous amount of foreign work which our soldiers had to undergo. But it had also a very serious effect upon recruiting for the army; for it was absurd to say that our soldiers liked the idea of being banished to an unhealthy climate, where the chances were almost ten to one in favour of their being either ruined in constitution or dying. It likewise had a very bad effect in preventing a better class of men from entering the army—a most important consideration in the present day, when they were applying science to the art of war at the rapid rate they were now doing. Another point, though he did not like to say much about it, was this—that a great number of officers were sent, during the best years of their life, to out-of-the-way places, where they had nothing whatever to interest them. They were not so likely to get a large proportion of good officers, if they were to be so long banished, as they were now, from the centres of civilization. In the first place, therefore, it must be felt that it was desirable to do something to diminish the immense amount of foreign service undergone by our army in time of peace, and, in the next place, to diminish the duties it would have to perform in time of war, so as to be enabled to reduce with some safety, and utilize elsewhere, the enormous European force now locked up in India. The way to do that would be by utilizing the Native army in India, and by putting it for foreign service upon the rota with the English army for colonies and places where the climate and the duties to be performed were suitable to the constitutions and mode of life of such Native troops. He would refer to those colonies in which Native troops might with advantage be employed. He would first touch upon China, because we were able, from having employed Native troops, to form an opinion as to the advisability of using them generally. During the fourteen years from 1850 to 1864 the loss in China was, of European troops, 1,300 dead, 2,500 invalided, out of an annual average force of 1,300 men. The whole force had been sacrificed three times over in fourteen years. This was a scandalous waste of our soldiers for no purpose whatever. In the three years preceding 1864 Native troops from India had been employed in the most beneficial way. The mortality in China of white troops was 57 per 1,000, whilst that of black troops was only 23. The proportion of white troops invalided was 57, whilst that of the black troops was only 27. The proportion of white troops constantly sick was 74, whilst that of the black troops was only 49. The influence of age on the mortality ran up, in the case of Europeans, in twenty years, from 40 to 118; whilst in the case of the black troops it decreased from 31 to 28. These statistics clearly established the inference that black were, so far as health was concerned, more useful than European troops in China. When the black troops were withdrawn an epidemic set in among the Europeans, because they had to perform duties which were previously performed by the former; that course having been taken without the opinion of a single officer who had served in China having been asked as to the propriety of the step. The result was that the white troops had been so reduced by the epidemic as to have been rendered perfectly useless. There were, however, two objections made to the non-employment of European and the employment of black troops in China. The persons whose wishes seemed for the most part to be consulted on the matter were the Chinese merchants, and they seemed to be of opinion that they would not be safe if left to the protection simply of Native soldiers. His answer was that there was hardly a Chinese merchant at Hong Kong who had not, in all probability, two-thirds of his capital at Shanghai, where there were no European soldiers at all, and not even an English fleet. The same might be said of Singapore, where the population was infinitely worse than that of Hong Kong. But if it is absolutely indispensable to employ some Europeans there, their numbers might be so small as to enable the authorities to take such care of them as to obviate the effects of the climate. In case of a foreign attack on our Chinese settlements, their defences must entirely depend on naval defence. It was true that the Government had raised local corps for service in China and Singapore; but in case of war in China, Japan, or the Malayan peninsula, we should have to fall back on the Indian army as we did in 1860, and your forces ought to be always adapted, in time of peace, to the duties they would be called on to perform in time of war. Passing from China to New Zealand, where we still kept up a regiment of European troops—the only object being that they should help the colonists in their bush-fighting—he maintained that such work would be done quite as efficiently by a regiment of Native troops from India. As to Australia he should never dream of sending black troops among an Anglo-Saxon population; but he did not see why we should keep there and at New Zealand 4,000 soldiers, at an expense of £127,600, when there was no reason why we should spend a single sixpence for the purpose. Taking, in the next place, the Mauritius, the House would find, from the evidence which had been taken before the Select Committee on the Military Expenditure for the Colonies, which sat in 1861, that Sir John Burgoyne stated, in answer to the question how many men it would take to defend the fortifications erected there at a cost of £200,000, that 6,000 men at least would be required. Was it likely that we should at any time send out such a force from this country to garrison the Mauritius? The money spent on these fortifications had been literally thrown into the sea. The only way in which they could be garrisoned would be by the employment of Native troops from India, who might defend the fortifications in the event of any sudden and temporary attack. Again, at the Cape we still kept a large force for the purpose of protecting the frontier; but that duty also, could be performed most efficiently by Native Indian troops. Other reasons were assigned for having a large force at the Cape, one being that we by that means provided a sort of army of reserve for India; but we ought never so to reduce the European force in that country, or the Native troops so increase, as to make it a matter of vital importance for us to be able to secure the service of two regiments from the Cape. It should be borne in mind that we were every day getting practically nearer to India than the Cape itself, and that it would be easier to despatch troops from home in the event of their being required than from the Cape. The idea, however, prevailed that it was desirable to keep up in the colony a force of European troops, so that we might be able to draw upon it in the event of pressure here in time of war; but it would be just as well, considering what a future maritime war would be, to maintain a large station in the Arctic regions with that object as at the Cape of Good Hope, as it would be doubtful whether any large body of troops from there would ever be allowed to reach this country. He came next to the West Indies, where we spent something like £300,000 in providing a mere police. We had there a large black force, and a large European force to guard them, and it was desirable that some alteration in that state of things should be introduced, for it was a system useless in time of war, and therefore expensive in time of peace. He did not see why troops should not be brought from India. As to Malta and Gibraltar, it would be well that we should be in a position to reinforce those great garrisons from our Eastern Empire as well as from the West. The duties which were there to be discharged were admirably adapted to Native troops, who could fight well behind stone walls. The state of those great fortresses showing what power this country had for keeping the highway between England and India, would have a very considerable effect on the impressionable mind of the Native army in India. In the last campaign in China, in 1860, our gallant allies, the French, not having the enormous resources of a country like India to turn to, were not to be compared in efficiency to the British troops. A very favourable effect as to the power of England was thus produced on the minds of the Indian troops. Having pointed out the way in which the duties of the British army might be lessened, the military power of this country consolidated and strengthened in time of war, and this country relieved from serious anxiety in respect to India, he would now proceed to consider the various objections which might be urged to the plan. It might be said that it would lead to an increase of the number of British troops at home; but he thought that the saving effected by the employment of Native troops as he suggested would enable the country to increase to a certain extent the number of troops at home. One great object should be to keep our troops at home for half their time, and this could only be done by curtailing the duties they were now called upon to perform. It might be said that it would not be safe to employ the Indian troops in the colonies; for if there were fears of their mutinying in India it might also be dreaded that they would mutiny in the colonies. There was a great difference, however, in the circumstances of the two cases. In India the Native troops lived in the midst of a sympathizing population, and had an opportunity to mutiny; but if sent from their own country to isolated stations there would be no chance of mutiny, for they would know that the only means by which they could hope to return again to India would be by the employment of British ships for the purpose. It might be objected, perhaps, by the colonies that it was not desirable for them to have Indian troops; but the fact was that those troops were better behaved than European troops. They seldom, or never, gave way to drunkenness, and, consequently, instances of crime were comparatively few among them. It might be objected that his proposition amounted to a proposal for the employment of mercenaries. At the time of the Crimean War, when this country was hardly pressed for troops, search was made in the back slums of Europe in order to make up that wretched force called the Foreign Legion. It would have been much better to have had recourse to those races which were subject to the rule of England than to have gone a begging for soldiers in the cities of Europe. There were other objections to the plan he proposed, connected with the difficulty of recruiting in India for this purpose, and the amount of pay and pensions to be granted; but these were matters which might be left for the consideration of the Select Committee. He believed that the plan he had sketched would, if adopted, lead to a very great saving in the military expenditure for colonial purposes, and be the cause of an enormous increase of strength to the country in time of war. He likewise thought that it would tend to remove a great source of anxiety in India, and give this country far greater power and control over the Native Indian army. In 1856 and 1857, before the great Mutiny broke out, there were certain regiments which showed symptoms of disaffection. The authorities, not having the courage to punish them severely, caused them to be paraded and addressed on the enormity of their offence. Then they were disbanded, the discharged soldiers being allowed to return to their own districts, there to sow the seeds of discontent. Should it be argued that if Indian troops were wanted in case of war in Egypt or elsewhere we could always obtain them, his answer would be that no system would be efficient in time of war that was not carefully organized in time of peace, and that in matters of this sort we ought not to trust to the chapter of accidents. Under his plan, in case disaffection appeared in any regiment, the disaffected troops might be marched down to Calcutta and embarked for duty in some other region. Should it be objected that it would not be advisable to withdraw Native Indian troops to the colonies, as their services might be required in other parts—in Egypt, for instance, he replied that it was impossible to have any efficient system unless it was previously organized in time of peace. In the case of a European war our colonies must mainly depend on naval defences, and the nature of the troops employed would be a matter of very little importance. He deeply felt the importance of the subject, and his object was to draw attention to our military system in the colonies and in India, which contained the greatest seeds of danger to ourselves and those who were dependent upon us.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the duties performed by the British Army in India and the Colonies; and also to inquire how far it might be desirable to employ certain portions of Her Majesty's Native Indian Army in our Colonial and Military Dependencies.”—(Major Anson.)

MR. O'REILLY said, he had an Amendment to propose, which would not clash with the proposition of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, but rather enlarge the scope of the inquiry. He proposed to add to the Motion the following words: “or, to organize a force of Asiatic troops for general service in suitable climates.” Three objections had been urged to the employment of Native troops. First, that the distinction of caste and religion prevented their employment out of their own country. Secondly, an interference with the Indian army, as to pay, and rate of service. Thirdly, that it would be interfering with the control of Parliament, over the whole force employed. If we wished to employ Indian troops in our other colonies, we might either take the whole Indian army, as it existed, and put it upon the general Establishment, or we might take a branch of that army, and deal with it in that way, or we might organize another special Asiatic force. The words he proposed to add to the Motion would only extend the scope of the inquiry. It was surprising that the subject had never been brought forward before, for he did not believe there had ever been another instance where a country had spread forth its Empire, from one small centre, over a great part of the world, and held its foreign possessions by troops recruited from the home soil only. France, with its comparatively small African territory, had organized African troops. When Spain conquered so large a portion of Europe, did she hold these possessions by Spanish troops only? No. She had her Walloon Guards and troops of every country subject to her arms. And when Rome had Empire over the entire circuit of the known globe, did she ever think of recruiting her legions from the Roman soil alone? No, she took advantage of the military capacity of every people to supply what the limited soil of Italy could not afford. There was a difficulty, and it increased, in recruiting for the small army which we maintain. The drain upon our population for European troops was enormous. In May last we had 203,568 European soldiers under arms; 86,999 of them being in Great Britain, distributed in this manner:—There were 6,195 men in our household troops, 58,000 in complete regiments and battalions, and 22,800 in depôts and detachments. He might here urge that we had had an unnecessary number of depôts, and that a true economy might be found in diminishing the number of our European troops abroad and the number of our depôts at home. In India we had 51 battalions of European infantry, and 11 regiments of cavalry, containing 63,600 men; in our two great garrisons in the Mediterranean we had 11,300 troops; at the Cape and St. Helena, 4,300; in New Zealand and Australia, 5,700; in China and Japan, 2,275; in Ceylon (exclusive of local corps), 980; in the Mauritius, 1,800; in Canada, Nova Scotia, and our North American provinces, 12,300; in the West Indies, 3,000; and on passage, 5,000. In addition to these, having found our home troops insufficient for the colonial service, we had, on emergency, and to stop a gap in time of danger, here and there, organized local corps, and of these there were in the West India regiments, 3,000 men; in the Ceylon Rifles, 1,200 men; of Canadian rifles, 1,200 men; and of Cape rifles, 500 men. He doubted whether it was conceivable to imagine a worse system of supplying troops for colonial service than that of raising local corps in the manner now adopted. It was admitted that our army possessed great advantages in the variety of service it saw, and its chance of active service in every part of the globe. On the other hand, a colonial corps remained in one place, it could never meet any enemy but a local one, and the officers, deprived of the prospect of a distinguished career, must settle down to perpetual expatriation from their country, and the command of a corps, in which they could never rise, beyond the rank of lieutenant-colonel. It was almost impossible that such a corps could attain distinction in military service; and yet such a corps was to be organized for China, and officered by officers on the half-pay list. Could men, who had the prospect of spending their lives in China, be expected to enter, heart and soul, into their military duties? It was impossible that a corps, thus irremovable, should attain to a state of satisfactory efficiency. We had, on all stations, home and foreign, of European troops, altogether 197,000 men to deal with. Of these, we had at home 40 battalions, leaving out depôts; and, in India and the colonies, or on passage, 100 battalions; the practical result being that we condemned our troops to ten years abroad, in unhealthy climates, for five at home; and even these terms, with them, we did not keep. The House might conceive what a check it was to recruiting, to have such prolonged service in such climates. He suggested that a force of Asiatic troops should be raised for employment in our colonies—for instance, three out of eleven battalions of troops employed at our Mediterranean stations might be composed of Asiatic soldiers, and probably eight more battalions might be substituted for a similar number of battalions of Europeans in our Asiatic colonies. We had a number of colonies stretching together in one long line on the map, from the Cape to the top of Japan. Next the Cape was the Mauritius; then our possessions (at present nearly ungarrisoned) in the Red Sea; then (leaving out our Indian possessions) Ceylon, Singapore, Borneo, Australia, and New Zealand, China and Japan. We might economize our troops to the greatest possible extent, and meet the difficulty of recruiting by rendering service less distant and onerous. There were two immense elements of management, of increasing force every day, which we might very well employ for such a purpose—the telegraph and our improved means of steam transport. If hon. Gentlemen would look to the Report of the Committee of last year on Indian Communications, they would see that the submarine telegraph would soon extend throughout the whole line of our possessions in the East to which he had referred, and practically all those possessions would become one vast military position. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, in his evidence before the Commission on Recruiting, said that he was most favourable to the employment of Asiatic troops, but that there must always be a backbone of European troops to support this system. But where was this backbone to be placed? Singapore was a good central point for the whole China seas; it was a healthful place besides, and any number of troops desirable might be retained there. Was it not plain that the way to use our troops with most economy and efficiency was to reserve the European portion for the backbone of our strength, to keep them in healthful places, and to supplement them by Asiatic troops in the more distant stations, the telegraph and steam transport giving efficiency to the system? Take, therefore, Singapore as a central point, particularly healthy for Europeans, where we had at present only some two companies of Europeans, with six of the Ceylon Rifles. Measuring distances by the days occupied in steaming, the distance from Shanghai was only about twelve and a half days; Japan, thirteen; and Ceylon, ten. By means of the telegraph and the new Indian transports, in course of construction, troops could be moved as far even as Japan certainly in less time than a month. On the other side, the distance from Point de Galle to Suez was sixteen days, and on to the Cape twenty-six days. Make this line the backbone of colonial defence supplied with Asiatic troops, and we should likewise be strengthened by keeping in practice our main defence—the navy, which suffered from the want of movement, and of employment on different stations. Was it not time to look at this question in a large and comprehensive spirit, and to organize our forces on a system which might be applied to the general advantage of the Empire? When the war in China first broke out troops were borrowed from the Indian establishment. That was felt to be wrong, and successive Secretaries for War appeared to think it unconstitutional. He believed the first to say so was the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and so it went on until the beginning of last year, when one Secretary for War took courage and sent Europeans to China, and the fatal result was seen in the destruction of two battalions of European troops. What successive Secretaries of State were to be blamed for, was endeavouring to tide over the difficulty and to live from hand to mouth, thinking, perhaps, that the system would go on without breaking down as long as they should remain in office. He was not in favour of removing the responsibility from the Advisers of the Crown as to the proper way of dealing with the question.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words, "or to organize a force of Asiatic Troops for general service in suitable climates."—(Mr. O'Reilly.)

MAJOR DICKSON said, he thought the House was much indebted to the hon. and gallant Member (Major Anson) for bringing forward the question; for the opinion of an officer who had seen so much service, and was so well acquainted with the manners and customs of the Natives of India, was entitled to great weight. Considering our voluntary system of enlistment, the increasing demand for labour, and the advancing rate of wages, it was high time to inquire whether the population of this country were able to bear the annual drain which was required for the defence of India and our colonies. England owned her position as a first-class Power mainly to her dominion in the East, her vast dependencies, and her increasing commerce; and if in any extremity we were unable to defend our possessions and protect our commerce, she would necessarily sink to the rank of a second or even third-rate Power. It was sometimes argued that our ancestors having been able to dispense with extraneous aid in upholding our national honour, we ought to do the same. But from the time of Lord Clive to the Mutiny of 1857 we had held India by the employment of Native troops. In 1857 we had in India no less than 235,000 Native soldiers, the European forces numbering only 22,000 Queen's troops, and 14,000 Company's troops. At the close of the Crimean war also we were obliged to raise a foreign legion, though he believed that had that legion been brought into active service its exploits would not have justified the outlay which had been expended upon it. Even if our ancestors found themselves able to protect the national honour without recourse to foreign troops, it must be remembered that the value of labour had very much increased, that emigration was on an extensive scale, and that armies were of much greater size and magnitude than formerly. The experience of 1857 showed how essential it was to the very existence of our Indian Empire to employ almost entirely a European force in that country. He believed

we had now 65,000 European troops there, and, in his opinion, not one of these could be spared. Last Session, in recommending the employment of the Sikhs, he expressed an opinion that the annual casualties in our Anglo-Indian army amounted, in time of peace, to 10 per cent. He had been since furnished with Returns by the Adjutant General which showed that in 1865, out of a force of 66,039 men, 1,667 died, 568 were discharged, 5,166 were invalided, or their time had expired, and they declined to re-enlist, making a total of 7,401, or rather more than 11 per cent. He was informed at the Horse Guards that 1865 was an average year, so that it was necessary to send to India about 7,000 men annually to reinforce our army there. If we succeeded in making the army more popular, by an increase of pay or by improving the position of the soldier, we should doubtless be able to meet that claim. The question, however, naturally suggested itself whether we could maintain such an Indian army in the event of our becoming involved in a great European war; and it appeared to him that our experience in the Crimean war proved that that question must be answered in the negative. During that war we had only 22,000 soldiers of the Royal army in India, and yet we found it necessary to withdraw some of those men for service in the Crimea. But he feared that if such an operation were effected on any large scale it would be regarded in that country as a sign of weakness on our parts, and might become the signal for a new revolt. If that were so, it became the duty of the Government and of that House to see how far we might be able to meet any exigency that might arise; and upon that point there were two things, he thought, which they ought most carefully to consider. The first of these was the organization of our militia, with a view to render that force an efficient auxiliary to the army. Now the militia might, no doubt, be re-organized so as to constitute a well-defined army of reserve; and this, he felt sure, had already received the attention of the Government. Next came the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member to utilize the warlike tribes of India, which up to 1857 formed a large and valuable auxiliary to our army. He believed that Sikh regiments, properly armed, and commanded by officers thoroughly acquainted with the language and customs of their men, would be second to no troops in the world, and that they might be very advantageously employed in China, New Zealand, Australia, the Mauritius, and the Cape. It had been objected that their peculiar ideas of marriage and other social institutions might lead to evil results, and this objection would be of some weight if it were intended to bring Sikh regiments to this country. He never expected, however, to see a regiment of Sikhs mounting guard at St. James', or a regiment of Beloochees defending Chester Castle, though he thought that if a number of the non-commissioned officers were brought over to study at the School of Musketry at Hythe, they would carry back such accounts of the grandeur and magnitude of England as would have a very beneficial effect on their regiments. This course had been adopted with regard to West India regiments, and he had never heard of any bad results from it. He would briefly enumerate some of the advantages which would accrue from the employment of Native troops for general service. It would enable us to relieve our home regiments in some of the most unhealthy stations in the world, where British regiments were too often decimated by the climate. It would also give English troops a longer period of home service. Previous to the Crimean war our regiments had six or seven years of home service. That would go a long way towards solving the difficulty of obtaining recruits for the army. If, unfortunately, the Natives of India should again be found in arms against the Sovereign, a larger number of European troops would be available to send to that country. If, on the other hand, a European war should break out, we should have an army of reserve that might be increased to any extent, and composed of soldiers second to none in the world. There might be many difficulties in the way, and they could only be surmounted by carefully investigating the subject. He should be very glad if the hon. and gallant Gentleman could obtain the Committee. He felt that if the Government would at once take some steps in this direction to place the defences of the country in a good position, and to adopt the best precautions to avert disaster, we should, at a moment of danger, difficulty, and extremity, meet that danger without fear and with success, and above all, the British army would be found in a position to maintain the ancient honour and glory of the country.

Major Dickson

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON said, he wished to offer a few practical remarks on the subject before the House. During the Affghan war, he had abundant opportunities of witnessing the conduct and capabilities of the Native troops when out of their own country. The result was to show that the Natives of India, under the privations of a severe climate, became almost disorganized. He did not wish to derogate in any way from their military qualities; but if they were employed in many of the countries that had been mentioned, he felt convinced they would disappoint the expectations that had been formed of them. In some of our colonies, where the climate was similar to that of India—such as the Mauritius and China—they might prove very valuable troops as auxiliaries. But he should be sorry to garrison New Zealand, for instance, with Native troops from India; because he believed that the Maories were hardly inferior to Europeans as fighting men, and it would not be fair to rest the defence of the colony exclusively upon Native Indian troops. He did not believe either that the Natives of India would stand the climate of the Cape or Australia. It was also to be remembered that the Natives of India had a great objection to leaving their own country. They were understood to be enlisted for local service, and it was impossible to send them out of India except as volunteers. No doubt their military spirit had induced them to volunteer to serve in the war in China; but he doubted whether they would be so ready to serve as garrison troops in foreign stations. It might be possible to alter the terms of enlistment so as to make them available for service abroad, but this could not be carried to a very great extent among the ordinary material of the Indian army, however it might succeed among the Sikhs. There were, however, certain evils and dangers in the constitution of a large Sikh army that should not be overlooked. The Indian Mutiny had been attributed to a want of discipline inherent in Native forces; but he could not agree with those who asserted that the system of ruling India by a Native army had thus been tried, and had broken down. It was the injudicious and vicious organization of that army that had broken down. The proof was that in hardly any case did a regiment revolt which was judiciously organized. The mutiny was, in a great degree, the result of a mistaken feeling of military pride in the Bengal officers, who wished to have their regiments composed exclusively of fine tall high-caste men. The Bengal army was very much composed of fine high-caste men, the Natives of Oude and the North Western Provinces, and thus a spirit of independence was generated which defied control. In those Bombay and Madras regiments which were composed of different classes, hardly a single instance of military revolt had occurred. He believed that if the Bengal army had been similarly organized, they would never have had an Indian mutiny; and he still looked forward to the time when the amalgamation and equipoise of various races in the Indian army would render it perfectly amenable to the control of European officers, and when we should, in a great measure, be relieved from that drain on our English military resources which our tenure of India at present imposed upon us. But he should deprecate the creation of a very large Sikh army for the same reasons which led him to deprecate the restoration of the Bengal army on its former footing. The agglomeration of members of the same race and creed in an Eastern army was apt to engender among them a feeling of independence and insubordination; and it thus became to the ruling power an inevitable element of danger. It must also be borne in mind that if Native regiments were taken away from India to garrison our colonies, the place of these Native troops must be supplied by others. The Native army of India was no larger at present than was necessary. Any loss must, therefore, be compensated by fresh levies, and no diminution could be made in the corresponding number of European troops. They might, however, look forward, perhaps, to the time when, under a more judicious organization of the Native army, and by the increased facility of transport, owing to the numerous railways that would intersect India in all directions, it might be possible very much to diminish the great drain upon our resources arising from having to maintain nearly 70,000 Europeans as a permanent garrison in that country.

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the appointment of the Committee for which my hon. and gallant Friend moved in a speech of very great ability, and marked by a degree of professional knowledge which must, of course, give great weight to his opinion. If this were a mere military question, I should very much doubt the propriety of referring it to a Select Committee of the House of Commons. I agree with those who think that a Committee of this House is not the best tribunal for arriving at a sound conclusion upon purely military subjects. But there are sanitary questions and also questions of expense connected with this subject, which make it perfectly right that the House, if it thinks proper, should appoint a Committee to inquire into it. It will be very easy for a Committee to ascertain what are the present duties—the matter included in the first part of his Motion—of the British army. But when they come to decide upon which, and what proportion, of those duties can be done by other troops, I think they will find that they have a much more difficult task before them. I beg to warn my hon. and gallant Friend that he must not confine himself merely to military witnesses. I venture to say that he might obtain any number of military witnesses, who would give very different opinions as to the propriety of employing Native troops instead of British. I think what we have heard from the hon. Member who has just sat down was very different from what we heard from those who preceded him. My hon. and gallant Friend must be perfectly aware that no Report of a Committee of the House of Commons would relieve either the Governor General or the Government of India from the responsibility of calling upon the House to supply the number of British troops which they thought necessary for the safety of that country. The best security we can have that they will not call for more British troops than they deem absolutely indispensable is the circumstance of the great drain it occasions upon the finances of India. At the present moment the force of British troops in that country is reduced below what many of the highest authorities—Lord Clyde, Lord Strathnairn, Sir William Napier, Sir Hope Grant, and others—have thought necessary. My hon. and gallant Friend must recollect, when he goes into the Committee on this question, that the wishes and views of the Governors and the inhabitants of the various colonies to which he proposes to send Indian instead of British troops, must be consulted. We are now throwing on the colonies, as far as we can, the expense of maintaining the troops they have; and if they are to pay they will hardly be satisfied if you merely send them a Native regiment. I could read to you reports from several Colonial Governors in which they positively refuse to have only Native troops. Within the last few months it was proposed to move the British troops stationed at Demerara on account of the sickness there, and the colonial authorities and the colonists declared that if you took away the British troops they would rather you would withdraw the black troops also. I do not gather, either from my hon. and gallant Friend who brought forward this Motion, or from the hon. Gentleman who spoke with so much ability in seconding it, whether they propose that these Native troops should be in addition to or in substitution of European and British troops—whether they propose to raise the force of Native and reduce a certain number of British regiments, or whether they are to be an addition to our establishment. The adoption of the one plan rather than the other would make a most material difference as to the expense to be entailed on the country. The hon. Member who spoke last told us that out of all the colonies we have there are only two, Mauritius and China, for which Native Indian troops would be suitable. With regard to my experience as to the case of four companies of a Ceylon regiment sent to China, I may say that the sickness among the Native troops there at the present moment is quite as great, if not greater, than among the European troops. The subject is one which may fairly be inquired into by the Committee; but I should much object to Indian troops doing duty in place of British at Gibraltar, Malta, New Zealand, Australia, or similar healthful colonies. If you take the whole of the forty-two English regiments now in the colonies, the number for which you could properly substitute Native and Indian troops, are nine regiments only. The plan, therefore, of my hon. and gallant Friend (Major Anson) would have very little effect in reducing the requirements made upon the British army generally. There is the greatest possible advantage in having British troops in our colonies. Those colonies are so echeloned, so placed towards one another, that by having British troops the greatest confidence is given to them. I will not say that India, during the mutiny was absolutely saved by the British troops that were sent thither from the Cape, from China, and Ceylon; but without any communication with this country those troops were at once despatched from the colonies to India; and if they had been garrisoned by Indian troops, what might have been the state of things then? We are, as I before said, throwing on the colonies the expense of their garrisons; but if you, for your own Imperial purposes, were to send them Indian, in lieu of British troops, the colonists would naturally object to pay. At this moment we have taken away one regiment from the Cape, and given notice to the authorities there that gradually they must expect that England will only supply them with one regiment, and that everything they require beyond that must be paid for by the colony. They would naturally object to being supplied with Native troops. Again, we are now taking troops over for the first time to the Straits Settlements, and they are to pay £60,000 towards the expenses of our troops in that region, but then it is a condition that they should have the wing of a European regiment. So, again, with Ceylon, Australia, and New Zealand, which pay so much per head for the British troops they have. If you were going to have a large standing army in this country I could imagine that it might be very useful indeed to have such a system as that suggested by my hon. and gallant Friend; but of this I am perfectly certain, that this country will never agree to have a very large standing army of British troops, except in time of war. I believe that as we throw these expenses on the colonies they will naturally seek to reduce, as much as they can, the number of regiments they require. I will not anticipate what I have to say to the House with regard to the formation of an army of reserve, or as to the mode by which it is proposed that we should keep up the recruiting of the army. But I have no hesitation in saying that, with our large and increasing population, we ought to have no difficulty in getting the number of men necessary to maintain the army at the point which is required. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion referred to the regiment which we are about to raise for service in Hong Kong. We are doing exactly in that case what he wishes; that is to say, we are about to supplement with Native troops where the climate is unhealthy for British troops. We have applied to the Secretary of State for India to advise upon to the best method of arranging as to this regiment. But I should myself prefer the proposal of the hon. Member who seconded the Motion, and I think if we are to have Native troops raised for general service that it would be much better that we should raise them for ourselves, perfectly independent of any engagement with the Indian Government. Supposing you greatly increase the number of Native troops as a supplement to the British army, the question arises as to how you are to officer these troops. It would be necessary that their officers should have a certain knowledge of their language, and should be able to command the respect of their men. The hon. Gentleman opposite said I objected on constitutional grounds to the employment of the Native troops during the Chinese war.

MR. O'REILLY: I only said I understood the right hon. and gallant Gentleman to object to their continuance in China.

GENERAL PEELE: My objection to their continuance there certainly was a constitutional one. That is one of the objections which I think would apply to the employment of a great number of Native troops. There were at one time no fewer than 12,000 to 16,000 Indian troops employed in China that were never voted by Parliament; and they might have been 20,000 or 30,000, as far as Parliament was concerned. To that I certainly object, for I contend that the number of Indian troops so employed should be set down in the Estimates. But I must again come back to the question whether the proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman would lead to an addition to the British army, or whether he desires that it should be reduced, substituting Natives. That, I think, is the main point to be decided. So long as we can raise the troops ourselves—and we shall, I hope, have no difficulty in doing so—it is in my opinion better that we should adhere to the present system, because the Native regiments—and I have no wish to decry them—everybody will admit must be inferior to our own. With regard to India, my noble Friend (Viscount Cranbourne) will be better able to speak as to what would be the effect of reducing the British army there. It is not my intention to oppose the appointment of a Committee; but unless the hon. and gallant Gentleman confines the inquiry to some particular and definite object, I do not see what good can result from their labours. He may very easily find out what the nature of the employment of British troops is abroad; but he will have great difficulty in ascertaining exactly the extent to which Native regiments can be employed as he suggests.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he congratulated the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had brought forward the Motion on the success he had met with. No one need be surprised at the introduction of such a matter after the experience of the past. The House would remember that it was only in the last Session of Parliament that a Committee was appointed to inquire into the mortality which had taken place among our troops in China. That mortality had resulted in the decimation of almost two European regiments at Hong Kong and elsewhere, and the evidence taken before the Committee went to prove, beyond a doubt, that the European soldier was not fitted for the climate. The point was accordingly raised, as a matter of course, for consideration whether we could not substitute Native troops for the British soldiers in such countries. His hon. and gallant Friend had had great military experience in India, and he had turned his attention to the subject whether it would not prove advantageous to employ Asiatic troops in certain of our Eastern dependencies. The right hon. and gallant Member the Secretary of State for War (General Peel) said, that we had no more troops in India at the present moment than were absolutely required. He (Captain Vivian) did not mean to dispute that; but he wished to call the attention of the House to the fact that at this moment we had 30,000 more troops in India than we had during the Indian Mutiny. At the time of the outbreak there was a large Sepoy army drilled and organized by us which no longer existed. There was not now a single gun belonging to the army, and he did not believe that if the Sepoys were inclined to revolt to-morrow they would be able to collect a force of 10,000 men. What, then, was our large force in India required for? It was partly in order to enable us to keep under our control the Sikhs, who were the most warlike of all Asiatic troops. These Sikhs were soldiers that had fought against us and proved their valour on many a hard-fought field—men who were almost born soldiers, and who were admitted by all who knew anything of them to be about the most warlike nation in the world. On the other hand, no one disputed that when these Sikhs were taken away from their own country and their own traditions, and water put between them and their native land, they were as faithful and good troops as could be employed. He would, with the permission of the House, read an extract from a letter he had received from Sir Charles Wyndham—an officer of experience in India. In that communication Sir Charles said—

“With regard to the Sikh nation, from my knowledge, I am certain you might rely upon their courage and fidelity when employed at a large distance from their own country.”

Now, the question which his hon. and gallant Friend proposed for the consideration of the Committee was simply to inquire whether we might not with advantage employ those troops, instead of Europeans, in certain military dependencies. The right hon. and gallant Member the Secretary of State for War asked whether it was meant to substitute the Natives for European troops. The answer to that would be that if in certain colonies or dependencies we could with safety substitute Native for British troops it would be our duty to do so, even though it should be one regiment only. In this country we were paying more than any other nation in the world for our army. We were paying something like £14,000,000 a year, and yet we had less to show for the money than any other nation. It was therefore one of our first duties to reduce, when we could do so with safety, the number of our troops. If we were to have an European crisis to-morrow, what force could we bring into the field to defend ourselves at home in exchange for our £14,000,000 a year? The fact would not be disputed that we could only bring something like 50,000 into the field for European purposes, for we had in India, and on the high seas, something like 80,000. If therefore it could be proved that for the protection of India or our colonies we were able to substitute a force for the British which would equally serve the purpose, and by that means be enabled to reduce our own army, we should at once do so. The first duty of the Executive was to reduce our army as much as possible. He held that it was absurd to talk about a reserve force if we were not to reduce our standing army. The hon. Baronet the Member for Frome (Sir Henry Rawlinson) said, among other things, that his experience of the Affghan war proved the Native troops under severe trials became disorganized. That also was a question for the consideration of the

Captain Vivian

Committee. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet that if it was the nature of the Native troops to become disorganized under severe trials they should only be employed in climates which agreed with them, and where there would be no danger of disorganization from such a cause. China was one of these, and therefore it was open for consideration whether they might not be employed there. The right hon. and gallant Member the Secretary of State for War said that the colonies, having to pay for the troops, would not be satisfied with Native troops, and as an illustration he instanced the case of Bermuda, where, when it was proposed to remove the English troops, the authorities asked that the blacks should also be removed. But it should be borne in mind that it was a very different thing to place negro troops over a negro population, and to send troops belonging to the Sikh nation to China. His hon. and gallant Friend had, in introducing the subject, so completely exhausted it, that he would not trouble the House with any further remarks.

MR. LAING said, that as this was a question which specially related to India, and as he must naturally take a warm interest in all that related to that country, perhaps the House would bear with him while he made a few observations on this question. He believed that the Native interests of India required the presence of a European force there. Without going into the question of the mutiny, he might state that he believed the European force in that country, in the opinion of all military men, ought not to be reduced much below 60,000 men. With the improved communications of the present day, and with a command of the railways and telegraphs, a smaller force might possibly suffice; but in so reducing the amount a certain danger would be incurred, and looking upon the question as one of insurance it would be unwise to go much below the limit he had stated. His fear was that, on an emergency, India would be denuded of her European troops to supply the colonies or the army at home. The question was not one of money, but of men; and the point for consideration was really how we could best economize men in other quarters of the globe, so as to render them available for service, either in India or at home, in case of need. He had been rather surprised at the argument of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Peel), who seemed to imply that the wishes of the colonists were to be final in this matter. The question was not one for a Governor nor yet for the people of a colony to decide; if they did not like to accept such troops as we could give them, why, let them protect themselves. European regiments might be more acceptable on account of the society which they introduced into a colony, but it would never do to leave it optional with the colonists to say, "You must keep one of your costly regiments here." He would confine himself to the case of India. Having been in India at the time the troops returned from service in China, and having had special facilities of communication with military men, he could declare that in India we possessed a reserve of naturally warlike populations, who might be drawn upon largely for reinforcements. Some of the Native regiments which had served in China distinguished themselves highly, and displayed qualities rendering them fully equal to any auxiliary forces which served with the great armies of Europe—to the Cossacks, for instance, in the Russian levies, and the Turcos and other Native African troops, enlisted pretty largely in the service of the French Empire. He agreed with what had been said as to the military qualities of the Sikhs. It would be a dangerous mistake, however, to look to the Sikhs alone for our levies—so martial a race might be tempted to take advantage of their position. They might be tempted to say to the Europeans, "We are almost as good as you are, and we are numerically stronger, and we shall therefore take advantage of the situation." This argument, however, would not apply to Sikh regiments scattered in garrisons over distant colonies. But besides the Sikhs, there were the Ghoorkas, the Belooches, and the Pathans, descendants of the Native Affghans, as white in colour as the men of Southern Europe, being derived from mountainous races. The high authority (Sir Henry Rawlinson) who had spoken that evening of Native troops in Affghanistan being disorganized by the severity of the climate, must have had in his mind the army of Bengal, the old Brahmin Sepoys of the plains of Oude, of whom the army was at that time composed, who, coming from a tropical climate, were ill-fitted for exposure to a severe climate. But during the Chinese campaigns some Native regiments from the mountainous races, who were exposed in their native hills to every degree of cold, remained behind at Tien-

tsin, and were exposed during the winter to a degree of cold greater than any which troops would suffer in garrisoning any town in England. Making a proper selection of regiments, so far as such climates as China, up to Shanghai, or the Strait settlements, even the northern parts of Australia, or the settlements towards Torres Straits, or, nearer home, such as those of Malta or even Gibraltar were concerned, he was satisfied that there was nothing to prevent the employment in those places of such troops as might be raised in India. With regard to the indisposition of the Natives to serve across the sea, this might be true of the high class Sepoys of whom the Bengal army was formerly composed; but there was a considerable number of Natives who had no objection whatever to cross the sea, as was instanced in the case of the Madras army, regiments of which had been in the habit of crossing the sea to the Burmese coast and to Singapore. With regard to the Sikhs who had served in China, they were delighted with what they had seen of the British troops during that campaign, and having had a good opportunity of contrasting the French and British armies, they were so strongly impressed with the superiority of the latter that they evinced the most ardent desire to go and serve under the British flag in any quarter of the world to which they might be sent. In fact, a native officer, the second in command of one of the Sikh regiments, had asked him (Mr. Laing) whether Paris would not be a splendid city for loot, and whether it was not true that the Cossacks had once been there. There was an evident desire on the part of that officer to serve under the British flag in an European war, so that he might have a chance of marching into and assisting in the loot of one of the great capitals. He concurred in the remarks of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Major Anson) as to the desirability of sending a Native regiment upon foreign service instead of breaking it up; and he believed that, just before the Indian mutiny, if one of the regiments in which disaffection first showed itself had been sent to a foreign station the Mutiny might have been averted. What was now proposed had, in fact, been carried out to a considerable extent already. Aden, a fortress almost equal in importance to Gibraltar, one of the great stages on the high road between England and India, was garrisoned mainly by Native troops, with some European artillery. Yet the station slept in perfect tranquillity under its guards, and in matters of police there was less difficulty with a Native than with a European regiment. The same might be said of Singapore, of Rangoon, and of places along the Burmese coast. So far from mutinying, isolated Native regiments on foreign stations had little disposition to show such a temper, for they knew themselves to be in the power of England, and their only chance of getting home again lay in the ships which she provided. The presence of a few European artillery usually sufficed to keep them steady to their allegiance, and our European contingent might be described as the backbone of our colonial forces. The real difficulty, as pointed out by the Secretary for War, consisted in officering these regiments, for, however efficient the Native regiments might be for service in India or abroad, their efficiency entirely depended on the class of officers in command of them. The ordinary run of officers could not be taken, as in the case of European regiments, for then there would be the risk of appointing officers ignorant of the language and habits of the men over whom they were placed. There must be European officers especially trained for the purpose, and acquainted with the manners and prejudices of the men, or otherwise the officers might provoke a mutiny by some apparently trivial act, which a student fresh from Sandhurst could see no harm in. Under the measure for the amalgamation of the Indian army, the means of supplying this class of officers had been got rid of to a very great extent, though at present things went on very well, because there was a reserve of officers left by the old system. There were 4,000 of them that had been so available. But how were they to get on for the future. The great difficulty of employing Native regiments abroad was that the Indian officers of the old army could not be asked to accompany them to the Mauritius or to Malta, for a lower scale of pay than they received for Indian service; and, if the Indian scale were granted to them, what must be the feelings of the other European officers serving alongside of them? That was the great difficulty, for otherwise, by the employment of Indian troops, great relief might be given to the European forces scattered over the colonies, the necessity of sending so many British troops abroad would be diminished, and increased security for India would be acquired by having a larger available British force to draw upon. The difficulty he had just adverted to not only applied to Indian regiments sent abroad, but still more strongly to those which remained in India. The question was how to supply a class of officers having qualities like those possessed by the officers of the old Indian army. The measure adopted some years ago for breaking up the staff of the Indian army, and doing away with the local European force and the separate establishment of Addiscombe for the training of European officers, was a mistake, and if that had to be done again, no one with the experience since acquired would advocate such a measure. The forces might have been so united as to be under one Commander-in-Chief. Both might have been held to be under one Commander-in-Chief; but a separate force of 30,000 or 40,000 men, with their officers, might have been kept for the separate service of India. However, when a step such as that was taken, it was difficult to retrace it; but he invited the right hon. Secretary for War to consider the question, because he regarded it as the most important and the most difficult in the future of India. He thought the House ought to feel exceedingly indebted to the hon. and gallant Member (Major Anson) for the manner in which he had brought the subject under its notice.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE said, he quite concurred in thinking that the House was very much indebted to the hon. and gallant Member (Major Anson) who brought forward the Motion, and he believed that the proposed inquiry would be very valuable. He only hoped that the hon. and gallant Member would exercise some discretion as to the subjects to be investigated, for by wandering into a multiplicity of topics the whole value of a thorough investigation might be lost. He trusted that the hon. and gallant Member would not be induced to go into the question of the amalgamation of the Indian army. He quite concurred with the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) as to the difficulty which had arisen from the measure passed a few years ago, though he did not say that it was a mistake, because it would, perhaps, have been impossible to avoid greater difficulties still, if the old system had been stood by. It was right that the operation of that measure should be most carefully watched to see whether a remedy might be provided for the evils it occasioned; but he should be sorry if the value of the in-investigation now proposed were lost by mixing it up with so enormous a question. Another question which had been raised, not strictly germane to the subject, was whether the army in India was not too large. The hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) observed that the British force was increased since the mutiny to nearly double its former amount, and argued that the Native army having been reduced, so large a British force was unnecessary to watch them. It must, however, be borne in mind that before the mutiny the Native troops were drawn from the provinces of Behar and Bengal, and that now they were drawn from the hill tribes, so that if there were any element of danger in the Native Indian army, it was much intensified by the more martial character of the force. With regard to the selection of the men, there arose this difficulty—that if men of the most docile races were chosen, they were of a feeble constitution, and incapable of being removed from the climate and food to which they were accustomed; and if men of the hardier races were selected, then a class was obtained which could be moved about and made little difficulty as to food, but they were more dangerous to deal with, and the precaution which the hon. Member for Wick alluded to, of keeping European troops and artillery in the neighbourhood of any such large Native force, could not be abandoned. With regard to the objection raised against the employment of Native troops out of India, on the ground of the difficulty of inducing them to leave that country, the hon. Member for Wick thought that objection refuted by the experience of the campaign in China. Having discussed this subject with some authorities on Indian matters, he knew that the feeling which dwelt in their mind was that the Native troops could not be induced to leave India in any large number unless there were a prospect of "loot." The hon. Member for Wick was struck with the enthusiasm of a Native at the prospect of "looting" Paris. That was a picture of the minds of those men; and, no doubt, if they were told that Paris was to be "looted," an enormous number of them might be got to go there. But it would be impossible to induce them to volunteer for the dull unhealthy duty of a garrison town. But really he supposed in this, as in everything of the kind, this was very much a matter of money; the difference between the cost of an European and a Native soldier, was as between £110 and £40, and they would have to pay these troops about double if they used them for their colonial service; and in doing this they diminished the motive for adopting this principle. It was not because there was a difficulty in getting European soldiers, but because they were so costly that this proposal was made. He suggested these as points for consideration by the Committee. Very great difference of opinion, no doubt, existed upon the subject; but they had a very large amount of experience to guide them, and the subject was one eminently fitted for Parliamentary inquiry. He trusted, however, that the Committee would not be content with oral evidence alone; but that its members would listen to the suggestions of some of the higher authorities of India who could not be brought from their posts to give evidence. In that way the Committee would be able to collect very valuable information, and perhaps be the means of introducing very useful reforms into the military service of the British Crown.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought the speech of the Secretary of State for War, with which he heartily agreed, was eminently fitted to stand as an argument against the Motion for a Committee. While he did not wish to oppose the Motion, he certainly thought it would have been better if the Secretary of State had imposed some limit to the proposed inquiry. Presuming that the policy indicated by the Motion could be adopted by an English Parliament, he doubted whether the many subjects which would have to be discussed by the Committee were such as should properly be considered by them. Even the Mover and Seconder of the Motion for a Committee had said that the change, if carried out, would be extremely complicated; and that, whether it were carried out or not should depend very much upon the balance of advantages and difficulties with which the change would be accompanied. It appeared, then, to him very strange that a Committee of the House should be appointed to inquire into the advisability of a change, the principle of which had not been sanctioned by the House, and which he believed the House on further discussion would not approve. He entirely dissented from the policy which the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield (Major Anson) and his friends advocated. Not to dwell upon the minor points raised by the Secretary for War, such as the disinclination of the colonies to receive garrisons of this kind, he had heard no satisfactory answer to the query as to what it was proposed to do with the British troops now employed in colonial service. It was evident that if the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield were carried out our military establishments must either be reduced in proportion as they were added to by the enlistment of Native troops, or else the Estimates must bear the whole additional cost of the enlistment of Indian troops. It had been said by the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) that it would be the duty of any Government to propose a reduction of the army whenever a battalion could be dispensed with, and he concurred in that view; but the proposal now made was to substitute a battalion of Indian troops for a battalion of British troops. He had heard no satisfactory argument in favour of the principle of the proposal. He believed that the force scattered over the colonies was not so effective for Imperial purposes as the same number of men would be if concentrated at home; still it was not altogether useless. The proposal now made was to substitute a force which might or might not be as efficient as Europeans for colonial purposes, but who certainly could not be equally efficient in any great Imperial emergency. For these reasons he regretted that before the subject had received more complete investigation and before Parliament had expressed any opinion as to the policy of such a change, the Secretary of State should have consented to the appointment of a Committee which would waste considerable time and could lead to no practical results.

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER said, that touching this question of amalgamation, he felt it was due to the old Indian service to remind the House that it was not only in the recent services in China that these armies were usefully employed, but under Abercrombie in Egypt; and in their services in Java they distinguished themselves to the great satisfaction of those in authority. Although it was very questionable how far Native troops, under present circumstances, could be employed out of Asia, he thought to employ those troops who had shown a mutinous disposition in India to uphold the British flag in other parts would be most injurious to the discipline of the troops in India, and to the honour and welfare of this country.

MAJOR ANSON said, he thought questions connected with the withdrawal of troops, or the substitution of one kind of troops for another, should be left entirely to the Executive. He also thought the objections to his scheme were such as to show how useful the proposed inquiry would be; and he was extremely glad the Secretary of State for War had given his consent to the proposition he had made.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Select Committee appointed "To inquire into the duties performed by the British Army in India and the Colonies; and also to inquire how far it might be desirable to employ certain portions of Her Majesty's Native Indian Army in our Colonial and Military Dependencies, or to organize a force of Asiatic Troops for general service in suitable climates."

And, on March 6, Select Committee nominated as follows:—Viscount CRANBOURNE, Mr. CHILDERS, Sir JAMES FERGUSON, The Marquess of HARTINGTON, Captain HAYTER, Mr. OLIPHANT, Sir HENRY RAWLINSON, Sir WILLIAM RUSSELL, Captain VIVIAN, Viscount HAMILTON, Mr. LAING, Lord WILLIAM HAY, Colonel NORTH, and Major ANSON:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

ATTORNEYS, &c., CERTIFICATE DUTY BILL—LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. DENMAN moved for leave to bring in a Bill to reduce the annual Duty upon the Certificates of Attorneys, Solicitors, and others. He said, that having received an assurance that the Bill would not be opposed on the first reading, he would not, on that occasion, go into the reasons for a reduction of the duty. The subject had very often been before the House, and on many occasions the principle had been affirmed that this annual payment ought to be abolished. The Bill he sought to introduce did not propose to abolish the tax entirely, but to reduce it to the nominal sum of 5s. The reason for that was that there were in existence several Acts of Parliament that would have to be repealed or considerably altered, at great inconvenience, if the duty were altogether taken off; but by reducing the amount to 5s. all the existing machinery would remain, and both the public and profession would be benefited by still having a regular authentic list of attorneys, solicitors, proctors, and notaries published annually. The principle had been affirmed in 1865, and by former Parliaments, and the tax had been retained upon grounds affecting the revenue of particular years and not from any opinion that in itself it was either just or expedient.

MR. M. T. BASS said, he thought that licenses on trades and professions ought to be altogether abolished, or to be extended to all. Of all licenses, however, that on common brewers was the worst. It was a hardship to which the license of attorneys and solicitors could afford no parallel. Every brewer was required to pay a license upon the work he did, and not upon the profitable result of his operations. He (Mr. Bass) as a brewer paid as large a sum as 1,100 or 1,200 solicitors did, and he should think it very hard if solicitors were relieved of their eight guineas a year, while he had to pay so large a sum for permission to carry on his business.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Derby on the large sum which he pays for his licence, and there can be no doubt that on the same conditions we should all be perfectly willing to contribute such an amount to the national Treasury. I think that licences are a most enlightened scheme for recruiting the national Treasury, and I am not at all inclined to favour the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite. It is a very difficult thing for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to encounter attorneys and brewers. They are, without exception, the two most influential classes in the community. The late Henry Drummond, whom we all knew in this House—"alas, poor Yorick!"—speaking one night of the Powers then convulsing the world, just before the Crimean War, said, "After all, what is their power to the power of an attorney?" I feel that at the present moment. It is under these circumstances I must consent to the introduction of this Bill. It is because I wish to respect a majority, though not a great one, which sanctioned the principle upon which the Bill is founded. At the same time, I must say I disapprove of the practice of the hon. and learned Gentleman in attacking the Consolidated Fund with a perseverance which may be applauded, but which is not laudable. As to the general principle, I would oppose Motions and measures of this nature made at this moment. The right time to bring forward subjects of this nature is when the Chancellor of the Exchequer has placed before the House and the country the state of the national Finances. That is the legitimate opportunity. If there be any surplus—and I speak with all reserve on a point so problematical—that is the moment when any persons who think they have a fair claim to consideration should come forward. But that an assault on the national resources is to be made as a matter of course appears to me a supposition which ought not to be encouraged. It would be an act of discourtesy were I, under the circumstances, to oppose the introduction of the Bill; but I do not wish the hon. and learned Gentleman to suppose that, in agreeing to its introduction, I at all sanction the principle upon which he has appealed to the House to-night. He represents on the present occasion a very influential, a very affluent, and a very patriotic class; and I am sure we can always appeal to them to bear their fair proportion of the national necessities. The Bill may be introduced to-night; and when the hon. and learned Member has become better acquainted than he can be at this moment with the condition of the Treasury, he can exercise his discretion as to whether he will proceed with or withdraw it.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to reduce the annual Duty upon the Certificates of Attorneys and Solicitors and others, ordered to be brought in by Mr. DENMAN, Mr. VANCE, and Sir JOHN OGILVY.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 53.]

FACTORY ACTS (EDUCATIONAL CLAUSES).—RESOLUTION.

MR. FAWCETT moved that, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to extend the Educational Clauses of the Factory Acts to children who are employed in agriculture. He said, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would not suppose that he made this Motion in any spirit of hostility to the measure which the right hon. Gentleman had promised to introduce for the extension of the Factory Acts. On the contrary, he sincerely thanked him for that measure, and his gratitude was strengthened when he remembered the promptitude of the right hon. Gentleman in this matter. All that had read the Report of the Children's Employment Commission must feel that it contained fearful disclosures. It proved that thousands of lives were yearly sacrificed, and that thousands more of young people were ruined in body and soul by premature employment. He wished, however, to impress upon the House that if the right hon. Gentleman confined his measure to those trades only which had been reported upon by the Commissioners, he would but touch the fringe of a great question, and leave unsettled a problem in the solution of which the most vital interests of the country were involved. When the Factory Acts were introduced they were met by two kinds of arguments. It was urged, first, that such an interference with particular trades would materially jeopardise their prosperity, and would too much encroach on individual liberty; and secondly, that such special and exceptional legislation was unjust because it was exceptional. Now, the first of these objections had been refuted and silenced by experience. The Factories Act was first applied to the textile manufactures of the country, and that branch had ever since continued in a progressive state of prosperity; and those who most stoutly opposed this legislation were now ready to admit that it had worked with marked success. They were now, likewise, quite ready to admit the advantage they had derived from having a class of operatives who, from being taken care of in youth, had grown up sound in body and mind. Again, the argument with regard to the interference with individual liberty had also been silenced by experience. He was as much opposed as any man to all unnecessary interference on the part of the Government. Perhaps there was, at the present day, a tendency to ask the Government to interfere too much with private individuals; and, as a Radical, he thought that that was a tendency which, in a reformed House of Commons, must be carefully and constantly watched. He had learned his love for individual freedom from his hon. Friend the Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), who had made the most philosophic and eloquent defence which had ever been written of personal liberty; but he felt sure his hon. Friend would agree with him that the State was performing one of its clearest and most undoubted duties when it rescued

a child from a grievous and irreparable injury. A child was not a free agent; he had no power to defend himself, and no one could over-estimate the injury that was done him if his education was neglected through the avarice or the ignorance of his parents. As for the second argument against the Factory Acts, he (Mr. Fawcett) did not see how it was to be answered; on the contrary, the more those Acts were extended the more unjust they became, unless they were made general. Owing to the zeal of the right hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Bruce), the Acts were applied to the pottery district, and with the most beneficial results. While admitting this, however, the masters said it was unjust to legislate for them and not to legislate generally. They said they were placed under special disadvantages. They said agriculture was not under the same restrictions, and that the result was that boys would not come to their half-time factory work while they could get full employment in agriculture. They did not get their fair share of the juvenile labour of the district. If the Government had not the courage to introduce a general measure, based on the principle that no child under thirteen should be permitted to work unless he spent a certain number of hours per week at school, he (Mr. Fawcett) wished to point out the pressing need there was for applying, without delay, the half-time system to agriculture. The agricultural population was deplorably ignorant; and he feared that there were circumstances which put a meretricious and deceptive gloss upon the education of the rural population. We had Government grants; we had great zeal on the part of ministers of religion; we had admirable schools, and in many cases ample funds; but these were not sufficient. If a child was taken away from school at eight or nine years of age, all he had learned would be useless. He knew villages in the West of England where there was plenty of money for educational purposes, but where there were excellent schools, where there was scarcely a youth who could read sufficiently well to understand a newspaper. If a child was taken away from school at eight or nine years of age, he was certain to forget the little he had learned, and he would grow up in a state of ignorance, for it was found that the rudiments of learning were rarely acquired in after life. It was said that there were practical difficulties in the way of applying the half-time system to agriculture. There might be such, but he feared that those difficulties were readily, perhaps joyfully, seized upon as an excuse. At a recent meeting at Wolverhampton, the Earl of Lichfield, who knew something about agriculture, had made a most admirable speech in favour of applying the half-time system to the rural districts of the country. No doubt many hon. Members would recollect Mr. Paget the late representative of Nottingham. He was a well-known agriculturist, and he had for many years adopted the half-time system on his farm with signal success. His experience was that the boys took greater pleasure in their school, and did their work better—emphatically better—for their change of occupation. However, he (Mr. Fawcett) would examine some of these “practical difficulties.” It was said that the Factories Acts had been successfully applied to those branches of industry where labour was concentrated, and the children worked half-time and went to school the other half; but that in agricultural districts the work was often two or three miles on one side of the labourer’s dwelling while the school was a like distance on the other, and that, therefore, half-time was impossible. This must be overcome by adopting the alternate day system, school one day and work the next, and if this would not do, there was the alternate week system. But if this half-time system was general, we should diminish the supply of juvenile labour, and increase its efficiency, and by so doing increase the value of the children’s labour, and consequently increase their remuneration. Then it was said there were some labourers in the worst paid districts who were in such a state of wretched poverty that they could not live without the children’s earnings. It might be said that to take away 1s. or 2s. a week from a Dorchester labourer, who was dragging out a miserable existence, would be to starve him. But why were the wages in Dorsetshire and Wiltshire exceptionally low? Why did the labourers continue in a state of the greatest hardship when for the same kind of labour they could obtain higher wages elsewhere? How was it that competition did not equalize wages in different parts of the country? The reason was that labourers were ignorant, and as isolated from the rest of England as if they lived in a distant country. Their wages were not affected by the labour market of the country. The wages were always at the minimum. They were not determined by competition with the rest of the country, and the problem was, how much could a man and his family just live upon? In this the earnings of the boy were not left out of the calculation. If, then, that labourer was deprived of his boy’s earnings, the wages of the man must be raised to enable him to live. He would not suffer, he could not suffer, for it was impossible for him to be in a worse position. It might be said, “You admit that the result of your legislation would be to increase the price of juvenile labour, and in some cases to increase the general price of labour, and therefore to cast a burden either upon the landlord or the farmer.” Even if that were so, he did not think the House would hesitate; but on the strictest principles of political economy it would be admitted that whatever increased the efficiency of labour increased its productiveness, and thus augmented the fund divisible as landlord’s rent, farmers’ profit, and labourers’ wages. One word to the agricultural interest. Agriculture was daily becoming more and more a skilled industry, more complicated machinery was used in it, and greater intelligence was required for its management. Let them remember that the cutting machines must not be intrusted to ignorant workmen. They had heard much of the danger of foreign competition; but that danger would be fully met by improving the education of the people of this country. Timid people expressed their alarm about strikes; but if they wanted men to understand the true principles of economy, they must educate them in their youth. They stood aghast at trades unions, and were shocked at the outrages in Sheffield; but if they had read the horrors which were published respecting the children of that town, they would not be surprised at outrages being committed by grown men. The Children’s Employment Commission disclosed horrors with regard to the town that made it matter of surprise that outrages were not more frequent. Sometimes it was said, “Compel landlords to improve cottages;” but educate the people and raise their tastes, and they would not live in miserable two-roomed hovels. The philanthropy of a nation was sometimes appealed to on behalf of a wretched peasant who was starving with his family on 8s. a week; but he would not do so if he could read the papers and learn of the demand for labour in other parts of the country. How much wiser would it be boldly to strike at that ignorance which was the root of pauperism and crime than to struggle under the burden of these evils! It was chiefly by the Conservative party that the first Factory Act was carried; their policy in this respect had conferred inestimable blessings on the nation. Let them continue the good work and prove their sincerity to the nation by conferring the same blessings upon the industry with which they were more intimately connected. Personally, he was pledged to do what he could to improve the condition of the agricultural poor, among whom he had lived all his life. He was confident if they could do anything to promote their education, they would be assisting effectually to lighten the burden of poverty which oppressed them, and to make their condition more worthy of that nation, to the wealth and greatness of which their class had contributed so much, and from whose advancing civilization and increasing prosperity they had derived so slender a share of augmented happiness.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to extend the Educational Clauses of the Factory Acts to children who are employed in agriculture."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. AKROYD said, that his experience might possibly have some weight with those who had not had the same opportunities of witnessing the beneficial results of factory legislation. The first step towards national education was taken thirty years ago, when the Factory Bill was opposed by the millowners, with certain exceptions. He joined in opposition, not from any unwillingness to shorten the hours of labour, but from a conviction that legislation for a particular class of employers was one-sided and unjust. He maintained at that time that the condition of the factory districts was not worse than that of others, and the recent Reports of the Children's Employment Commission had proved the truth of what he then said. That Commission had occasioned the extension of the Factory Acts to trades not originally embraced. Having at first opposed the Act, he wished now joyfully to offer his testimony to its beneficial results. In his own neighbourhood a squalid population had been succeeded by a healthy one. The operation of the Act had changed the aspect of many a once wretched district, and brought upon the scene scores of happy chubby-faced children, full of health and activity, who, but for the interference of the Legislature, would have been wearing away their young lives with premature toil. Hitherto the whole course of legislation had been tentative and experimental. If the Government of the day had attempted to deal with the question as a whole, and to apply legislation to many trades, the task would have been too great for them, opposed as they would have been by several united interests. The extension of the Factory Acts to mines and collieries, bleaching works, the lace works of Nottingham, and the potteries of Staffordshire, aided the work of education and brought a large number of the trades of the country under its operation. These successive steps had tended to diminish opposition to this mode of education, and had secured a greater number of witnesses to its beneficial results. We seemed to have arrived at the half-way house of national education, and if the measure of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) received the assent of the agricultural Gentlemen we should have solved the problem of national education, and little more would remain to be done. What objections could be raised by the country Gentlemen? He was bound to admit the benefits they conferred on the manufacturing interest by determinedly pressing the Act upon them. Happily, times were now changed; classes were not so banded one against another as they had been; and there seemed to be no reason why they should not together carry a national system of education. Was there anything in the condition of children employed in agriculture which forbade the application of this Act to them? From his own observation he would say that there were many reasons why this Act was more imperatively called for in agricultural than in manufacturing districts. The children of farm labourers were taken from school early, left the parental roof, and were hired by farmers from year to year. He could confirm what had been said by the hon. Member for Brighton as to the ignorance of children in agricultural populations compared with that of children in manufacturing populations. Farming, however, was now a very different thing from what it had been; clodhoppers could not be trusted to deal with costly instruments, and farmers must of necessity have skilled labour. On these and other grounds a good case was made out for the extension of the Factory Act to the children employed in agriculture. Those who feared an interference with their liberty would, like himself, in a few years bear testimony to the good fruits of this paternal Act.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that the country Gentlemen did not fear the extension of education among their labourers. No class of men had endeavoured to do so much towards establishing schools and encouraging education as the country Gentlemen. Speaking for the county of Wilts, at all events for the northern portion of it, in which he had lived all his life, he could say that in no part of it had the education of the agricultural population been neglected; on the contrary, it had been provided for in the most ample manner. There was hardly a village or hamlet in which schools had not been started, or some attempt made in the kindest and most liberal manner to educate the labouring population. The great difficulty that was experienced was in getting the children to school. In some cases, no doubt, the parents were desirous of adding to the comforts of their families by the earnings of their children; but in most instances the children stopped away because they preferred to go bird-nesting, or rabbiting, or something of that sort, and the country Gentlemen had even offered premiums for getting them to school. It was a trying time for a child to be taken from school at eleven. He believed it was Dr. Johnson who said that no one learnt anything which he retained in later life before twelve. What he wished to point out in the first place was that there was no objection on the part of the landed interests to have the children well educated. But the mere fact of preventing farmers from retaining the labour of those children for more than half-a-day or half-a-week would not meet the evil; there must be some compulsory power, as in Prussia and other parts of Germany, to keep the children at school, or all other efforts would be vain. The extension of the Factory Acts to the agricultural population would not give the results they desired. A word with regard to payment for labour. In the northern portion of Wilts they had a large railway, they had quarries and factories; labour there was in great demand, and men were employed at very high rates. What was the practical result? Labourers, after having been employed on the railway, in the quarries or factories, at high wages, come back to the farmers and said that they preferred agricultural work, even though with lower wages. Agricultural labour did not expend such an extraordinary amount of strength as was required in other employments. It was not from ignorance, therefore, but from choice that these men, having tried other occupations, went back to farm labour. In the northern portion of Wilts agricultural labourers were, he believed, as happy, as well educated, and as well disposed as in any other part of England, and both landed gentry and farmers were ready to do everything in their power for the purpose of encouraging education.

MR. TREVELYAN said, that the hon. Gentleman had spoken of the wish of country Gentlemen to encourage education among the children of the labouring classes, and that they had proved the sincerity of their desire for the promotion of education by aiding the passing of the Factory Act. All that was now wished was that they would aid in extending that Act to the children of peasants. It might be true that the higher branches of learning could not be properly comprehended by children under ten years of age; but experience had proved that they could be taught to read, to write, and to cast up a column of pounds, shillings, and pence under that age, besides possessing some elementary knowledge of the scriptures, and being able to comprehend a simple Saxon sermon. All that was desired was to keep the children at school till they were ten years of age, and he was sure that all friends of education must have experienced much gratification at seeing the Notice of his hon. Friend on the Paper, and especially those who believe that by bold and judicious legislation they might do something to remove from the land that gross ignorance which was its especial shame. It was neither their hope nor wish that, during the present Session, the attention of the House should be called in an extended and general manner to the question of popular education, which could not be done until the great question of Reform was settled. Ardent as he was in the cause of Reform, he did not believe that the question, a branch of which was before the House, was of inferior importance; and although no radical change could be expected at present, he hoped that the subject would not be allowed entirely to sleep, but that even during the intervals between the conflict of parties the trumpet of the friends of education would give forth an occasional warning note. As soon as Reform was settled, the friends of education must make a combined effort for a radical and sweeping change of the present system. When the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) brought on his Bill for the improvement of the Factory Acts, they would hear a good deal about the Manchester and Salford Education Society. That Society divided Manchester and Salford into 144 squares, and made a diligent house canvass, and the result of their inquiries might be summed up in this—that half the children between the ages of three and ten were running about the streets, no more educated than Kaffirs. The same was the result of a similar inquiry in Liverpool. If that was the state of great and flourishing districts, what must be the state of the rural districts, in which, in spite of the efforts of Gentlemen like the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), many resided who were more chary of their time and money. The last Report of the Committee of Council on Education also disclosed some startling facts, amongst which was the circumstance that in one agricultural district the clergyman of the parish was so well satisfied with the attendance of 4 per cent of the children at his schools that he closed its doors against the Inspector; while, in another case, the squire of the parish locked up the school, and sent the key to the vicarage, with a message to the effect that he could do what he liked with his own. In another instance the Committee reported that a wealthy landowner had discovered a very simple way of cutting the Gordian knot, by taking the floor out of half a small cottage, whitewashing the apartment, and transforming it into a school, while he put an old woman to live in the other part, who, at a very trifling expense, afforded the children quite as much education as this enlightened landowner thought they ought to have. The result of our system of education must be judged by statistics. In 1859 an examination was held in the army by direction of the military authorities, and they discovered that out of 10,000 men taken at random, 2,675 were unable to write, though they could read imperfectly, and 2,080 could neither read nor write. The state of education in this respect contrasted

most unfavourably with that of Prussia, in which country the military found that out of 100 recruits only two were unable to read or write. In the same year 15,000 men were discharged, 6,000 of whom signed their marks. The Recruiting Commission, two or three years after that, reported that, in a single month, out of 4,500 recruits, something under 3,000 were taken from the rural districts, and something under 2,500 were taken from the towns: which proves incontestably that we must look for the cause of the ignorance among the class from whom our recruits are drawn, at least as much in the country as in the towns. It evidently showed that the parents of these poor children eked out their means by withdrawing them from school at a very early age, and putting them to work. The only hope they had of effectually educating poor children was through the means of an educational rate, because it was useless to compel them to attend schools unless proper schools were provided for them. Private benevolence had done its utmost, and they must now have recourse to an educational assessment. In very poor districts the clergyman was deprived of comforts in order to contribute to the wants of the school, whilst the resident landowner only subscribed his £5. It was to the clergyman that they were indebted for the education which the country possessed; and under the circumstances, although it was against his political convictions, he could not, if the burden was not removed from their shoulders to the rate book, insist on their subscribing to the Conscience Clause. In one of the midland districts, consisting of 168 parishes, 169 clergymen subscribed £10 each. In the same district there were 400 landowners, whose united incomes amounted to £650,000, yet they subscribed only £2,000, or £5 each. Although very often a squire would support a school near his own park gates, he would give nothing towards the schools of neighbouring parishes from which he derived his rents. That state of things should be got rid of, and the people be compelled to send their children to school, the expense of which should be defrayed by a rate. Experience in Canada and Australia proved that when the people had paid their money in the shape of rates they were almost certain to avail themselves of the advantages offered by the Constitution, on the principle of getting as much as they could for their money, and the same, he believed, would be the case in this country. The Returns of crime and pauperism clearly showed that our present system of education was unable to cope with the evils which were growing rapidly around our gigantic and complicated system. If they looked to England, in comparison with Germany, they must blush for their own country. We, who had abundance of money, and possessed the spirit of local self-government, advantages which foreign nations lacked, ought to be able to keep up with them in the race. He hoped that in the next or following Session, or at the first opportunity after the flood of Reform had subsided, the advocates of a comprehensive scheme of national education would unite in passing a measure which would show that our ancient and time-honoured institutions were compatible, equally with those of Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and America, with the universal diffusion of morality and religion.

Mr. READ said, that the farmers of England would endorse the principle laid down by the hon. Member for Brighton, but would question his conclusions and deny some of his facts. It was an exaggeration to say that many children under nine years of age were often employed in agricultural pursuits. Generally, they would be no sort of use. It was only exceptionally that they were engaged in birdkeeping, hop-picking, and minor operations in the harvest field, and then it was generally at a time when the schoolmaster was taking his holiday. In factory work seasons, weather, and daylight were of little consequence, whereas on the farm everything depended upon them. Moreover, a child taken out of a factory had to go but a very short distance to school; whereas in the rural districts a child on an average would be obliged to walk considerably more than a mile. It was impossible, therefore, to give half a day to school and the other half to work on the farm, and the best plan seemed to be to devote half the week to the former and half to the latter. Great benefit had accrued to the rural districts from night-schools, not merely in keeping up the slight elementary education which farm boys received, but in preserving them from bad company, and employing their winter evenings. Too often, however, few persons besides the clergyman and a few irregular volunteers took an interest in them. He thought the Government would do well to grant a little pecuniary assistance to the best of these schools.

SIR FRANCIS CROSSLEY said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Akroyd), in what he stated with respect to the short time system in factories. At one time the manufacturers hardly knew how to obtain sufficient labour to fill the factories on the whole time system, and when the half-time system came into operation, they thought that it would be necessary to close their mills altogether. That apprehension, however, had not been realized, and the children were not only much healthier but were more attentive at school from having to work three days a week, and more industrious in the factory from having a change of occupation in the school. It was quite the exception in the factory districts to find boys and girls unable to read and write, and in the concern with which he was connected the ability of reading figures and of writing to some extent was almost essential. The Factory Act operated, therefore, very beneficially. Since that time the principle of those Acts had been applied to many other trades, and he was not aware of a single failure. Beneficial results had invariably followed. He himself had a farm at Somerleyton, in Suffolk; but, though a day school was established there, he found there was a great difficulty in getting the children to attend it, because their parents persisted in sending them to work in the fields at too early an age. He once suggested to his manager that the children should labour and go to school on alternate days, but the reply was, "Well, sir, if I do that, I shall not be able to make the farm pay. If they are employed at half time I shall have to pay them as much as if they were fully employed." In the manufacturing districts the children were now receiving as much for short time as they did for full time. He thought that a very good thing, and did not see why wages should be so very low in the agricultural districts. He thought the children ought to have the opportunity of going to school, so that they might have a better chance of rising in the world than they had at present. Education did not render a man dissatisfied with his labour, for the best workmen were those who were the best educated. There was no reason to fear that because men were educated they would not be good agricultural labourers. He was quite satisfied that if the principle were adopted that children under thirteen years of age should not be employed without a certificate of their attendance at school, the result would be very beneficial. In that case there would be no lack of schools. He hoped some such system would be adopted, because he believed it would promote the best interests of the country.

MR. M'LAGAN, as one deeply interested in agriculture, and more connected with it than any other profession, thanked the hon. Member for having introduced this subject to the notice of the House. It was evident that some measures, whether compulsory or otherwise, must be adopted to enable the agricultural labourer to keep pace in intelligence and education with the workmen in other trades. And this is the more necessary when we consider that, from the progress that has been made in agriculture of late years, the rapid advancement it is still making, and the application of delicate and improved machinery to the operations of the farm, better educated and more intelligent labourers were required. Before, however, we compel parents to educate their children, we must see that the means of education are sufficient in all districts of the country. Such, he believed, is not the case in some districts. But there is no doubt that where the means of education are abundant and sufficient there is too often an indifference on the part of the parents to avail themselves of these means. This is particularly the case in those districts where there is a great demand for the labour of children—where the parents prefer sending the children to work for 6*d.* or 7*d.* per day to sending them to school. He did not think that the plan recommended by the hon. Member, and practised by Mr. Paget, could be applied in purely agricultural districts, or where the population is sparse and the distance from school is great, as in many parts of the Highlands of Scotland. No doubt it would be better to send the children to school every alternate day or every alternate week than not at all; but there are several objections to the plan which he now took the liberty of stating. On all well-managed farms there is a regular force of labourers kept for the daily labours of the farm. By sending one or several of these away on alternate days there will be an interruption of the labour of the farm, and there would be a temptation to the farm manager, when there was a stress of work on particular days, to retain the services of the children when they should have been sent to school. Another objection he had to the plan recommended was, that the full benefit of the teaching would not be obtained; for what was learnt the one week or the one day would be partly forgot before the child appeared at school the next. Education or teaching, to be quite successful, should be continuous; being thus interrupted in the plan recommended, the children would not make the necessary progress. Besides, children sent to school only now and then, in addition to not making the necessary progress, would retard the due progress of the others at school; for the master would have to devote more time to the former to enable them to keep pace with those who were kept regularly at school, and thus his attention would necessarily be abstracted from the latter. There is nothing so annoying to a teacher, and so injurious to the progress of the pupils, as the irregular attendance of the children. He thought that a better plan would be to enact that no agricultural employer should engage any child for work unless he received a certificate from a schoolmaster that the child could read, write, and do sums in arithmetic. The objection to this plan is the machinery that would be required; for it would be necessary to have some inspector who would be invested with power to demand from the employer at any time the certificate brought by the child under a certain age. If he could assist the hon. Member for Brighton in carrying out any efficient measure for the better education of the agricultural children, he would be most happy to do so. There is no doubt that it is the duty of every parent to educate his child, and it is the duty of the State to see that the parent faithfully discharged this duty.

MR. BRUCE: Sir, whether the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) presses his Motion or not, I am sure it will be the opinion of this House that the discussion cannot have been without use. I must say that the principle, as I look upon it, is not so much the improvement of the agricultural population as the improvement of the population generally. You cannot consider the question of the county population without considering also the case of the neglected children who live in the suburbs of our large towns, and it presses irresistibly on the minds of all who examine this subject that enough has not yet been done in regard to education, and that we have no adequate national system. Our attempts up to this time have been partial and experimental. After thirty years of continued efforts we have failed to bring education home to the people, and as Christian men and legislators we ought never to rest until we have done our best to accomplish that object. The condition of agricultural labourers varies considerably. Labourers in the neighbourhood of populous cities are comparatively well off. In my part of the country, for instance, few labourers receive less than 3s. a day, and in many parts of Yorkshire agricultural labourers earn good wages. They may want, and I believe they do want, improved education, but all that you need do with respect to them, is to see that further means are taken for supplying the machinery of education. I wish I could give as favourable an account of the labourers in the southern and western parts of the country. The hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) has stated that in the north of Wiltshire the condition of the agricultural labourers is very different from that described by the hon. Member for Brighton, as existing in his part of Wiltshire. In North Wiltshire the iron-works and quarries may create such a demand for labour as to insure fair wages to the agricultural population. It is otherwise in South Wiltshire. There during the winter months it is usual to give steady employment to the married labourers, while a large portion of the unmarried labourers are thrown upon the poor rates. I once offered to find employment for 100 labourers in one part of that county, where I was assured that while the married men during the winter earned only 8s. a week, the unmarried men were supported by the poor rates. That showed something radically wrong. It arose from the same cause which has created that miserable state of society in Spitalfields and other parts of the metropolis—the improper distribution of manufacturing labour; and this arises from ignorance. A fact was brought to my knowledge at the Educational Department, that where schools were opened in the Western Islands, and where the inhabitants learned English, from that moment emigration began, the population diminished, and the condition of those who remained began to improve. I believe that the emigration which has done so much for Ireland, may be traced far more to the increased knowledge of the people, in regard to the resources of other countries than to the misery experienced in Ireland. The same misery has been endured by a portion of the population at the East End of London, among whom a state of ignorance exists which it is difficult to believe. There are in our populous districts and in our large cities many industrial interests which, as well as the agricultural districts, are well deserving the attention of the House; but I agree with the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Akroyd), that much of the success which has attended our factory legislation is owing to the fact that we have proceeded gradually and cautiously. At the same time, I think that the amount of experience we have gained justifies a much bolder application of the principle of those acts. No doubt we shall hear from the right hon. Gentleman at the Home Office that it will be his happiness and privilege to introduce a measure which will affect millions of our working population. It will probably have a wide scope, and embrace all but the agricultural population, and when that is done it will be impossible to keep out the agricultural population. The hon. Member for Brighton has made various suggestions as to the manner in which the half-time system may be applied to the agricultural population. I would add another, suited to the conditions of labour in the rural districts—namely, that attendance at school should be secured, not for so many hours in a day, or so many days in a week, but for a certain number of days in the year. But whatever may be the scheme adopted, I have no doubt that Parliament will evince towards the agricultural population the same kind and considerate spirit which has animated its legislation towards their manufacturing brethren.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the subject is one which, when the facts are fully before us, must engage the early attention of the Government and the House. In this question collateral topics of immense importance have been brought under our notice; but I shall be best discharging my duty by confining myself to the terms of the Motion before us, and giving my opinion with regard to that only. At the same time, I cannot wholly pass by the able observations of the hon. Member for Brighton upon the general questions of extending education by rates levied universally, so as to enforce the means of education in places now unprovided for. The hon. Member will forgive me for saying that this is a question which has excited so much controversy in this House that he will excuse me if I do not follow him into it. Still, I will not disguise either from him or from the House that I do think that the general question of education must come, and at no distant period, under the immediate consideration of the House, for the purpose of extending the benefits of education, especially in those poorer districts, where the means of education are less generally provided. I now pass to the terms of the Motion. My hon. Friend, followed by the hon. Member for Halifax, has dealt powerfully and justly on that which, after long discussion, is now an admitted fact, that the provisions of the Factory Acts have contributed to the advantage of all classes of the community. The hon. Member for the West Riding (Sir Francis Crossley), not only to-night, but on previous occasions, has expressed an opinion—and no opinion is entitled to more weight than that of the hon. Member on such a subject—that the beneficial operation of these Acts is felt both by masters and men, especially with regard to the spread of education among the operatives of our manufacturing towns. But I wish to ask the hon. Member for Brighton whether there are not conditions and circumstances connected with trades in large towns which make it difficult—I will not say impossible—to extend the operation of those Acts to rural districts, even in regard to compelling education. I will not say that some of the provisions of those Acts may not be extended to the rural districts; but, taking the words of his Motion, I would suggest that the condition and circumstances of the rural districts are such that the provisions of the Factory Acts, even in regard to education—to which subject his Motion is confined—are not so applicable to agricultural districts as to the larger towns. He was not, I think, quite so successful in meeting the objections to the application of the Act to rural districts as in other parts of his speech. Consider what the principles of the Factory Act are with regard to education. They are that the children engaged in factories shall be compulsorily required to attend school—that they may attend those schools either on alternate days for not less than five and a half hours, or on every day in the week for three hours at a time at one part of the year, and two hours at another. These provisions are enforced partly by penalties on the parents, partly by certificates; and the means by which these penalties are enforced is by a general inspection. This can be done in your larger towns where the houses of the parents of the children are not far removed from the place of work, where the schools are known, and the means of inspection either insure proper attendance of the children or prevent them from working in the factory. But when you apply these conditions to the rural districts the reverse is the case. The houses of the parents are removed from the fields in which they are employed. The schools will also often be distant, and if you adopt the system of morning and evening attendance, there is a danger of their not being enforced unless there is some one to see them carried into execution. I have some apprehension, recollecting an observation made at this side of the House, that it is essential for the early education of the young, that instruction must be as continuous as you can make it. If there be any interruption or break in the instruction it must impede the progress of the child in his educational studies. Let not my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton suppose that in making that observation I wish to thwart him in the object of obtaining a better education for the children in agricultural districts. I rather think the suggestion of the hon. Member for the West Riding would probably meet the difficulties better than any other I have heard made—namely, that when a child is required to work at agricultural labour, as children are in the factories, there should be a certificate given to state that the education of the child is going on at the same time. If, however, that should be done, it will not be following the provisions of the Factory Acts, though it perhaps may be effected by grafting on the Factory Acts a provision applying to children engaged in agricultural labour. My hon. Friend the Member for Brighton alluded to the valuable Reports of the Commissioners on Education—five folio volumes, which are applicable to all trades. I shall have to call attention to those Reports when stating the principles of the two Bills, relating to Factory Acts Extension and Hours of Labour Regulation, which I propose to introduce on Friday night; but bear in mind that in those five volumes you have not one single line respecting the children employed in the agricultural districts. The Commission has been extended so as to embrace an inquiry into the employment of those children; and since my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton put his notice on the paper, I have taken an opportunity of asking how soon we are likely to get a Report in reference to the children employed in gangs. I am informed that it will be presented to the Government very soon, and, of course, when it is presented to the Government it will be laid before the House. I think we shall be in a better position to deal with the subject when that Report is presented. I will frankly add that, having gone carefully through the Reports which have been made, I have arrived at the conclusion that some of the principles of the Factory Acts will have to be extended to the agricultural districts. Whether it will be necessary to extend the power of the Commissioners so that they may inquire, not only into cases in which children are employed in gangs, but also into cases in which they are employed not collectively, is a question on which I would rather not give any opinion now. I mention these matters now to show my hon. Friend that none of the topics which are material for a consideration of the subject have escaped the attention of Her Majesty's Government; but, looking at the terms of the proposal, and having made the declaration I have made, I trust my hon. Friend will not think it necessary by an abstract Motion to press his proposal to a division, because I think it may take another form when the facts are all before us. I have expressed my belief that the principles of the Factory Acts, in some form or other—what the form may be I do not now say—may be made applicable to children employed in agricultural districts. I should not, therefore, attempt to meet the proposal of my hon. Friend with a negative, nor should I like to even move the Previous Question; but, after what I have said, I hope he will not ask the House to come to any decision on his Motion.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thanked the hon. Member for Brighton for bringing the subject forward. He liked to hear a subject of this kind discussed in the House of Commons, because it would cause the question to be considered throughout all the country. The time was come when the children through the country should be taught to read and write and do the simple sums in arithmetic. It was a question of great importance, and there was a most deplorable amount of ignorance prevailing which required some cure. There was no instrument in the world better calculated to promote the advancement of society than education, and though some people objected to the enforcement of compulsory education he did not see that it was any hardship at all. The State had as much right to compel a man to educate his children as to require him to feed and clothe them. On the contrary, it was a great benefit. It did not follow that compulsory education should be mixed up with disputes on matters of religion, for there was no more connection between religion and education than there was between a dissertation on science and a sermon.

MR. AYRTON wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, before they proceeded further in reference to the education of the people, they would have some opportunity of considering the mode in which that education was carried on under the Committee of Council. It was necessary for the House, before they extended the application of the Factory Acts, to consider the manner in which the public funds were administered on the subject of education, and whether they were properly distributed. At present the poor were to a great extent passed by, while the education supposed to be provided for them was given to large numbers of people who were capable of paying for it. The rural districts, to a great extent, were deprived of the educational grant. He felt obliged to the hon. Member for Brighton for bringing the subject forward, for the discussion was extremely useful, and might lead to very beneficial results. He trusted that after the assurance which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion.

MR. WHALLEY said, the result of his experience was that, as education was now administered in this country, parents could not see what benefit their children derived from going to school, and therefore did not send them. It was a known fact that pauperism and crime were on the increase, and he believed the reason for all this was that the clergy generally took no interest in education, except for the purpose of crippling and confining the minds of their pupils in order to bring them to their own sectarian views. He hoped the right hon.

Gentleman the Home Secretary would give his attention to the question, as to what was the education to be administered so that it might be useful and profitable to the children themselves and to others.

COLONEL W. STUART said, he thought he should be borne out by Gentlemen on both sides of the House in saying that the clergy generally had earnestly co-operated in measures for the general diffusion of education, and had not shown the sectarian and narrow-minded views imputed to them. No doubt there might be exceptional cases, but as a rule they had always endeavoured to advance the progress of education in its freest sense. While the clergy generally through the country desired that the Bible should not be ignored, they did everything in their power to facilitate education. In many places there were no schools except those which were supported by zealous and self-sacrificing clergymen. He believed that if the Government would encourage night schools as much as possible the great majority of the lower classes were ready and anxious to avail themselves of the opportunity thus offered them. In agricultural districts the difficulty was to get the children together. In his own parish a night school which had been formed was three or four miles from the homes of many of the children. He doubted whether it was practicable to educate the children in agricultural districts by an extension of the Factory Act for education.

MR. FAWCETT said, it had been far from his intention to ignore the zeal shown on behalf of education by many country gentlemen and ministers of religion. Indeed, the very persons among these classes who had bestowed most time and attention upon that cause were precisely those who in all parts of the country had most emphatically implored him to stir in the matter, being fully persuaded of the necessity for their having additional powers. He had been greatly pleased with the whole tone of the discussion, and felt particularly gratified by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, not only because it was very kind and courteous towards him personally, but also because the right hon. Gentleman had evidently considered the practical difficulties of the subject. There were, however, none of those practical difficulties which had not been carefully considered by himself; and therefore he was the more confirmed in the opinion that the educational clauses of the Factory Acts might, with modifications, be applied to agriculture. He should be sorry to impede the passing of the measure for the extension of the Factory Acts which the right hon. Gentleman had promised to bring in. He believed the measure would be most valuable, and he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for undertaking to introduce it. After that discussion it was his present intention, with the assistance of his friends, to frame some clauses affecting agriculture which he desired to add to the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. Although he thought those clauses might be adopted, if he found when the Bill was discussed that they would in the least degree jeopardize the passing of the Government measure, he pledged himself at once to withdraw them.

HYPOTHEC ABOLITION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. CARNEGIE, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for abolishing the Landlord's right of Hypothec in Scotland, said, he desired simply to state the reasons which had induced him to bring forward the measure. Two years ago he moved for and obtained a Royal Commission to investigate the subject. When the Commission came to the conclusion of their inquiries there was a difference of opinion as to their Report, and of course the actual Report was the Report of the majority. He (Mr. Carnegie), in conjunction with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Wigton (Mr. Young) and two other experienced Members of the Commission, dissented from that Report. He understood there had been introduced into "another place" a Bill embodying the recommendation of the Report of the Commission. Under these circumstances, he had thought it his duty to prepare a Bill embodying the opinions of the minority of the Commission. If the Bill were read a first time now, he proposed to fix the second reading for a comparatively remote day, in order that persons in Scotland, interested in the subject, might have ample opportunities of considering it.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY said, he would not offer any opposition to the introduction of the Bill, but he reserved full liberty to oppose it at its future stages.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the abolition of the Landlord's right of Hypothec in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CARNEGIE, Mr. FORDYCE, and Mr. EDWARD CRAUFURD.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 54.]

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. AYRTON, Bill to make better provision for the raising of money to be applied in the execution of works of permanent improvement in the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. AYRTON and Mr. TITE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 55.]

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Transubstantiation, &c., Declaration Abolition [6]; Offices and Oaths [7]; Dublin University Professorships [10]; Execution of Deeds [26]; Sale and Purchase of Shares [38], debate adjourned.

SWANSEA VALE RAILWAY BILL.

(by Order.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

COLONEL SOMERSET said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, on the ground that it had already been rejected by Parliament.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Colonel Somerset.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. ROEBUCK said, he had often opposed the discussion of Private Bills in that House on the second reading, and he thought this Bill had better be sent to a Committee.

MR. DILLWYN said, that it was quite true that it was one of a batch of Bills

VOL. CLXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

thrown out last Session by the House of Lords; but it had passed this House, and it was generally admitted, in the inquiry before the Committee, that the Vale of Swansea required more railway accommodation for the development of its mineral wealth.

MR. DODSON said, that a prima facie case was made out in favour of the Bill last year; that it had come back this year without a competitor; and it might be expected that it had been modified to avoid the opposition which last year proved fatal to it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

EXPLANATION.

LORD NAAS said, that in moving the second reading of the Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance Bill on Tuesday last, he stated that when the Roman Catholic Bishop Moriarty was addressing a large gathering of his flock at Killarney against Fenianism, there were in the congregation sufficient sympathisers with the Fenian movement to induce a certain number of young men to leave the church while the Bishop was speaking. He (Lord Naas) made the statement on what he then believed to be undoubted authority. He was happy to say that, on further inquiry, he found that the statement was not accurate. Three or four lines from a letter by Dr. Moriarty completely set the question at rest, and showed that no one left the church in consequence of what was addressed to the congregation. Dr. Moriarty said that he never addressed a more attentive audience; that he spoke on Fenianism after the conclusion of the usual service; and that as he had preached a long sermon on the gospel of the day, it was possible some women and children might have gone out. He had great pleasure in making this statement, and it was his belief that what he had formerly stated was the result of inaccurate information.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he rose to ask of the Government, Why it was that the second reading of this Bill had been fixed for to-morrow. It was one which affected 4,000,000 of people, and upon which great doubts and differences of opinion were entertained. It was not yet printed, and was of so important a character that he thought some time ought to elapse after it was in the hands of Members before it was introduced, in order that some little consultation should take place upon it. He was not at all sure that he should be opposed to it, but he certainly required more time to consider it.

LORD NAAS said, he would remind the hon. Member that the measure, having passed the House of Lords, he would have no difficulty in obtaining a copy and studying its provisions. The Government were very anxious that the statement to be made by the Under Secretary for the Colonies should be before the country as soon as possible. He hoped, therefore, that no objection would be taken to passing the Bill through its second stage to-morrow; but in case of any discussion arising, and it being thought necessary to debate its provisions, the Government would interpose no objections to the adjournment of the debate.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, that as he had been informed that no opposition was to be offered to the second reading of this Bill, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) having given notice of an Amendment in the next stage of the Bill, he would not detain the House by any lengthened remarks. The object of the Bill was to get rid of an offensive and insulting Declaration on the Statute Book, dating as far back as the reign of Charles II. The terms of the Declaration he would not read. It stigmatised some of the most sacred doctrines and ceremonies of the Catholic Church as superstitious and idolatrous; and he did not think that there was one hon. Member in the House who would advocate the retention of that Declaration. In 1829 the Declaration was abandoned in respect to every office open to Roman Catholics; but it was to the present time required to be taken by the Lord Chancellor of England, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, the Chancellors of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin, and by every office-holder under the Crown who by law could not be a Roman Catholic. The object of the Bill was to do away with this Declaration. It did not touch the qualification for any office. It left the law as it was, but abolished the Declaration. He introduced this Bill last Session when it was sanctioned by this House, and was sent up to the Lords; but the noble Earl, now the First Lord of the Treasury, thought it necessary to stop the further progress of the measure, on the ground that a Royal Commission had been appointed to inquire into the general subject of oaths, and was then sitting. That Commission had not yet made their Report; and he (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) felt it to be his duty on the first night of the Session to bring the subject before the House, as he thought it disgraceful that the Declaration should longer remain on the Statute Book. It was true, as was remarked last year by a venerable Peer, who assumed the guardianship of Protestant interests in the other House, that the Declaration was one which the Sovereign was obliged to make at her coronation; but this Bill did not interfere with the Sovereign. Whether the obligation to take this Declaration ought to be retained for the Sovereign was a matter for consideration; but this Bill did not apply at all to the Sovereign, but only to certain office-holders under the Crown.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to take this opportunity of stating that he had given notice of an Amendment to this Bill in Committee to the effect that the substance of the Declaration should be retained, but that its offensive terms should be avoided by the substitution of new ones. He must observe that this Declaration had existed since the time of Charles II., and that the terms of it had never till now been stigmatised. It seemed that Roman Catholic gentlemen in the present day had become more sensitive than their forefathers. It was not for him to complain of the change of feeling that had taken place. His only object was to alter the Declaration in such a manner as to get rid of what was offensive in its phraseology. There was a strong feeling out of doors against the Offices and Oaths Bill, which stood next on the paper, and the object of which was nearly the same as that of the present Bill, and with regard to which he held a petition in his hand.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot present a petition at this stage of the Bill.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Not at the second reading?

MR. SPEAKER: Not after the second reading has been moved.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday 12th March.

Sir John Gray.*)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. NEWDEGATE: May I be allowed to present petitions now?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes.

MR. NEWDEGATE then presented several petitions against the Bill.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN said, in proposing the second reading of this Bill, to which the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had given notice of an Amendment that the second reading be deferred for six months, he admitted that it was a supplement to the last Bill. The object of that Bill was to repeal an obnoxious Declaration, while the present Bill proposed to open several offices to Roman Catholics from which they were excluded by that Declaration. It was therefore a Bill of considerable importance. At the time when Catholic Emancipation was carried in 1829, there were five offices expressly kept from Roman Catholics. The first was the Regent of the Kingdom; the second, the Lord Chancellorship of England; the third, the Lord Chancellorship of Ireland; the fourth, the Lord Lieutenantcy of Ireland; and the fifth, the office of Representative of Her Majesty at the Presbyterian Assembly or Synod at Edinburgh. As to the first of these offices he did not seek to open it to the Roman Catholics; nor did he propose that a Roman Catholic should be Her Majesty's Representative to the Edinburgh Assembly. But the other three offices, he thought, might be fairly opened to Roman Catholics; and it was with regard to two of these three offices that the Bill professed to deal: for the Bill did not touch the office of Lord Chancellor of England. He was well aware that there were persons whom he might call "old women of both sexes," who believed that the Lord Chancellor of England was the Keeper of the conscience of the Crown, and that Her Majesty consulted him on every question of faith and conscience. They also thought that the Lord Chancellor had to decide on all questions of doctrine and discipline in the Church of England. This was all fallacy; but, for the present, he did not propose to offend those prejudices. The two offices he proposed to open to Roman Catholics—he should say also to Jews—were those of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the Lord Lieutenant. A Bill seeking to open the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to Roman Catholics was introduced into that House in 1859, and it was supported by two very distinguished Members, both now deceased, Sir George Cornwall Lewis and Lord Palmerston, and also by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, (Mr. Gladstone). It was, however, introduced so late in the Session, and it was met with so determined an opposition by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, that it was withdrawn, and the subject had not been since brought before the House. There was no reason whatsoever why the Lord Chancellor of Ireland should not be a Roman Catholic. He had no ecclesiastical patronage of any kind, excepting two small vicarages in Dublin to which he and four others had a right of nomination. His share, therefore, was but one-fifth of this very small patronage, and so seldom could the five patrons be got to agree, that the nomination in fact lapsed to the Archbishop of Dublin. The Lord Chancellor of Ireland was, in fact, nothing but one of the Irish Ministry, and the Chief Equity Judge of Ireland; and in either capacity there was no reason why a Roman Catholic should not hold the office. The Chief Secretary might be a Roman Catholic, the Attorney General might be a Roman Catholic, and at this moment was a Roman Catholic, and every Minister of the Crown might be a Roman Catholic. Therefore, there was no reason why the Lord Chancellor of Ireland might not be a Roman Catholic. A Roman Catholic might be a Judge of Appeal, and in that capacity might reverse the decision of the Lord Chancellor. Thirty years had elapsed since Roman Catholics had been raised to the bench in Ireland. He believed that his own father, was the first Roman Catholic that ever was placed on the judicial bench from the time of the Revolution, and he ventured to say that a breath of calumny had never rested on a Roman Catholic Judge for the manner in which he had discharged his duties to the Sovereign, nor had the slightest question as to his impartiality ever been raised. There was, then, no ground whatsoever for excepting the Chief Judgeship in Equity from the Roman Catholics. It might be said, however, that it might be dangerous to have a Roman Catholic Lord Chancellor, because he had the control of the magistracy. But it was the lords-lieutenant of counties who virtually appointed the magistrates, and every one of the lords-lieutenant might be Roman Catholics. So, also, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in England, who had the appointment of magistrates, might be a Roman Catholic. There was, therefore, nothing in the office of Lord Chancellor to prevent its being open to Roman Catholics; and it was a badge or mark of inferiority on the Roman Catholic members of the Irish Bar, to say that Roman Catholics should not be eligible to the office of Chief Judge in Equity. The Attorney General for Ireland was a Roman Catholic, the Solicitor General was a Protestant; and, according to the existing law the highest of these officers could not become Lord Chancellor, while the inferior officer could. He now came to the question of the Lord Lieutenancy. He did not ask that a Roman Catholic should be appointed to the office of Lord Lieutenant; that must be left to the Crown; but he saw no reason why the Premier Duke and Earl Marshal of England, for instance, if otherwise suitable, should not become Lord Lieutenant of Ireland simply because he believed in Transubstantiation. It might be said that the Sovereign and the Government being Protestant, the representative should be Protestant. But the Governor General of Canada, the Governor General of New South Wales, and other representatives of Royalty, might be Catholics; and he saw no reason why a ban should be placed on Roman Catholics in Ireland. There was nothing that required the Lord Lieutenant to be an Episcopalian. He might be of any religion except the Roman Catholic and the Jewish. He might be a Presbyterian, or a Socinian, or anything else; but he must not be a Catholic or a Jew. It might be objected that the Lord Lieutenant had extensive Church patronage. That was true. But the Bill provided that if the office of Lord Lieutenant should be held by any person, not a member of the Church of England, the Church patronage should vest in a person to be appointed by the Queen, under her Sign Manual, or, failing such appointment by the Crown, in the Archbishop of Armagh, the head of the Established Church in Ireland. The next provision of the Bill was to enable Mayors, and other corporate officers, if they thought proper, to attend their own places of worship in their official robes. In the Catholic Emancipation Act there was a clause enacting that any person holding a judicial or civil office, or any mayor, bailiff, or other corporate officer, who should resort to a place of worship other than one of the United Church of England and Ireland, or the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, in a robe, gown, or insignia of office, should forfeit his office and pay a fine of £100. This was petty, pitiful legislation. The time was come when this should be repealed. When Mr. O'Connell was Lord Mayor of Dublin—he was the first to show the folly of the enactment—he went in state, in a state carriage, attended by all his officials, to a Roman Catholic Church, and as soon as he reached the church he got out of the carriage, took off his robes, and deposited them in the carriage, then he went into the church, and after service he resumed his robes and rode back in his carriage, thus showing what he thought of such a miserable piece of legislation. Now, surely these cobwebs of intolerance ought to be swept away. The next clause related to the oath. Last Session, a general form of oath had been prescribed for Members of that House, and he proposed that it should be substituted for that still required to be taken by all Catholic office-holders and professional men, who were at present bound to take an oath which that House had pronounced to be offensive and insulting. It might be said that to make this proposal was premature, because the Commission on Oaths was still sitting. But his reply to this was that the Commission had not yet reported, and that if they did report this Session it by no means followed that immediate legislation would be the result. The proposal he now made was simply this: that the oath adopted by the House last year for all its Members should be the one to be imposed in all cases for the future; and if the Commission should recommend any other form, and it should be approved of by the House, there would be no difficulty in effecting the substitution. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) had given notice of an Amendment to defer the second reading of the Bill till that day six months. Now, he respected the sincerity and the courage with which the hon. Gentleman always came to the front as often as he imagined that the Protestant institutions of the country were in danger. But he wished that the hon. Gentleman would at least show some reasonable ground of objection to the Bill, and not indulge in vague declamation about the settlement of 1829, the policy of Sir Robert Peel, or the letters that have passed between the Czar and the Pope of Rome. As to the settlement of 1829, he believed that neither that nor any other arrangement would be accepted as final until all the offices of the State were open to all the subjects of the Queen, irrespective of their religious creeds. He did not bring forward this measure as one that crowned the edifice of religious toleration, but only as one step further towards that great consummation; and he trusted that it would not only be carried, but carried by such a majority as to ensure its safe passage through the other House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

MR. SCHREIBER said, that a short time ago, in a Committee upstairs, the hon. and learned Baronet who had introduced this Bill (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), together with four other Members of the House, had discharged in his regard certain judicial or quasi-judicial functions in a manner so satisfactory to him that he ought to be the last man in the House to offer any opposition to his being made Lord Chancellor of Ireland, or raised to any other office to which his ambition might aspire, and his undoubted abilities entitled him. He trusted, therefore, in any remarks he might think it his duty to make, he should not give pain to the hon. Baronet. This Session was not far advanced, and already they had proof of the value attached to Parliamentary settlements or compacts. Only last Wednesday the House was called upon to defend a settlement not seven years old, and to-day a settlement was assailed, which had the sanction of thirty-eight years. That great statesman, Sir Robert Peel, accompanied his measure for the removal of Roman Catholic disabilities by what in the language of the day was called "securities" and "safeguards," which it was the object of this Bill to take away. The object of Sir Robert Peel, he conceived, was twofold. He knew the system with which he had to deal, and he knew that he could not carry the Bill without conditions. He knew the activity of the Roman Catholic Church, its ambition, its marvellous organization, its impatience of equality, the career of aggression which he was opening to the energies of Roman Catholics, and he desired that his Protestant fellow-subjects should at least start even in the race; and so he handicapped the Roman Catholics. If Roman Catholic gentlemen were wise, they would not quarrel with the conditions of the race. They were the price of the liberty which they enjoyed in this Protestant country—in countries where they did the handicapping they were not very nice about the weights. So far from viewing the attitude and action of Protestants in this matter as offensive or aggressive, he regarded it simply as defensive, and as something conveying a compliment to the superior organization of the Roman Catholic system. Sir Robert Peel knew his Bill would not pass without these makeweights, and it was now matter for the conscience and honour of Roman Catholic gentlemen to say how far, having obtained relief on certain conditions, they were free to reject the conditions while they continued to enjoy the relief. What was the language of Sir Robert Peel in proposing the restrictions which the hon. Baronet would now remove? It was this—

"This Bill will exclude the Roman Catholic from the office of Regent, and from exercising, under any circumstances, the delegated authority of the Crown; from the office of Lord Chancellor in England and Ireland respectively, and from the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland."—[2 Hansard, xx. 763.]

Now, he considered the object of Sir Robert Peel to have been the hedging-in by out-works of that Protestant succession to the Throne which was the citadel of our liberties. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was the representative of the Sovereign, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland was his constitutional Adviser—their relative position was exactly analogous to that of the Sovereign and Lord Chancellor in this country; and for his part he entirely failed to understand how any argument which applied to the former could not with the greatest ease be transferred to the latter. The hon. Baronet (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) went on to

of Irish Protestants, the more they would be inclined not to lower the Protestant to the Catholic level, but to raise the Catholic to a position of equality with the Protestant. Questions of this kind were oftener cropping up in that House than in Ireland, because the Irish Protestants found that the more they kept those matters in the dark, the better for themselves. The question about Cardinal Cullen was not raised in Ireland. It was known there that he was a Cardinal—a Prince of the Church—and when he appeared at the banquet of the Lord Mayor, it was taken for granted that he would be recognised as a great fact in the State. As a Protestant, he would wish that all his countrymen were Protestants; but as that could not be, his wish was that they should be all equal. He did not see why the Lord Lieutenant should not be a Roman Catholic; and, as for the office of Lord Chancellor, he was sure that it would be a most wise proceeding to leave it open to Roman Catholics. It had done great good in Ireland to have Roman Catholic Judges, because justice was not only fairly administered, but it was administered with the cheerful acquiescence of the people. In making that remark, he did not mean to imply that justice had not been fairly administered, when there were none but Protestant Judges. He could not see, for the life of him, why the present distinctions should be maintained, and he therefore wished most sincerely that the Bill should pass.

Mr. KER objected to the Bill, on the ground that it was nothing more than introducing the small end of the wedge.

Mr. BAGWELL said, there were two parties aggrieved by these restrictions, the Irish Protestant proprietors, of whom he was one, and a vast Catholic majority of the population of Ireland. As a Protestant, he felt that every one of the differences between the members of the two religious bodies was a decided evil. In the common intercourse of life, it could not but be felt that there was a great difference between Protestant and Catholic, and why should it exist? A great many of those distinctions had been swept away, from time to time; a few, however, still remained, just as if, when the Parliament of this country found it necessary to legislate in a spirit of forbearance, they still wished to leave some sting behind, as if to remind the Irish people that they were a conquered and degraded race. Did anyone imagine that the Protestant religion or the Church Establishment was strengthened by such a course? On the contrary, every restriction upon the Catholic was a source of weakness to the Protestants who were in such a minority in Ireland. The more English gentlemen considered the position of Irish Protestants, the more they would be inclined not to lower the Protestant to the Catholic level, but to raise the Catholic to a position of equality with the Protestant. Questions of this kind were oftener cropping up in that House than in Ireland, because the Irish Protestants found that the more they kept those matters in the dark, the better for themselves. The question about Cardinal Cullen was not raised in Ireland. It was known there that he was a Cardinal—a Prince of the Church—and when he appeared at the banquet of the Lord Mayor, it was taken for granted that he would be recognised as a great fact in the State. As a Protestant, he would wish that all his countrymen were Protestants; but as that could not be, his wish was that they should be all equal. He did not see why the Lord Lieutenant should not be a Roman Catholic; and, as for the office of Lord Chancellor, he was sure that it would be a most wise proceeding to leave it open to Roman Catholics. It had done great good in Ireland to have Roman Catholic Judges, because justice was not only fairly administered, but it was administered with the cheerful acquiescence of the people. In making that remark, he did not mean to imply that justice had not been fairly administered, when there were none but Protestant Judges. He could not see, for the life of him, why the present distinctions should be maintained, and he therefore wished most sincerely that the Bill should pass.

Mr. ROEBUCK said, he was always grieved when a discussion of this kind took place in the House. From long experience he had come to the conclusion that all the subjects of Her Majesty should before the law be placed upon a perfect equality. He was very anxious to learn from the responsible advisers of the House what was their view of the Bill? The hon. Gentleman the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Schreiber) had made use of some remarkable expressions. He said that the English people were tolerant because they were Protestant. Now, that was not his (Mr. Roebuck's) view. They were tolerant because they were enlightened. He was very glad that the hon. Gentleman pointed to the fact that other nations, when they "handicapped" the Protestant, did not act with the same tolerance that we did. And why did they not? Not because they were Catholics, but because they were not enlightened. Another expression made use of by the hon.

Mr. Schreiber

Gentleman was that Sir Robert Peel "handicapped" the Roman Catholics. Now, what was the meaning of handicapping? It was putting a weight upon the better horse. Was that the position in which the hon. Member considered himself in reference to the Roman Catholic? Did he want the Roman Catholic to be weighted because he was a better man than the hon. Gentleman? When the hon. Member again made use of illustrations, he would advise him to be careful of the consequences. Now, if hon. Gentlemen recurred to history with respect to this matter, they would soon come to a definite conclusion. When these restrictions were put upon the Roman Catholics they were put upon them by the most enlightened and tolerant men in England; and when he found that they were justified and approved by such men as Milton and Locke, he did believe that it was at that time necessary, for the safeguard of the Protestant religion, to impose them. But times had changed. We had tried a great experiment by means of the Act passed in 1829; and what had been the consequence? Had it resulted in any injury to England? Had it diminished the safety of the Protestant succession? Did the hon. Gentleman believe for a moment, or did he profess before the House to believe, that there was any danger from the Bill to the Protestant succession? and, if not, what danger was there at all? It was fair to say that there was something in the power of high officials who might have in their hands the distribution of Church patronage. But the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman took away from those officers, if they became Catholics, that very patronage, and put it into hands which nobody could object to—namely, those of the Archbishop of Armagh or the Crown. The hon. Member referred to another point, which his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) had called "cobwebs," and the hon. Gentleman asked, would he sweep away those cobwebs? Why not? If he found a cobweb in his room, with the other dirt in it, why not sweep it away? He could not, therefore, accept the illustration of the hon. Gentleman, and admit that those "cobwebs of intolerance" should remain. There was a case in literary history, in which a great poet, in his estimation—Pope—who was a Roman Catholic, had a great friend, Martha Blount, who was also a Roman Catholic, and another great friend the Mayor of Bath, and they were told that the Mayor used to send his carriage to take Martha Blount to a Roman Catholic chapel. Well, what harm did that do to the Protestant succession? And what would be the harm now to allow the Lord Mayor of York, if he were an Anabaptist, or Dissenter of another kind, to go to his place of worship in his robes? In fact, the whole matter of these restrictions had become an utter farce. Well, let them look at the whole matter as rational men. He recollected, when he was in Ireland, talking to a dignitary of the Roman Catholic Church about what they had so often heard of in that House—the wrongs of Ireland; and he said to this gentleman, "Will you be good enough to point out a real grievance under which you suffer except it be that of the Established Church?" He could not put his finger on any grievance but the very prohibitions which this Bill sought to abolish; and he replied, "I do not think much of that grievance." He trusted that the Government, going to the front of an enlightened people on this occasion, would agree to this Bill; and, if so, that they would pass it in such a way that the bigotry of the other House would not be encouraged to reject it. If, however, the Government should put themselves on a line with the narrow-minded bigotry of this country, then he pitied them, and he did not think that such a course would do them much honour.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Sir, I feel much indebted to the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Schreiber) for having interposed in this debate, and for the ability with which he has done so. I feel that on these subjects too much has been left to me by those with whom I agree in opinion on these questions. The House has suffered a grievous loss—a twofold loss—first in the removal of Sir Hugh Cairns, who has reaped the well-merited reward of his professional eminence; and secondly, by the promotion of Sir James Whiteside to the judicial position which he adorns on the Bench of the sister country. We have lost, by the promotion of these two eminent men, an amount of experience, ability, and eloquence which I fear for years we shall not see replaced. Neither of these eminent men was ashamed to be classed amongst those narrow-minded bigots, whose opinions the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has condemned. The hon. and learned Member has given the House some information as to the manner in which he conducts his household affairs. I do not mean to doubt its efficiency; there probably are no more cobwebs in his chambers than there are in his brains; politically he is a rather rough-handed housemaid. The subject now before the House was considered in the Session of 1859, and again when Acts were passed last Session for the alteration of the oaths taken by Members of Parliament. I felt no grievance in taking the oaths which have been taken by the Protestant Members of this House. I have seen no one unwilling to take them; the House framed these oaths in 1858, and again last Session, so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the country, as they now exist. But the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield asks, what danger is there in this Bill, or in modern legislation, to the Act of Settlement. I would remind him that the Oaths Bill, as introduced by the late Government, contained in the oath proposed for Members of Parliament no reference to the Act of Settlement. But so strong was the feeling of this House with respect to the Act of Settlement, by which the monarchy of this country is established upon the basis won by our forefathers through the Revolution of 1688—that Act of Settlement which embodied the Bill of Rights—that Act of Settlement, which not only secures the Throne to the descendants of the Electress Sophia of Hanover, being Protestants, but which also secures the freedom and the rights of the subjects of this free country, Roman Catholics as well as Protestants—so strong was the feeling of this House, that in the oaths, taken by Members of Parliament, holding as we do so large a share of the Imperial power, the Act of Settlement should be recognised, that on the Motion of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer this House, without a division, decided that a recognition of that Act of Settlement should be inserted in the oath. It was proposed that another addition, or rather restoration, should be made to the oath, which future Members of Parliament are to be required to take. That addition was the restoration, the re-introduction of those terms of the oath which all the Protestant Members of the House have taken, and by which we have abjured any foreign jurisdiction within this country. A division was taken in a very full House, and that Amendment was lost by only fifteen votes. The hon. and learned Member, in speaking of these matters, made no reference to a circumstance that was alluded to by the hon. Member who spoke just before him. That hon. Member said that he rejoiced that a cardinal had appeared in the attire of his function as Cardinal Legate—at the inaugural banquet of the Lord Mayor of Dublin. Well, Sir, most writers for the newspapers seem to consider that a very significant circumstance. I also considered it a very significant circumstance, and hence the question which I put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject. The Legislature has foreseen that the appearance of any such representative of the Court of Rome would be a very significant circumstance. In the year 1848 the Government of that day proposed that diplomatic relations should be opened with the Court of Rome, and introduced a Bill into the House of Lords for that purpose. That Bill proposed to recognise the Sovereign Pontiff, not as the Sovereign of the Papal States in Italy, but as that, which he claims to be, the Sovereign Pontiff of the whole world. Objections were entertained by persons, for whom I know the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, in common with most others, felt great respect. The subject was considered by the late Duke of Wellington and the late Earl of Eglintoun, who proposed two Amendments—the one, declaring that England was ready to enter into diplomatic relations with the Sovereign of the Court of Rome, as Sovereign of the Italian States, but not in the character of Sovereign Pontiff, claiming an universal sovereignty, a claim which the present Pope has re-asserted by a brief issued only two years ago—the other Amendment, declaring that while England is ready to receive a diplomatic representative from his Holiness, in his temporal and Italian capacity only, she declares it to be illegal for the Pope to send any ecclesiastic to this country, as a Nuncio. These Amendments were unanimously adopted. And are these such light and trivial matters, that the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield is justified in speaking of them as cobwebs? Last Session I ventured, Sir, to urge upon the House that by removing the declaration in our oaths against the intrusion of any foreign authority into this country, the Legislature would encourage hopes—hopes that it did not intend to realize. It is in the sense of such hopes that I understand the presence of Cardinal Legate Cullen at the inaugural banquet of the Lord Mayor of Dublin, assuming the garb and precedence which Rome holds due to his functions. Hon. Members will excuse me if, before I come to the more immediate matter of this Bill, I allude to an observation that fell from the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Monday. The right hon. Gentleman said he did not know that Cardinal Cullen was a Legate from the Papal See. Now, I will show the House that I had high authority for so describing Cardinal Cullen. The history of this Cardinal Legate Cullen is a curious one. He was secretary to the Propaganda at Rome. The Propaganda, as hon. Members well know, was originally a missionary institution. Its position was altered in the year 1836 by a brief of the then Pope, and its authority was increased—a circumstance that has had more effect upon European politics than most people are aware. The brief was directed to Cardinal Zurla, and by that brief the whole of the missions of the regular orders of Rome, which are under the direction of the Propaganda, were placed under the control and under the authority of the Gesu—that is to say, under the direction of the Jesuits. On the 25th of May, in the year 1854, a high authority, no longer in this House, Sir Joseph Napier, said, in the debate upon the Oaths Bill then before the House—

“I agree that nothing should be insisted on, which we can safely admit to be now superfluous, as having survived the claim against which it protests. But I have been startled to find an edition of the Bullarium, published in 1841, at Rome, in which a selection of bulls has been made and published by Dr. Cullen, then Director of the Press for the Propaganda, but now an Archbishop of the Church of Rome in Ireland; in this the bulls are selected ‘for the purpose of having in readiness for the use of the Propaganda those documents, which can conduce to a right and expeditious consideration of affairs, the necessity or opportunity of consulting which might easily occur in the course of matters, frequently to be investigated by the Sacred Council.’ Out of the sixty-six documents in the folio, Bullarium, Dr. Cullen selects eight. Of these eight, there is one in the last year of George II., another after the accession of George III. In both the title of the House of Hanover to the Throne is ignored, and the rightful title of the House of Stuart asserted. I saw the volumes myself, and I have extracts from them, and I own I am not ready to throw away our dusty shield, while these rusty swords are unsheathed in the reign of our present Queen by those who best know what is obsolete and what is effective in the Papal system. The preface of this work, which was prepared by Dr. Cullen, refers to the Apostolical letters which have been promulgated from 1745 to the time at which he wrote, and amongst these are several bulls treating the House of Stuart as lawfully entitled to the Throne of Great Britain. These are not dealt with as obsolete records, but selected for special and present use. Let the noble Lord pause, and understand what he is really doing, before he cuts down the oath of abjuration: let him be sure that he is safe, and let there be a preamble distinctly reciting the facts and reasons sufficient to justify any deliberate change; let him read the Papal line of succession to the Throne, as it is given in the Hibernia Dominicana, page 148, and let him ask this further question, ‘Did Rome treat an oath as valueless when, in the Synod, holden in 1852, where Dr. Cullen presided as the Papal Legate, each Bishop swore according to the oath fashioned in 1564, “to yield true obedience to the Pope, as vicar of Christ, and submission to all the canons and decretals, especially of the Council of Trent?”’ There is, moreover, the special and solemn vow and swearing of each, as ‘his subjects,’ and the formal conclusion, ‘So help me God and these holy Gospels.’”—[3 Hansard, cxxxiii. 912.]

I beg pardon for having read so lengthy an extract; but I think that authority should satisfy the House that the Legislature was right last Session in retaining in the oaths to be taken by Members of Parliament some recognition of the Act of Settlement, because in the present and modern edition of the Bullarium, published under the direction of the Pope, and compiled by Dr. Cullen as secretary of the Propaganda, the succession is, in fact, disputed; and it is this person who now appears—I will not declare in absolute contravention of the law, but, in my opinion, in a manner inconsistent with the intention and spirit of the law of this country, and inconsistent with International Law; it is this person who now appears on an official occasion in Dublin in the garb of a Cardinal, and who is described in every one of the public newspapers as Cardinal Legate of the Holy See—as Legate, a function which I have shown he held long before 1854—while the fact of his having since been made a Cardinal derogates nothing from his importance as a Legate, but is consistent with and increases it; because a Cardinal cannot be appointed to govern any province in the world for the Papacy without possessing legatine power. As history tells us, the last Cardinal who was received in England was Cardinal Pole, in the reign of Queen Mary, and he did not enter this country without permission. Lord Hastings and another Peer were sent by the Queen to bring him to this country, and so jealous were the English people, that even Bishop Gardiner, who was then Lord Chancellor, could not satisfy them until he compelled Cardinal Pole to take out a licence under the Great Seal, limiting the exercise of his legatine powers. The appearance of Cardinal Legate Cullen and the Sovereign Pontiff—breaking of the Southern Confession—was the only Prince in the world who wished well to our cause, and blessing.” And now I see that a diplomatic difficulty exists on this subject. What is the spirit of the crusades? The Pope made war upon Russia, and England made war upon the United States, and upon the great Empire which has liberated its serfs, and upon the great Republic we are so often called upon to admire. Is this a Power that has relaxed either its pretensions or its disposition to interfere with other States? M. Dupin might well say “that the Papacy has forgotten nothing and learnt much.” Works have appeared in this country showing that, according to an improved method, the same system of disturbance is now at work in England through the Jesuits, that was at work from the period of the Reformation, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, during the reign of James I., during the reign of Charles I., during the Protectorate, during the reign of Charles II., during the whole time that the Stuarts reigned in England. A very able pamphlet has just appeared, from the pen of the Dean of Ripon, entitled Rome's Tactics, wherein are given authorities for these statements. The hon. and learned Member for Clare, who has introduced this Bill, asks us to open the offices of Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor of Ireland to Roman Catholics. I opposed the Bill which was introduced by Sir William Somerville in 1859 for opening the office of Lord Chancellor to Roman Catholics. And why did I oppose that proposal? Because I think the Protestant Sovereign of these realms ought to have one judicial office in Ireland reserved for a person of her own creed and of her own policy. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has said that Protestants are not tolerant. Let him read, in the last number of the Dublin Review, an article in which the Inquisition is highly applauded. It is known that the publication was started by Cardinal Wiseman, and I believe it to be under the patronage of Cardinal Legate Cullen. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: No, no!] Then these opinions are inherited from Cardinal Wiseman. In what Protestant State was there ever such an institution established as the Inquisition? It is notorious that our form of Christianity, where Protestantism is Christian—(I say nothing for Protestantism that is not Christian)—is tolerant, is known for its toleration, that it binds upon the conscience the duty of toleration, but it warns us also in the words of Locke, that we cannot give universal toleration to intolerance. It is to guard against the intolerance and interference of the Papacy that these offices have been wisely reserved to Protestants. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that there is little or no Church patronage attached to the office of Lord Chancellor of Ireland. Granted. But to whom on appeal come all questions relating to ecclesiastical jurisdiction? Why, to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. When the Lord Lieutenant is absent the Lord Chancellor is ex officio one of the Lords Justices. He is therefore regent to the Viceroy, and in his absence is invested with regal powers and regal jurisdiction. I might use other arguments. In whom rests the control of all the property of infants? In the Lord Chancellor. But I come at once to the office of Lord Lieutenant. The Lord Lieutenant is the direct representative of the Protestant Sovereign, of the Protestant Crown of England in one part of the United Kingdom—a Crown that we have acknowledged in our oaths to be Protestant, and have declared that it is to remain Protestant, a Crown which, according to the oath we have framed for future Members of Parliament, must be Protestant. I ask is it too much that we reserve this office, connected with the direct representation of the Crown, to the faith to which the Crown is bound by the Act of Settlement and by the Coronation Oath? I say it is not too much. I believe, that acting in the spirit of liberalism, the Legislature has reached a point at which further concession is fraught with danger. It is evident that if we, in the sense of an equality, which Rome never admits—which Rome recommends to Protestant States, but never practises herself, either at Rome or where she has supreme control, as she has in Spain—I say if we proceed further and blindly in the direction of an equality, which Rome rejects, we shall endanger those great principles of toleration that have given to our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects—and I speak on the authority of Dr. Ennis, a Roman Catholic Bishop in Ireland, and of the Count Montalembert—a freedom such as they possess in no other country in the world. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Newdegate.)

LORD NAAS: I shall not attempt to follow my hon. Friend (Mr. Newdegate) through the varied topics to which he has called attention; but I will state, as briefly as possible, my own opinion on the provisions of the Bill now before the House. We have heard a great deal to-day, and on former occasions, about the great settlement of 1829, and nobody can attach more importance to that settlement than I do. I believe that any attempt to break through that settlement, in any material point, would not only be strongly resisted by this House, but would have the unfortunate effect of reviving questions now happily settled. In considering this subject, however, we should bear in mind what were those safeguards which were supposed to be necessary at that time, and what were the dangers against which those safeguards were intended to provide? I apprehend that it was then anticipated by many that by the admission of Roman Catholics to equal civil rights, the interests of the Protestant religion would be weakened in this country. But all those great and eminent men who then advocated that admission, based all their arguments on the assumption that all those rights and liberties could be given to our Roman Catholic subjects, without in any way endangering the safety of our Protestant institutions. How far those anticipations have been realized, it is not for me now to discuss. Differences of opinion may, and, I believe, do exist upon the subject; but, so far as I am concerned, I believe firmly that the admission of Roman Catholics at that time to a full and equal share of civil rights has not in any way weakened or injured the influence and interests of the Protestant religion within this realm. That is the opinion I have ever held. That settlement was made thirty-eight years ago, and it cannot be alleged that it is an improper inquiry now to institute how far the safeguards and conditions made then have worked, and how far they are necessary for the attainment of the objects for which they were established and enacted. Some of the provisions of that great settlement have already been swept away. The alteration made in the oath provided by the Emancipation Act, for instance, has taken place without any unfortunate result; other provisions of that Act have fallen into disuse without, as far as I know, mischievous results. The position, therefore, taken up by those who declare that the provisions of that Act cannot be altered without danger to the Protestant religion, has been proved to be untenable. With regard to the Bill now before the House, the first and most important feature in it is the provision that, for the future, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland may be a Roman Catholic. On that point I differ entirely from the hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Bill. I do not believe that anything could be proposed which would be more distasteful to a large proportion of the Protestant population of this country, as well as of Ireland. The position of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland differs essentially from the position of every official in the service of the Crown. He is the direct representative of the Sovereign; and to him is delegated more extensive regal power than is held by any subject of Her Majesty, except, perhaps, in India. He is the direct representative of the Sovereign, and exercises much of the Sovereign's power; the whole patronage of the Crown, as regards the Irish Church, remains absolutely and completely in his charge. He is entirely responsible for the appointment of the Bishops, and in his relation to the Established Church stands very much in the position of the Sovereign. I think, then, that it would not be wise—looking to the actual duties which the Lord Lieutenant performs, and the position in which he stands—I do not think it would be wise, so long as the office exists—and I believe it will exist for a long time—to intrust such an office in the hands of any other person than a Protestant, and I believe that it could not be done without danger to the interests of the Protestant religion. My hon. and learned Friend mentioned the cases of the Viceroy of India and Canada; but their positions are totally different to that of the Viceroy of Ireland. In one case there is no constitutional Government at all; and the constitutional government in the other is of an entirely different nature and character to that in Ireland. Ireland is an integral part of the United Kingdom, and the Lord Lieutenant performs in great part those duties which are performed in this country by the Sovereign, so that as long as the monarch of this country must be by the Constitution Protestant, so long should the Irish Viceroy be of the same religion. With regard to the second portion of the Bill, however—which relates to the Lord Chancellor—my opinion is different. I own I have never been able to see why the restriction which prevents the Lord Chancellor of Ireland from being a Roman Catholic should be continued, or how the safety of the Established Church can be endangered by its removal. The most important functions which that great officer of the State performs are the ordinary judicial duties of the Chief Equity Judges. Those duties are almost precisely identical with those discharged by other Equity Judges; and, so far as those judicial functions are concerned, when the Lord Justice of Appeal may be a Roman Catholic, and the Master of the Rolls also, I confess I do not see how there can be any danger to the administration of justice, or to the safety of the Protestant religion, from the Lord Chancellor being of the same religion. There are other less important, but still important, duties which the Lord Chancellor has to perform. As a Member of the Government he is to a considerable extent the constitutional and confidential Adviser of the lords-lieutenant; but, so far as matters of a political and administrative character are concerned, and all questions affecting the general policy of Government, I believe the Chief Secretary holds a far more confidential and important position towards the Lord Lieutenant than the Lord Chancellor does. The Chief Secretary is the officer who is responsible to Parliament for every act of the Irish Administration; and I submit to the House that to that extent he holds a far more important position, as one of the confidential and responsible Advisers of the Lord Lieutenant, than the Lord Chancellor. Well, Sir, the Chief Secretary may be a Roman Catholic—he never has been, but there is nothing in the law to prevent it. With regard to an objection which was taken by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), that the Lord Chancellor occasionally performs ex officio some of the duties of the Viceroy in the absence of the Lord Lieutenant, the hon. Gentleman is under a mistake. It is perfectly true that in the absence of the Lord Lieutenant the Chancellor is generally appointed one of the Lords Justices to perform his duties; but it does not necessarily follow that the Lord Chancellor exercises the functions of the Lord Lieutenant in the absence of the latter, for the Government have the power of appointing any person they choose to perform those functions, and instances have occurred, when a Commission for Lords Justices have been issued, that the Lord Chancellor has not been included among the eminent men who have been nominated for that office. The Church patronage at the disposal of the Lord Chancellor may be said to be absolutely nil; and, as it is well to be precise in the matter, I will read an extract from a speech that was delivered on this subject by the right hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) in 1859, and which has never been controverted. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“The Chancellor has not any Church patronage, except in respect of the vicarages of St. Andrew and St. Mark, Dublin, as to which he is joined with the Archbishop of Dublin, the Master of the Rolls, and the three Chief Judges, by an Act of the Irish Parliament.”—[3 Hansard, cliv. 1106.]

Now, it is a remarkable fact that two out of three of those Chief Judges are at present Roman Catholics; if the objection applied at all, it would be as applicable to them as to the Lord Chancellor. As to the other duties which the Lord Chancellor has to perform in connection with the Established Church, it does not appear to me that they are of a very important character, or such as to justify opposition to the proposal of the present Bill. It seems that there is a somewhat quasi-ecclesiastical jurisdiction attached to the office, and it is described by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford in these terms—

“The Chancellor’s ecclesiastical jurisdiction, as representing the Queen, consists in issuing Commissions of Delegates, under the 28 Geo. III. c. 32, and advising as to the issue of Commissions of Review of the decisions of such delegates. As to the former, he is merely ministerial, the sole duty being to choose the Commissioners, who must be Protestants. In deciding as to the issue of a Commission of Review the Chancellor acts judicially on a full hearing of the case in open court.”—[3 Hansard, cliv. 1107.]

I apprehend that if the Bill goes into Committee the hon. and learned Baronet will have to insert a provision that this duty, which I believe has hardly ever been called into exercise, shall be intrusted to other hands than those of the Lord Chancellor in case that office be held by a Roman Catholic. There is another branch of the Lord Chancellor’s duties of scarcely less importance than his judicial functions—namely, the control which he exercises over the magistracy. As the House is well aware, the usual course of appointing magistrates is that gentlemen should be recommended to the Lord Chancellor by the lord-lieutenant of the county. The lords-lieutenant are really the persons who appoint magistrates, and I am happy to say that their recommendations are rarely, if ever departed from. The lords-lieutenant are in many instances Roman Catholics, and though, the party opposite having been so long in power, a great number of the lieutenants hold political opinions different from my own, I am bound to say that their nominations have generally been judicious, and that, though in individual cases objections have arisen, the mode in which their recommendations have been made is, on the whole, satisfactory, and in the interest of the public service. With regard, therefore, to that part of his duty which relates to the appointment of magistrates, the fact of the Lord Chancellor being a Roman Catholic cannot prevent him from adequately discharging it. For the reasons, therefore, that I have given, the House would, I think, do well to entertain the proposal with regard to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and to consent to the second reading of that portion of the Bill. It is not, I may say, a mere sentimental grievance, for I have been told by Roman Catholic gentlemen practising at the Irish Bar, that they feel it a discouragement and a hardship that the highest office in their profession should be closed against them, and I believe that the removal of this restriction will be hailed with satisfaction by many gentlemen of the legal profession who belong to the Roman Catholic religion. With regard to the clause proposing to remove the restriction against Judges and corporate bodies attending Roman Catholic places of worship in their robes of office, and which, to a certain extent, is a sentimental grievance, I profess myself unable to understand why such a restriction was ever imposed. On looking over the debates on the subject, I cannot discover that any reason has been given for it; and the only reason which suggests itself to my mind is that in localities where religious differences prevailed angry feelings might be excited if Roman Catholic gentlemen attended their places of worship in their official costume. I believe, however, that no such feeling exists now in Ireland, and I cannot think that any offence to sincere Protestants would be given by seeing a Roman Catholic official proceeding to his place of worship in his robes of office, which are merely the insignia of authority. Indeed, I think that positive good might result from the removal of the restriction, for it will show that in the eye of the law and of the Sovereign all her subjects and all her servants are equal, and that the Constitution recognises the principle, that in offices of State, Her Majesty can be served with fidelity as well by Roman Catholics as by Protestants. Moreover, there is this further anomaly, that a Roman Catholic general and his whole staff may attend a Roman Catholic place of worship in full uniform, and wearing all the decorations and insignia which he may have won by meritorious services. Now, I can see no great difference in this respect between the robes of a Judge or of a corporate officer and the uniform of a general, or even of the humbler members of the army or the constabulary. The livery of the Queen is seen in every Roman Catholic chapel in Ireland, every Sunday, and if there is no objection to the humblest member of the public service wearing his uniform, the emblem of his authority, on such occasions, there ought to be none to the highest and most distinguished person wearing the robes and insignia of his office under similar circumstances. I think, therefore, the House would not object to the removal of this restriction. With respect to the clause affecting oaths, I believe that before this Bill can pass the Royal Commission, which is now considering this whole question, will make their Report, and that it will be necessary to deal with the whole of that important subject. Though myself a Member of the Commission, I have not been able since I have been in office to attend many of its meetings; but I have been given to understand that the Report will very soon be issued, and I hope that it will be found to deal so satisfactorily with the entire question, that there will be no likelihood of much opposition to the adoption of its recommendations. I should be inclined, therefore, to support the second reading of the Bill if my hon. and learned Friend will promise to re-consider the question as to the Lord Lieutenant. ["No, no!"] My hon. and learned Friend will do well to consider that suggestion, because I believe he will find that there will be great and serious opposition to the measure if he retains that clause, such as may prevent the passing of the Bill at all, and will, at all events, give rise to protracted debate.

Moreover, though the proposal as regarded the Lord Chancellor has been made once, if not twice, before, that referring to the Lord Lieutenant has not been brought forward on any previous occasion. If therefore the hon. and learned Gentleman will give some expression of feeling as to his opinion on that point I shall unhesitatingly give my vote, as an individual Member of the Government, in favour of the second reading of the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I cannot but congratulate the noble Lord on the general tenor of the speech he has just delivered. We have certainly made a very great advance since this subject was discussed in the year 1859; and the speech of the noble Lord was, I think, so satisfactory in most of the propositions which it contained, and in particular was so just in the principles which it laid down—and which in my opinion are not one whit less applicable to that which he reserved and refused than to that which he conceded—that I propose to meet the appeal which he made to my hon. and learned Friend with a counter appeal. He asked my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) for a concession which, I am afraid, my hon. and learned Friend cannot make: he asked him to declare that he is ready to drop from his Bill that provision which relates to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. But I must appeal to the noble Lord to consider further the scope and breadth of the principles which he himself has laid down; and if he will only consider them in the candid spirit in which he approached the general question I feel sure that, instead of asking my hon. and learned Friend to withdraw that proposition, he will himself be obliged to support it. Let us consider what those principles are. The noble Lord said—and said with the greatest justice—that the securities, or the so-called securities, inserted in the Act of 1829 ought to be viewed in the light afforded by subsequent experience and according to the exigencies of the present day; differing entirely in that respect from the hon. Gentleman who, in the year 1859 represented, always in the most courteous manner, the opinion which then appeared to prevail—I mean the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of State for the Home Department—who declared that in his belief there could be no peace or union in Ireland unless it was clearly and definitely understood that all the securities of the Act of 1829 were to be maintained. We are now entirely agreed with the noble Lord, who appears, I presume, upon this occasion as the organ of the Government, with respect to the principle on which the securities are to be reviewed. Now the most important portion of this measure deals with two functions, and I contend that every material consideration which is applicable to one of them is equally applicable to the other. The fair general description of both of them, it appears, is this—that they are offices whose main and leading purposes are strictly civil, but that there are attached to them certain incidents, more or less important, which are of an ecclesiastical character. Well, if no special provision was made upon that subject it would be a fair objection to the measure of my hon. and learned Friend to say that he was about to intrust to hands that were not fitted for such a task the discharge of functions that are more or less of an ecclesiastical character. But my hon. and learned Friend completely meets that objection by providing that of those ecclesiastical functions those personages, if they be Roman Catholics, shall by law be absolutely divested: and that is the principle on which the law has proceeded in other cases of an analogous description. Why do we allow the Secretary of State for the Home Department to be a Roman Catholic? The Secretary of State for the Home Department exercises ecclesiastical functions, and he exercises them even, according to the established usage of the State, as a matter of business in his Department, and without reference to the Crown. In the ordinary discharge of his duties, and without reference to the Crown, he makes numerous appointments to benefices in the Established Church of Scotland. But in that case it is provided by law that if the Secretary of State for the Home Department shall be a Roman Catholic he shall not exercise that ecclesiastical function; and that is the very same principle which my hon. and learned Friend proposes to apply to the case of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. The noble Lord, in the case of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, accepts that provision as satisfactory. Now, what I want particularly to know from the noble Lord is this—why is that provision which is satisfactory in the case of the Secretary of State for the Home Department and satisfactory in the case of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland not satisfactory in the case of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland? But the noble Lord stated pleas which, as he stated them, I have no doubt he thinks are reasons—although I should otherwise have thought that, with his acuteness of mind and liberal temper, he would have seen what I must, with every respect for him, call their shallowness and narrowness. What are the reasons, according to the noble Lord, why the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland should be regarded as one of the distinguished offices to which a Roman Catholic could not legitimately aspire? One of those reasons was, that the retention of this clause in the Bill would give rise to much debate and much dissatisfaction. But we sit here for the purpose of sifting those questions, and bringing mere feelings, mere instincts, mere prejudices to the bar of reason; and if it should be shown that there is no sound or satisfactory ground for treating this office as an exception, or for stopping short in the application of a principle now consecrated by the adhesion of all parties with respect to the disposal of civil offices—if it should be shown that there is no ground for our so stopping short—then, I say, that the very confidence which our constituents repose in us requires us to go fearlessly forward, and to do that which is reasonable in itself, trusting to the good sense of the people of England to recognise the wisdom of our conclusions. But the noble Lord gave other reasons, founded, as he thinks, not on the feelings of men, but on their intelligence. Now what are those reasons? They are two-fold. In the first place, he says that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland has a certain amount of ecclesiastical patronage; and secondly, he observes that the Lord Lieutenant exercises a delegated power from the Crown in a way and in a degree that does not apply to the Viceroy of Canada or of India. But the first of these reasons is, as it seems to me, absolutely disposed of by the clause inserted in the Bill of my hon. and learned Friend, by which it is provided that no ecclesiastical patronage shall be exercised by the Lord Lieutenant in case he should be a Roman Catholic. The noble Lord, however, appears to think that there is something extraordinary in the nature of the powers delegated by the Crown to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and he gives a reason why, in his opinion, there is no parallel between the case of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Viceroy of India and Canada—that reason being that in the case of Canada there is a constitution, and in the case of India there is no constitution.

Mr. Gladstone

LORD NAAS: I said there is in Canada a different constitution from that of Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not see which of these reasons it is that bears upon the case in such a manner as to bias the judgment of the noble Lord. But let us grapple with this question of the power delegated by the Crown to the Lord Lieutenant. The noble Lord spoke as if there were some mysterious relations between the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Crown of this country, apart from the general machinery of our Constitutional Government. Now, if it were true that the Lord Lieutenant had some relation to the Crown outside of that machinery, and not subject to its control, then I could grant that the noble Lord might perhaps be able to establish some connection between the Protestant character of the Sovereign and the Protestant character of the Irish Lord Lieutenant. But is it true that that is the position of the Lord Lieutenant? Let us divest him of that robe of mystery which the noble Lord has cast around him. The Lord Lieutenant is nothing more or less than one of the numerous wheels of Government, subject to the same impulsion and the same control as the other wheels in our Constitutional system. He is not an independent agent acting apart, untrammelled by responsibility to Parliament or by the directions he may receive from the Cabinet. But more than that; who is the man in the Cabinet whose duty it is as the organ of the Government to direct the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. Why, it is the Secretary of State for the Home Department—it is the very man who holds that very office which is at this moment open to the just ambition of Roman Catholics; and the law as it now stands, while it prohibits a Roman Catholic from attaining to the office of Lord Lieutenant permits a Roman Catholic to hold the office which would make him in a political sense the master of the Lord Lieutenant. Now, if that be the case—and it is impossible to dispute the fact—am I not justified in retorting on the noble Lord the appeal which he addressed to my hon. and learned Friend? He accepts the proposal to separate the ecclesiastical functions from the Lord Chancellorship as a satisfactory solution, and he is bound by his own principle to accept it in the case of the Lord Lieutenancy. He speaks of the power delegated by the Crown to the Lord Lieutenant as a reason why the Lord Lieutenant should be a Roman Catholic ; and I ask him for an answer to my argument when I point out that there is not one of these delegated powers that is not subject to the direction and control of the Executive Government—of the Cabinet at home—exercised through the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the only Minister who is officially entitled to direct the Lord Lieutenant, and who himself may be a Roman Catholic. And surely it cannot be consonant to reason—it must be a mere tribute to prejudice and nothing else—to hold a proposition so paradoxical as that, while we permit a Minister to be a Roman Catholic, we should pretend that some sacred constitutional principle forbids us to allow the same privilege, the same openness of access, to an office which, in a political sense, may strictly be designated a subordinate office, however dignified it may be. These are the grounds of my appeal to the noble Lord ; I make it seriously and earnestly, because I think that the general tone of his speech warrants it. I must say, however, that whatever may be the answer of the noble Lord to that appeal, I do not think that my hon. and learned Friend would be justified in withdrawing this provision from the Bill. I am not prepared to stand in the face of the people of Ireland, of whom the vast majority belong to the Roman Catholic religion, and impose on the professors of that religion any disability which I am not able to justify, and which I cannot maintain by strong and cogent reasons. There are, in my opinion, no such reasons in the case we have now before us. The noble Lord, who was so well qualified to show them, if they could be shown, has adduced no such argument. The principles which he laid down are the principles on which this question ought to be handled, and those principles are fatal to the unworthy application of them which he has been led to make in this particular instance.

MR. WHALLEY said, he protested against the religion and Constitution of England being subjected to these annual attacks ; for he believed there was something in the Constitution of this country which it was not competent to Parliament to disturb, except under the pressure of some great emergency, such as that which arose in the year 1688, and which ended in the establishment of the House of Hanover on the throne. He would not presume to argue the question with the right

hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House (Mr. Gladstone), who was so great a master of the art of rhetoric, and who displayed an ingenuity and an eloquence such as had never before, perhaps, been used for the purpose of deceiving and misleading Parliament. But he (Mr. Whalley) felt it his duty to protest against those continual concessions to that foreign Power, the Roman hierarchy, and against the transfer of his allegiance by Parliament to any foreign Power. In conjunction with others he had sanctioned an attempt, to enlighten the people of England on the effects of granting £1,000,000 per annum for the propagation of Romish doctrines ; but they had been met by a counter organization of priests, and their meetings were interrupted and put down by clamour and violence. It had been stated in that House that his mission was to make Protestantism ridiculous. Now, he accepted that mission, and he should more than succeed in all that he aimed at if that should prove to be so. For what could be more ridiculous than that a Protestant assembly should vote £1,000,000 a year to promote Popery, and still further exhibit itself in thus preventing even the discussion of such a question as this. It seemed to him that when the House was asked to make another concession in favour of the Papacy, it was a fitting time to take occasion to meet the challenge thrown out to him to prove the assertion which he made on a former occasion—namely, that Fenianism had been originated, organized, and entirely sustained by the Roman Catholic priesthood. ["Order !" and "Question !"]

MR. SPEAKER : After the terms in which Fenianism has been described by this House, "a conspiracy adverse alike to authority, property, and religion, and condemned alike by all who are interested in their maintenance," for an hon. Gentleman to say that the Roman Catholic clergy are the originators of Fenianism is a statement which cannot but be offensive to this House, and cannot be permitted to pass.

MR. WHALLEY said, he bowed to the decision of the Chair, in declaring—no doubt with perfect propriety—that the line of argument he was pursuing was not in order. There was another way which would be equally serviceable to him for the purpose of exhibiting what he desired to make plain. He would ask the House whether they did not consider that this country was rendered ridiculous in the eyes of all other nations which contemplated their proceedings with regard to those matters of Irish disaffection, when the people of those countries read such letters as one that had appeared in what is called "the leading journal" of England. That letter which he had cut out of The Times was written by Mr. John Healy, parish priest of Cahirciveen, and this was the statement which that clergyman made in exculpation of his co-religionists from the imputation of being connected with Fenianism ["Order!"] :—

 "Is it necessary to mention that during the twenty-one years I have had the charge—

MR. BAXTER: Sir, I rise to order. I wish to put it to you whether such observations as these have any reference whatever to the subject of our deliberations?

MR. SPEAKER: I cannot restrain the fair limits of discussion. A good deal has been said by the hon. Member which is totally irrelevant to the topic under discussion; but I cannot say that his present observations are irrelevant.

MR. WHALLEY: As he was saying, this was the statement made by the parish priest of the place he had referred to—

"Is it necessary to mention that during the twenty-one years I have had the charge of this parish the people never heard from the altar any other doctrines proclaimed but those of peace and obedience to the civil authorities such as have been inculcated by our Church in every age?"

That was so gross an insult to the common sense and to the knowledge of all mankind, and was so different to the actual conduct of the Roman Catholic Church, especially in reference to Irish affairs, that he maintained the time had come for the House and the country at large to rouse themselves as to the relations between themselves and the hierarchy of which he was speaking. He had had some acquaintance with this parish of Cahirciveen. On one occasion he was present and heard a priest deliver a sermon. He had been in Ireland during the famine of 1847, and along with many other gentlemen had exposed his life; and was happy to say (seeing he had so often been accused of being inimical to the rights of Roman Catholics) that he had received a testimonial on the occasion for having done more to mitigate the famine and fever that prevailed than any other Englishman. Returning home from his labours he passed through the village of Cahirciveen, and there entered the Roman Catholic Chapel. He was not aware whether the priest, who was in the place then, was the same as wrote to The Times the other day; but apart from that, he heard him declare, in the course of his sermon to the people, that of all the outrages, wrongs, and insults which England had ever perpetrated against Ireland, the grossest she had ever attempted was to bribe Ireland to surrender her undying sense of wrong and to endeavour to make her sell this for the mess of pottage which those who had been labouring for the alleviation of distress during the time of famine had offered. That was the return which they had received on that occasion for their attempts to conciliate Ireland. What, then, was to be thought of the statement of Mr. Healy—that nothing but peace and goodwill had been preached in his parish? Facts like these were important at the present time when they found the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland saying that he did not require to add a word to the curse which had been pronounced against Fenianism by Bishop Moriarty. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is referring to a speech of the present Session, which, according to the rules of the House, is out of order.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had some more remarks to make upon this topic; but, considering what had been said from the Chair, he would not intrude them. Proceeding to the general subject, he argued that, considering all that had lately transpired in Ireland, there was as strong reason as ever for preserving the safeguards and protections against the encroachments of Romanism, which were considered so necessary at the time of the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act. To show what need there was that the hierarchy to which he was referring should be watched, he would quote a few sentences from a book entitled The Letters of Runnymede, in which were expressed the opinions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. ["Order!"] In that book the right hon. Gentleman said that Roman Catholicism

"Was a power before which the proudest conqueror has grown pale, and by which nations the most devoted to freedom have become enslaved. . . . The Papacy is as rampant now in Ireland as it was in Europe in the time of Gregory, and all its energies are put forth for our humiliation."

[The House, which had for some time evidenced a desire for a division, now became so impatient that the hon. Member's further remarks were only occasionally heard.]

MR. PIM, who also rose amid loud cries of "Divide!" said, that both as an Irishman and a Protestant, he had listened to the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland with much satisfaction, and he had no doubt that it would give satisfaction both to the Catholics and a large portion of the Protestants. He himself was extremely desirous for perfect equality among the people of Ireland. He believed, moreover, that a large portion of the Protestants were willing to get rid of their Protestant ascendancy, and to have the people placed upon one level.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON) said, he could not give a silent vote upon this occasion, because he entertained a strong feeling that this Bill should not be read a second time. He quite concurred with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (MR. ROEBUCK) that discussions of this kind were, if possible, to be avoided; and he was the more unwilling to speak upon this question, as he had to go beyond the opinion expressed on the subject by the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland. He (the Solicitor General) could not, consistently with his own feelings on the subject, avoid protesting against the reading of a Bill a second time which would throw open the offices of Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor. He would, however, be sorry to resist that part of the measure which did away with the prohibition of officials attending places of worship with the insignia, or in the costume of their office. He felt further bound to protest against the second reading of the Bill, because he was convinced it would be highly inexpedient to open up the solemn compact entered into in 1829; and if, on some future occasion, there should be a revulsion of feeling in this country, in an opposite direction to that taken by the House in 1829, those who now wished to re-open the compact would have to thank themselves for what might occur. He should be sorry to see the question re-opened in any way calculated to prejudice the existing rights of the Roman Catholic population. He desired that his Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen should enjoy free and equal rights with the Protestants, and he was ready to admit Roman Catholics to all places under the Crown, except those reserved by the Act of 1829. That Act worked well. At present there were fourteen Judges in the superior courts in Ireland, and eight of those Judges professed the Roman Catholic religion. One of the first fruits of the measure was to place on the bench of Ireland the father of the hon. and learned Gentleman who brought in this Bill—Sir Michael O'Loughlen—a Judge whose impartiality and integrity had not been exceeded by any man who had ever graced the judicial bench—and he rejoiced at the opportunity which that Act afforded of placing such a man on the bench; and he had not a word to say against any gentleman who since that period had been raised to the Irish judicial bench, nor did he doubt in the slightest degree the integrity and loyalty of his Roman Catholic countrymen in Ireland. But there were other grave considerations, which should be weighed before the settlement of 1829 was broken through. The Act of 1829 was framed by men of great wisdom and experience, and they restricted the appointments within the present bounds. And why were these particular cases excepted? Because the office of Lord Lieutenant was one nearly connected with the Sovereign of these Realms, who, by the Act of Settlement, must necessarily be a Protestant. The Lord Lieutenant of Ireland was not merely a delegate of the Home Office, he was the representative of the Sovereign. The Lord Lieutenant possessed a great amount of Church patronage, which the Lord Chancellor did not; and therefore, he admitted, the reasons for insisting that the Lord Lieutenant should be Protestant were greater than those for restricting the office of Lord Chancellor to Protestants. But the holders of that office in England and Ireland were more closely connected with the Crown by the theory of the Constitution than any other Member of the Government, and hence, in their wisdom, the framers of the Bill of 1829 provided that the holder of it must be a Protestant. He hoped that no outcry would induce Parliament to re-open the great compact which had been then entered into. He expressed this opinion with great reluctance and difficulty; but he should not have discharged his duty if he had not recorded his opinion against all the proposed changes, except as regarded the permission to Roman Catholic civil functionaries to attend their own places of worship in their robes of office.

MR. LAWSON said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken was, like himself, a Protestant member of the bar of Ireland; and he confessed he was struck with astonishment and surprise that a person who pleaded at the same bar with his Roman Catholic brethren should advocate in that House the continuance of their exclusion from the highest honour of the profession. Within the last few days there had been some peculiar revelations of the differences between the Members of the Executive Government, but none exceeded the revelations of that evening in singularity. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had dissented from one provision only of the Bill, and had given the remainder his assent; while the hon. and learned Gentleman, in direct opposition to his Chief, dissented from the whole Bill, except one fragmentary portion which the hon. and learned Gentleman thought might be conceded without infringing on the prejudices which he represents, and that was that a Mayor might appear, on certain public occasions, in the insignia of his office. The Bill of his hon. and learned Friend (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) proposed to throw open to Roman Catholics the offices of Lord Lieutenant, the Chancellorship, and to remove an absurd restriction upon municipal and judicial officers. The hon. and learned Solicitor General would lop off the two first, and leave the Bill a miserable remnant of legislation. But the Solicitor General had really furnished a most powerful argument against himself, for he referred to the revered name of Sir Michael O'Loughlen, and said that he was an ornament to the Bench as Master of the Rolls, yet he could not have been elevated to the Lord Chancellorship—an object of legitimate ambition to those who practised at the bar. His colleagues at the Irish bar almost unanimously repudiated this as an unjust exclusion, and maintained that there was no reason why the highest posts in the kingdom should not be as open to their Roman Catholic brethren as to Protestants. With respect to the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had so completely disposed of the argument of the opponents of the Bill that he need not touch upon it.

MR. VANCE said, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Lawson) had made allusion to some trifling difference on the Ministerial Bench as to portions of the Bill before the House, but he forgot that such differences of opinion were not peculiar to the present Administration. There was, then, a difference of opinion, not of degree, but of essence. In this case he thought there should be a right of private judgment, without hon. Gentlemen being subjected to the censorious observations of their opponents. The argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, that there was no danger in permitting the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to be filled by a Roman Catholic, would apply equally to the succession to the Crown. The Lord Lieutenant was clothed with regal power; he exercised all the patronage of the kingdom; and was the real head of the Church in Ireland. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) said that toleration was the offspring of intelligence and education. Now, he believed that the Sovereign Pontiff was a highly educated and intelligent person; but with all his intelligence the Pope would not allow the Presbyterians to hold their unostentatious meetings in Rome. He (Mr. Vance) agreed that it was more essential to have the Lord Lieutenant a Protestant than a Lord Chancellor, but he would not give up the point in either case. Whatever might be the result of the division, he was satisfied the House would not permit the Bill to pass into a law. In Committee an Amendment would be proposed to make it indispensable that a Lord Lieutenant should be a Protestant, and he believed such Amendment would be carried.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(Mr. Lawson, Mr. Sullivan.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LAWSON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, its object was to remove another of those disabilities of which the Roman Catholics in Ireland had so much reason to complain. The Bill proposed to throw open the three Professorships of Anatomy and Surgery, Chymistry, and Botany in Trinity College to all persons, without reference to their religious creed. Those Professorships were, he said, founded in 1785, and Roman Catholics were precluded from holding any one of them—a restriction which had been continued up to the present day, when he supposed the most bigoted opponent of that faith would not contend that the religious element ought to enter into any man's mind in the selection of a teacher of those abstract sciences. A Commission, he might add, which sat in 1833, and of which the late Archbishop Whately was a member, recommended the removal of the statutory disability in question; but, although many able men had since then sat in that House as Members for the University, not one of them had proposed to legislate in accordance with that recommendation. The Solicitor General for Ireland, it appeared, had elsewhere found great fault with him for bringing the subject before the House, and seemed to think that the case was one in which no Parliamentary intervention was required; but he would scarcely, he thought, in his place in that assembly, venture to contend that these restrictions ought to be any longer maintained. He had simply to state, further, that he had been in communication with the Queen's Colleges, and the College of Physicians in Ireland, and that they offered no opposition to the Bill, but had made suggestions for its further improvement, which might be introduced in Committee with great advantage.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Lawson.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) regretted that the right hon. Gentleman had not taken the trouble to inform himself accurately as to what had fallen from him on the occasion to which he alluded. What he really did say was that the University of Dublin, which he had the honour to represent, had been charged with being a sectarian institution, but that it was in reality no such thing. He had then adverted to the Bill of which the right hon. Gentleman had just given notice, and referred to the Report of the Commission of 1853—the right hon. Gentleman was in error in giving the date as 1833—to show that that Report had been transmitted by Lord Palmerston, who was at the time Home Secretary, to the governing body of Trinity College, and that they, on the 28th of June, 1853, had, through the Registrar, who was the organ of the Board, addressed a letter to the Primate of Ireland for the purpose of transmission to the Home Office, in which they stated that, with one or two exceptions, not connected with the present proposal, they gave their unqualified assent to those recommendations which the right hon. Gentleman now made it a merit that he asked the House to adopt. The right hon. Gentleman, too, taunted the Members who had sat for the University for some years past with not having dealt with the subject; but why, he should like to know, was it that he himself had omitted to do so during the time he occupied a seat on the Treasury Bench? As for the Bill itself, believing that it involved no question of principle or compact, he was prepared to give it his support, for he quite concurred with the hon. and learned Gentleman that distinctions between different classes and creeds, when no such question was at issue, ought, if possible, to be dispensed with. He should be happy, in every case in which considerations of religious principle were not involved, to see Roman Catholics placed in exactly the same position with those who held his own creed.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that this was a great day for concessions, and would ever be a memorable ecclesiastical Wednesday in the history of Ireland. He was delighted to find that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken had assented to the second reading of the Bill, although he was unable to screw his courage up to vote in favour of the last measure which was under the consideration of the House. Owing to the operation of custom, or rather of inveterate prejudice, there was scarcely such a thing as a professional post of honour or emolument which a Roman Catholic gentleman who devoted himself to scientific pursuits could hope to fill in Ireland; and it was therefore with the greatest pleasure he heard that the Board of Trinity College were willing to have those Professorships thrown open.

MR. LEFROY said, that the Board of Trinity College gave their entire concurrence to the proposal for opening their Professorships. One of the chief recommendations in the Report of the Commission was the removal of all religious disqualifications as to Professorships. He believed that the Bill might be amended in Committee, and that it would prove an effective and useful measure.

(Mr. Goldney, Mr. Leeman, Mr. Powell.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GOLDNEY, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that its purpose was to enable married women to part with their right of property in land without the expense and inconvenience entailed upon them by the present law. Previous to 1834, when the recommendations of the Real Property Commissioners were carried into effect by the passing of the Fines and Recoveries Act, the mode of barring an entail and the mode by which a married woman could dispose of her interest in property were by aid of certain legal fictions, the great inconvenience of which was the expense by which it was attended. Since 1834, however, under the operation of an Act passed in that year for the abolition of fines and recoveries, an entail might be barred by deed, and a married woman might dispose of her real property by deed, to be acknowledged by her as her free and voluntary act before two Commissioners, and such Commissioners were to return to the Court of Common Pleas a certificate of such acknowledgment, which was to be filed. In another Act, the 17 & 18 Vict., further provisions were made with regard to the acknowledgment of deeds by married women; and there was also a subsequent Act, which enabled them to dispose by deed of certain reversionary interests in personal estate; but the requirements of these Acts contributed to render what was a very simple matter a very cumbrous proceeding in practice. The result was, that owing to the number of acknowledgments which were rendered necessary, it had actually, since 1834, cost married women no less a sum than £1,500,000 for what he could not help designating a very unnecessary piece of machinery. In the Bill before the House he sought, as far as possible, to do away with a great portion of the expense of these acknowledgments. He proposed that instead of there being two Commissions of married women in each case there should be only one, who should be disinterested and altogether unconnected with the property. He also proposed that the acknowledgment of married women should not necessarily be accompanied by separate certificates and affidavits, but should be simply indorsed on the deed of conveyance itself. Another inconvenience he proposed to remedy. A large emigration took place from this country to India, New Zealand, and other places, and numbers of persons who possessed property in this country found it desirable to remain in the colonies. At present, when they wished to dispose of such property they sent home instructions with a power of attorney; but instead of the agent being able to transmit the proceeds of the sale, it was necessary to prove that the person granting the power of attorney was alive at the time the deed was executed in this country. In that way a further delay of eight or ten months took place. He proposed, therefore, that there should be no longer a necessity for a further certificate as to the person being alive at the time of the execution of the deed in this country. The Incorporated Law Society had expressed their entire approval of the principle of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Goldney.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL would not oppose the Bill, but he thought it would be necessary to consider it carefully in Committee. The Bill proposed that the examination should be taken by Commissioners appointed to administer oaths, and he feared it would then grow into a mere formality; whereas now the Commissioners really did examine married women and made them acquainted with the interest they were parting with—so that by the new arrangement the merit of the system would be lost. If it was considered that the fees were at present too high the proper plan would be to reduce them.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

(Mr. Leeman, Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie, Mr. Goldney.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. LEEMAN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that he would in the first place remind the House that last year he brought in a similar Bill, which, however, applied to all joint-stock companies; but that upon the suggestion of the hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Fildes) he consented to limit its operations to banking companies, and the Bill now before the House was limited in the same way. The broad ground upon which he asked the House to legislate in the matter was that bank shares, being themselves the creation of Parliament, having attached to them by Parliament various onerous conditions, and having no existence other than that which Parliament had given them, the House would, if it found that circumstances had occurred which rendered it necessary to protect the shareholders in these companies, afford them that protection with the same readiness as it imposed the conditions. The Acts under which joint-stock banks now existed dated back to 1826. By the Act of that year the proprietors were subjected to liabilities extending over three years after they had ceased to be members of the company. In 1844, it appeared to Sir Robert Peel to be desirable for the public interests that further restrictions should be imposed, and it was accordingly determined that there should be a registration and publication of the names of all proprietors of joint-stock banks. Since that time many new joint-stock banks had been established, and there were now 120 such banks in England, and twenty-five in Scotland and Ireland. The shareholders in these concerns constituted a very large portion of the middle classes of the country. In 1866 there were no less than 51,000 persons in England and Wales registered as the holders of shares in joint-stock banks, and this number included persons in every grade of life. These persons had, for the most part, become shareholders not as mere speculators, but with a view to a safe and permanent investment, and they were the persons contemplated by Sir Robert Peel as affording to the public a substantial guarantee for the debts of the companies. The Stock Exchange of London was a self-constituted confederation of brokers and parties who took upon themselves the conduct of the transfer of shares in various companies, and they put out the daily list which formed the barometer which marked the fluctuation in the value of shares from day to day. The Stock Exchange was composed of many highly honourable men, who had conducted the business with honour and credit; but there were persons upon the Stock Exchange who, during last year, permitted themselves to be parties to transactions which brought ruin upon hundreds of innocent persons who held shares in various banks. It was a matter of notoriety that millions of stock were made the subject of pretended sale from A to B, which actually did not result in half-a-dozen registered transfers; and these transactions were carried on by persons not possessing a single share in the company the shares of which they professed to sell. It was found that on one single day there was no less than sixty-four different joint-stock companies, in which persons who had contracted to purchase shares gave notice to "buy in" against the person who had professed to sell. A having entered into a contract with B to sell what he did not possess, sufficiently alarmed those who did hold shares to induce them to part with them; and this was nothing less, in his opinion, than a swindling transaction. He did not doubt that the House would endeavour by some mode to put an end to such a state of things. The first thing done by these freebooters—as they had been correctly termed by the public press—was, immediately after having entered into a contract of this kind, to take means to depreciate the stock of which they professed to make a sale. With regard to two or three banks the shares went down; but no particular injury was done to the general public. This course of proceeding was carried forward against some of the most stable companies in the country. One mode of operation was to send anonymous letters to the depositors to induce them to withdraw their deposits, and they also sent anonymous letters to shareholders in different parts of the country advising them to draw out or sell. In the case of one of the soundest banks in the metropolis a large number of letters of this class were sent to shareholders in the country, all of which were in the same handwriting, and all to the same effect—namely, "Sell bank shares at once. From a Friend, June, 1866." These were sent to almost every county where the bank had shareholders; and the same system had been carried on with regard to other banks. The effect of these letters was to induce many timid persons to part with their shares at prices far short of their true value, and to bring an irreparable loss upon a great number of shareholders. The whole press of England denounced the system, and the Committee of the Stock Exchange was called upon to take some course which would put an end to such proceedings. A large number of members of the Stock Exchange united in requesting the Committee to adopt some means for the prevention of the evil; and the Committee, which consisted of thirty members, met for the purpose, but came to a resolution, by fifteen to twelve, that it was not expedient to make any alteration in the mode of dealing with joint-stock shares. A number of gentlemen, well known in the City, were so dissatisfied with this result that they presented another memorial, and again the matter was discussed, and the former decision was confirmed, with the slight alteration that instead of ten days for giving the name, the time should in future be seven. A man professing to sell shares on the Exchange by sale note had till the next settling day, a period of fourteen days, before any other step could be taken, and he was entitled to ask for another ten days before handing over the name of the purchaser; so that he had twenty-four days for his operations, and in the interval he sent forth letters of the character already described. The alteration made by the Stock Exchange would be no alleviation whatever of the evil. The Committee of the Stock Exchange were asked to make a by-law by which it should be incumbent upon the seller when he signed the sale note to give the broker the numbers of the shares which he contracted to sell; and in his opinion nothing could be more reasonable than such a condition. There would be no difficulty whatever in complying with it. At Liverpool the brokers, departing from the course pursued by the London Stock Exchange, had refused to sell any shares of a joint-stock bank unless the seller gave them the numbers. In France a purchaser could call upon the seller for the stock immediately. [A MEMBER: So he can here.] If anyone had called upon these pretended sellers for the stock, there would have been instantly an end to the transaction. The Stock Exchange had assumed to itself the power of making by-laws and regulations which as customs had the force of law; but they had refused to interfere in this case, and it was only by the interposition of Parliament on the part of bona fide proprietors of banks that it was possible to put an end to the abuse to which he referred. For this reason he proposed that all contracts for the sale or transfer of shares in joint-stock banks should be void unless such contract should be in writing, and should set forth and designate the stock or shares by the numbers by which they were distinguished in the books of the company. The panic of which these persons took advantage had passed away; but another might come, and the present, therefore, was a favourable moment for careful legislation on the subject. He was surprised that his measure was to be opposed, and particularly that its rejection was to be moved by the Gentleman who last year proposed to limit it as it was now limited—namely, to joint-stock banking companies. He did not think anyone would venture in that place to contend that there was no difference between a bank share and any other article with regard to which time-bargains were customary, and he was sure that if shareholders in banks were to continue under the obligations which Parliament had imposed upon them, the House would not refuse them the protection which they required.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Leeman.)

MR. FILDES moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. His assent to the second reading of the Bill of last Session ought not to preclude him from opposing it now, and further experience and thought upon the subject had brought him to the conclusion that this Bill would be rather adverse to the interests of shareholders than in their favour. The fact that all the letters to which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Leeman) had referred were in one handwriting, proved that the evil complained of was not the result of a wide-spread conspiracy; and he believed that if this Bill passed it would render the shares of joint-stock banks less current in the market, and diminish their value as a marketable commodity. It was, in fact, a re-enactment of Sir John Barnard's Act, which, while it remained on the statute book, was wholly inoperative, while it afforded a convenient shelter for rogues to avoid their contracts under, and it was accordingly repealed in 1860 by an Act brought in by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. Sir John Barnard's Act simply rendered all transaction in the nature of time bargains void, whereas the present Bill made any persons entering into such transactions guilty of misdemeanour, and punishable accordingly. If it were to be laid down that selling that which the vendor did not possess was a misdemeanour, of what nature were the advertisements inserted in the daily papers by the Admiralty, asking persons to send in tenders for the supply of beef, &c., for the use of the army or navy? It could scarcely be supposed by the authorities at the Admiralty that the persons who sent in such tenders were in actual possession of the goods they undertook to sell, and yet it would be most unfair to stigmatize them as swindlers. He would recommend the House to consider most carefully before they legislated upon a subject like this. The freer the market was, the better it would be for both vendors and purchasers; and in the interests of the public, and on the ground that every prohibitory principle in the making of contracts was bad in itself, he would ask the House to read the Bill a second time this day six months.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK, in seconding the Amendment, opposed the measure on the broad ground that the less legislative interference there was with trade, the better it would be for the interests of the public. Did hon. Members think that the public would have been benefited by the bolstering up of the unsound institutions that fell to the ground last year? Most of the establishments that stopped during the panic had lost all their paid-up capital, and were trading upon credit, and when that credit failed, they fell to the ground as a matter of course, and any legislative interference that might have propped them up for a short time longer, would have inflicted additional injury upon the country. He saw no reason why he should not purchase a cargo of wheat which had not yet arrived, nor why he should not be at liberty to sell that cargo before it had actually come into his possession, or why he should not sell even that which he had not yet bought, if he liked to take the risk of the market. The best precautions against the conspiracies which the Bill was intended to meet, were for people not to put their money into establishments of which they knew nothing, and for bankers to keep their capital within reach by investing it in convertible securities. By good management bankers could defy all the "bears" of the Stock Exchange.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Fildes.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. GOLDNEY thought that the Legislature having interfered with trade to the extent of rendering shareholders in unlimited joint-stock companies liable for three years after they had disposed of their shares, and also compelled that there should be a registration of shareholders, it should now further interfere to protect the property of those shareholders from being unwarrantably depreciated by unprincipled speculators. Under the present law the stockbrokers might deal with the shares of any company to any extent, without rendering themselves liable to any of the company's debts, and without relieving the shareholders of any liability to the public. Sir John Barnard's Act applied to the public stocks, and not to shares.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that Sir John Barnard's Act prohibited time bargains as pernicious things; but it was found impossible to put its provisions in force, and time bargains continued to be made as freely as though the Legislature had never prohibited them. This should teach the House that legislation of this description must be inefficacious, and if the present Bill were agreed to the result would be the same. If shareholders were so silly as to be frightened by anonymous letters into disposing of their shares at low prices, they must take the consequences. The real and only proper protection for the public must be found in investing their money in concerns that were known to be honestly conducted, as in the absence of this unreasonable panics must always occur.

MR. PIM thought that the operation of the Bill should be extended to Ireland.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS thought that the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) was mistaken when he said that shareholders in unlimited companies were liable for three years after they had got rid of their shares. He believed their liability ceased at the end of the first year. Perhaps the Solicitor General would give the House some information upon this point.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL was not able to answer the hon. Member's question off-hand; but believed that the liability of the shareholders in unlimited companies ceased one year after they got rid of their shares.

MR. NEATE moved the adjournment of the debate until Tuesday next. The hon. Member who had introduced the Bill had been somewhat taken by surprise by the objections that had been raised to the Bill, and that it was desirable that a question of such importance should be further discussed before the House pronounced an opinion upon it.

MR. WALPOLE also thought that a postponement was desirable.

Debate adjourned till Tuesday next.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, February 28, 1867.

(NO. 12.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, it had been communicated to him that several noble Lords connected with Scotland desired that the second reading of the Bill, which stood appointed for that evening, should be postponed until after the 30th April. Consequently, he was disposed to acquiesce, considering that it was the general wish of the noble Lords that this course should be adopted. But he was now told that this was not the case, and that the general desire was against postponement. If that were so, he should go on with the Bill to-morrow, when he should be better prepared than at present to move the second reading.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he was not one of those who desired that the Bill should be postponed, but of those who look upon the measure as a very useful one, and one that would conduce considerably to allay the agitation that existed upon the subject in Scotland. He trusted, therefore, that instead of postponing the second reading, the noble and learned Lord would proceed with the Bill in due course.

THE EARL OF SELKIRK said, he was extremely anxious that this Bill, the principle of which he did not hesitate to say he was strongly opposed to, should be put off until after the 30th April. He did not desire postponement because he thought there was anything in the measure that could not, if necessary, be now discussed, and he should be prepared to go into the merits of the Bill to-morrow, but in order that the landed proprietors and tenants in Scotland might be able to consider and express their opinion on the measure. It was not on account of any effects which the measure might have on the interests of the landlord that he opposed this Bill—it would not affect their interests in the smallest degree. It was because its provisions would compel the landlords to use such an amount of stringency as to the time of collecting their rents, as would be most embarrassing to the small farmers. The large farmers were much more in the habit of expressing their opinions than the small farmers, and had better opportunities of doing so; and as it was supposed that the Bill was framed in the interests of the large farmers, rather than in those of the small ones—which he certainly believed—he thought the latter ought to have ample time to know what the measure was, and to make their views known upon it. The Bill would greatly affect the cattle breeders and feeders of the West of Scotland, and on their behalf he asked for the postponement of the second reading until the month of May; but if the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack thought it right to go on with the Bill to-morrow, he should be quite prepared to state his objections to the measure.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that from what was said to him by several of his noble Friends, he thought there was a general desire to postpone the second reading; and therefore he did not come down that evening prepared to move the Bill forward that stage; but, as he found that this was not the general wish, he would move the second reading to-morrow.

Second Reading put off till To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

Report—Duty on Dogs [36]; Dublin University Professorships * [10-59].

Considered as amended—Trades Unions * [18-58].

Third Reading—Marriages (Odessa) * [40], and passed.

DOGS.—QUESTION.

SIR ANDREW AGNEW said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, concurrently with the Bill now before the House regulating the "Duty on Dogs," he will prepare another Bill authorizing the County Police to enforce that Duty; and also empowering them to seize and destroy all Dogs for which no licence shall be taken out?

MR. WALPOLE: No such Bill as that to which the hon. Member refers is now in preparation.

ENGLISH JURORS.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT AMBERLEY said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Council, Whether it is true that a sum of £52 10s. is to be allowed to each English Juror on account of travelling expenses to and from the Exhibition at Paris; and, if so, whether this sum includes the whole amount to be given to each Juror, or whether he will receive any further payment?

MR. CORY: Sir, the English jurors attending the Paris Exhibition will be entitled to receive fifty guineas each, as payment in full for their travelling expenses and all other expenses whatever. It is supposed that each juror will be required to remain in Paris for at least six weeks, and a great number of them for a longer period. No remuneration will be given to them for their services, which will be rendered gratuitously.

NAVY—LIEUTENANT BRAND.

QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE said, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will lay upon the table of the House any subsequent Correspondence between the Admiralty and Lieutenant Brand, since that officer was placed on half-pay?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) was unfortunately absent from the House at the present time, being detained at a public meeting in the City, and therefore he should have to ask the hon. Member to postpone his Question.

MR. OSBORNE said, he would now beg to be permitted to ask the hon. Member for East Surrey, whether he has not received a letter from Lieutenant Brand which was in every way satisfactory to his feelings.

MR. BUXTON: Sir, in answer to the appeal of the hon. Member for Nottingham, I am happy to say that I have received from Lieutenant Brand a most ample and excellent letter of apology, and I shall be very happy to consent to its publication, if there is no objection.

INDIA—CONTRACT LAW.—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, What is the present state of the question about a Contract Law for India, whether any legal opinion in England has been taken as to the principle of enforcing Indigo and other Agricultural Contracts by penal enactments; and, if so, whether he has any objection to lay that Opinion upon the table of the House?

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: A Bill, Sir, has been sent home from Calcutta, making a renewed attempt to settle this difficult question. It was submitted to the Indian Law Commissioners, and I am sorry to say they reported that, in their opinion, the principle it represented was not a sound one, that it was liable to abuse, and that it was not advisable it should be adopted. If the hon. Gentleman will move for the papers no objection will be made to the Motion. No despatch has yet been sent to the Government of India on the subject, because we have not yet surrendered all hope that we shall be enabled to discover some means of giving to the planters the redress which they undoubtedly require, keeping also in view a due regard to the protection of the ryots.

ARMY—LAND TRANSPORT.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Report of the Committee on Land Transport for the Army, over which Lord Strathnairn presided, will be laid upon the table of the House; and, if so, when?

GENERAL PEELE: Sir, the Report of the Committee on Land Transport for the Army was one of a confidential character; and therefore, though I am always ready to give information to the House, I shall not feel justified in consenting to the publication of this Report.

SCOTLAND—GAME LAWS.—QUESTION.

MR. FORDYCE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it is the intention of Government to propose any amendment of the Game Laws in Scotland during this Session?

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire (Mr. M'Lagan) has given notice of a Bill on this subject for Tuesday next, and until I have seen that Bill I shall not be prepared to state whether further legislation will be necessary.

THE "TORNADO."—QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY-TRACY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can give the House any further information as to the present condition of the officers and crew of the Tornado?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, forty-five of the crew of the Tornado, as I stated a few days ago, have been released by the Spanish Government. Immediate steps were taken by the Consul at Cadiz to provide accommodation for these men, and, if it should be necessary, they will be brought home at the public expense, as is usually done in the case of distressed British seamen. With regard to the eight others, they are still detained. I telegraphed to know upon what ground a distinction was made between them and the rest of the crew, and I received a telegraphic reply to the effect that they were detained in case they should be required as witnesses in the event of further proceedings. That reply is not altogether clear; but probably I shall receive more detailed information in a despatch, and until then it will not be expedient to take any further steps in the matter.

REPORTS OF THE BRIBERY COMMISSIONERS.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN GRIDLEY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is proposed to give the House an opportunity of considering the Reports of the Royal Commissioners respecting the Boroughs of Lancaster, Great Yarmouth, Reigate, and Totnes, before any measure for the disfranchisement of those Boroughs is laid upon the table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the evidence taken before the Royal Commissioners, and their Reports upon it, are now in the hands of hon. Members. They have been also under the consideration of the Government, who have arrived at the conclusion which I have already announced. On the Reform Bill, which I hope in a few days to introduce, there will be ample opportunity for hon. Gentlemen to challenge the conclusion at which we have arrived; and I do not contemplate on any other occasion to ask the opinion of the House.

THE BRIBERY COMMISSIONS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN OTWAY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is proposed to lay upon the table the Return of the expenses occasioned by the Commissions sent to Lancaster, Totnes, and other towns, and whether the Government contemplates any measure to throw expenses of that character on the inhabitants of the towns which are the cause of the Commissions being issued?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give notice of this Question.

IRELAND—VARTRY WATERWORKS EMBANKMENT.—QUESTION.

MR. FITZWILLIAM DICK said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If there be any truth in the report of the continuance in the leakage of the Vartry Waterworks Embankment; and, in any case, whether it be the intention of the Government to appoint engineers to investigate and report upon the condition of the same?

LORD NAAS said, in reply, that he had received no information with regard to the state of the Vartry Waterworks within the last four or five days. No request had been made to Government from any quarter to appoint engineers to investigate and report upon the condition of the same. The Government was perfectly satisfied with the Report that had been made by the very eminent engineers who had examined the works, and they had no reason to believe that any danger to the population living below the reservoir at present existed.

EDUCATION.—PAPERS PRESENTED.

Copy presented,—of Minute by the Lords of Her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

MR. CORRY said, that the Minute which he had just presented to the House contained provisions of more than ordinary importance, and would ultimately lead to a considerable increase in the Educational Vote; and he therefore thought it would be more respectful and satisfactory to the House if he departed from what he believed to be the usual practice on such occasions, and made some remarks explanatory of its nature, its objects, and the reasons which had induced the Government to submit it to the approval of Parliament. But before proceeding to do this, he was anxious that the House should understand that the Minute contained nothing at variance with the principles of the Revised Code. On the contrary, its object was, in the strictest conformity with the spirit of the Code, to render it more effectual for the purposes for which it was designed; and it could be no reproach, either to the Code or its authors, if, after the lapse of some years, experience should have suggested some amendments in a measure at once so original in its conception and so comprehensive in its design. He desired it should be further understood that the Minute which he had laid upon the table did not cancel a single article of the Revised Code. It was entirely supplementary to it, and all schools either declining or failing to fulfil its conditions would continue to be entitled to payment under the existing rules. When it became his duty to direct his special attention to the operation of the present system of popular education, as administered by the Privy Council, it appeared to him to be defective in three material respects. In the first place, not only in numerous instances, for that, he feared, was inevitable, unless under an entire change of system, but in instances far too numerous, the smaller schools continued unable to comply with the conditions which would entitle them to participate in the public grants. In the second place, there was a tendency to limit the education given in the schools to the three elementary subjects of reading, writing, and arithmetic; and even with regard to these subjects, the results were not altogether so satisfactory as they were entitled to expect; and, in the third place, there had occurred such a diminution in the number of pupil-teachers under the operation of the Code, as had not only unduly impaired the teaching power in the schools, but had also endangered the adequacy of the supply of candidates for certificates, the certificates being the very foundation upon which the whole superstructure of national education as aided by the State was raised. If these defects were inherent in the existing system, the House would admit that the subject was worthy of the consideration of Parliament.

With respect to the first defect—namely, the exclusion of small schools, for, practically, it was exclusion, he had high authority for saying that it, at all events, was a matter deserving the attention of Parliament. His right hon. Friend the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), in his speech explaining the Revised Code in 1862, after having enumerated 964 parishes, in five counties only, having each a population of less than 600, which derived no assistance from the State, said—

“These districts contribute to the revenue equally with others, and it is exceedingly desirable, on the ground both of justice and policy, that they should receive back some share of the money.”

In that opinion he (Mr. Corry) entirely concurred. Justice and policy alike required that small and poor schools should share in the contributions by the State towards the education of the poor; but it was well known that in thousands of instances they had failed to do so, and even if it were argued that their inability to fulfil the conditions required by the Privy Council was the result of the apathy rather than the poverty of the parishes in which they were situated, it could not be questioned that the proportionate expenses of small schools were far greater than those of larger ones; and this, in his opinion, gave them a peculiar claim to consideration. Compare, for example, two schools, one with 80 and the other with 40 children in average attendance. The Code did not require a pupil-teacher to be employed until there were 40 children above 50—that is, 90 children; and the grants could therefore be earned by the employment of one unassisted certificated teacher in both schools, while, assuming both to be equal in efficiency, the larger school, without any additional establishment expense, which the Royal Commissioners, in their Report (1861), estimated at more than 14s. in the pound of the whole of the expenses of schools, would receive twice the amount of public grants as well as, probably, of school fees from the parents of the children, in aid of private contributions. The Commissioners distinctly recognised the disadvantage under which small schools laboured in this respect. They said—

and with the view of compensating this disadvantage they recommended a larger capitation grant in the case of schools having an average attendance of less than sixty children. That would form no part of his proposal, although one result of the Minute would be to give help to small schools, as well to those which were already connected with the Privy Council, as to those which had hitherto been prevented by their poverty from meeting the conditions of the grants.

He would now pass on to the second defect to which he had adverted—namely, that there had been a tendency of late years to limit the teaching in the schools to the three elementary, to the neglect of what were called higher subjects, such as geography, English history, and grammar, and that even in the elementary subjects the average proficiency was unsatisfactory. He was aware that it was a fault of the old system that it was too ambitious, and he was by no means an advocate for giving a high education to the children of the poor, which he thought would be far more likely to unfit them for the state of life to which they had been called, than to lead to any useful purpose. But there was a mean in all things, and he agreed with Mr. Morell, one of Her Majesty's Inspectors, who had expressed the opinion in his last Report that—

“If the education given in a school is to be fruitful in after-life it is essential that it shall not consist merely in giving mechanical facilities, but that it shall arouse the intellectual power and give some taste of what knowledge really means, and draw out the determination and the will to acquire it.”

That these higher subjects were now too much neglected appeared from many passages in the Reports of the Inspectors, some of which he would ask permission of the House to quote. In the Reports for 1865-6, Mr. Barry said—

“In what are called the higher subjects of instruction (geography, grammar, and history), there has been a decided falling off since the introduction of the New Code.”

Mr. Meyrick said—

“Geography, grammar, and history, all of them very efficient instruments for opening the mind, have disappeared as subjects of study, or when they exist are scarcely the ghosts of their old selves.”

Mr. Renouf said—

“There are very few schools in my district in which, except as regards religion, . . . the instruction is not confined to reading, writing, and arithmetic.”

Mr. Wilkinson said—

“Last year I reported grammar, geography, and history as being in abeyance in many of the rural schools of my district; these subjects, if not quite set aside, still continue to be materially curtailed in favour of the paying part of the school system.”

With respect to this last remark, the House was aware that no payment was now made in respect of educational acquirement, except on the results of the examinations in reading, writing, and arithmetic. He did not deny that a good foundation in reading, writing, and arithmetic, was of the first importance to the poor man's child, and if the results in these respects had been satisfactory he might not, perhaps, have thought it necessary to call attention to the absence of instruction in the higher subjects. But it could not be said that those results were satisfactory, although he wished here to say that if the original plan of his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne had been adopted—which was that every child to earn the grants must be examined, at a given age, up to a given standard—the state of things to which he was about to refer could hardly have existed. The statistics of the last Reports of the Inspectors would give the House a clear idea of the present average state of elementary proficiency. He found that in the assisted and inspected schools in England and Wales the scholars in average attendance in the year ending on the 31st of August, 1866, were 863,240. The percentage of infants under six years of age, and therefore by the rules of the Code not presentable for examination, was 25·97; above six, but not presented for examination, 8·44; presented for examination, 65·59; of these, there were presented in the three lowest Standards, I. II. III., 49·79 per cent; in the three higher Standards, IV. V. VI., 15·80 per cent, or less than a quarter. This was not an accident of ages, for if all above six years old had been grouped by age the percentage would have been 38·88 in Standards IV. V. VI.; and only 35·15 in I. II. III. Of the 15·80 per cent presented in the three higher subjects, 8·58 per cent were presented in Standard IV.; 4·96 in Standard V.; and only 2·26 per cent in Standard VI.; whereas, under a perfect system of grouping according to age, 11·51 per cent ought to have been presented in Standard IV.; 10·02 in Standard V.; and 17·35 in Standard VI. These figures referred not to passes obtained, but merely to the children presented for examination, and he would now state, not the percentage, but the actual number of children as they passed in the standards. Of the 863,240 children there were:—Under six years of age, 224,230; above six years of age, and presentable for examination, 639,190. Of these, there were actually presented 566,371; of which 364,126 passed without failure in the second standards. The number who passed in the three lower standards was 284,027, and in the three higher standards 80,099. Of the latter, 40,154 passed in Standard IV.; 26,884 in Standard V.; and no more than 13,161 in Standard VI. Of the 566,371 children presented for examination, only 13,161 had succeeded in passing in the sixth, or highest standard. To give the House an idea of what these standards were, he might state that, according to the Report for last year of the Committee of Council, “an ordinary child who was upwards of ten years of age could, if properly instructed, pass in Standard VI.,” and the Report added “that the examinations continued to exhibit results which ought not to be regarded as satisfactory.” The House would therefore see that his opinion in this respect was not singular, but was, on the contrary, supported by high authority. He must not, however, allow the House to consider that these unsatisfactory results were attributable altogether, or nearly altogether, to defective teaching. It was traceable to various other causes—to early removals from schools, to irregularity of attendance, to capricious removals of children from one school to another, and other such causes—but the fact remained that only a small proportion of the children ever reached the higher standards, and he would describe the value of such results in words which would carry with them much greater weight than any which he could utter. He would take the liberty of quoting from the Report of the Committee of Council for the year 1862, which bore the signature of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, and of the late Lord President—Earl Granville—

“We regret that our first proposal to examine children for grants according to age had to be withdrawn. . . . Age and proficiency coincide, in fact, far oftener than not. . . . The reason for examining according to age was that the amount of proficiency required by Standard VI. represents the minimum of book instruction which can be put to practical use in life. Less than this is almost sure to be forgotten, because it cannot be used with pleasure or profit. . . . It can never be too well remembered that the probability of the next generation becoming duly educated depends on the number of children who secure the indispensable minimum of instruction before a given age, which the labour market inevitably and inexorably fixes. . . . It may generally be assumed that each child who in the 10th, 11th, and 12th years cannot pass according to Standards IV. V. VI., will never possess even the humble attainments which those Standards denote, and that, so far as the secular instruction of that child goes, the school which is paid on his account has done little or nothing to better him in life.”

It might be said that the Revised Code had not been long enough in operation to enable them to judge of its ultimate effects; but the latest Returns did not exhibit improvement, but the reverse. The percentage of failures in England and Wales in 1865, were 13·09 in writing, 23·58 in arithmetic; in 1866, 13·67 in writing, and 25·28 in arithmetic; there had been a small diminution of the percentage of failures in reading, but in writing and arithmetic the reverse was the case. The second object of the Minute was to obtain more satisfactory results in these respects, and to improve the quality of the education given in the schools; and, with this, the third object was intimately connected—namely, the maintenance of a more adequate supply of pupil-teachers. The tendency of the old system, under which the whole of the salary was paid by the State, was to encourage the employment of too many pupil-teachers. The Revised Code had led to the employment of too few, for under it no pupil-teacher was required unless there were ninety children in the school. Now, he (Mr. Corry) held it to be plainly impossible for a single teacher to give efficient instruction to anything like that number of scholars, consisting of infants, and children of from six to twelve years of age, divided into various classes under the several standards, and he considered it to be absolutely necessary not only to arrest the decrease, but also to encourage an increase in the number of pupil-teachers. Exclusive of Scotland, which the Minute did not touch, as the schools in that part of the United Kingdom were still paid under the old Code—exclusive of Scotland, the number of pupil-teachers was 13,393 in 1861, 12,803 in 1862, 11,590 in 1863, 9,907 in 1864, 9,556 in 1865, and 8,970 in 1866; so that the pupil-teachers, who in 1861 numbered 13,393, were now reduced to 8,970, being a diminution in six years of 4,423. Even this did not represent the whole state of the case; because, concurrently with that diminution, there had been a considerable increase in the number of schools and of scholars. In 1861, there were 8,494 assisted schools in England and Wales, while in 1866 there were 9,844; and the average attendance of children at assisted day schools, which was 753,444 in 1861, was 863,420 in 1866; showing an increase of 1,350 schools, and 109,976 scholars. The ratio, therefore, of pupil-teachers to scholars, which in 1861 was 1 to 56, had become 1 to 96 in 1866. It was true that in 1861 the number of assistant teachers was 316, and in 1866 it was 974; so that there had been an increase of 660 in assistant teachers; but this was a very small set-off against a diminution of 4,423 pupil-teachers. This falling off had been noticed with regret, and even with alarm, by the great majority of the Inspectors. Mr. Campbell says—

"In my last Report I ventured to predict the demolition of the pupil-teacher system; as far as the circumstances of my district are concerned, I seem to have been correct."

Mr. E. P. Arnold says—

"It is in the schools which have an attendance, averaging from forty to ninety children, that the loss has been especially felt."

Mr. Moncreiff says—

"Male pupil-teachers seem to me to be rapidly disappearing from all except a very few of the larger schools."

Mr. Robinson says—

"Pupil-teachers have decreased by exactly one-half. The majority of schools in this district fall below an attendance of ninety, which requires the employment of an apprentice. I believe the disease of pupil-teachers to be the main cause of decline in many schools which have hitherto been most efficient."

Mr. Warburton says—

"I feel bound to represent to your Lordships that very serious evils result from the (practical) abolition of pupil-teachers in schools containing between fifty and ninety children, a class which includes the majority of country schools. My almost daily experience has convinced me of the urgent necessity which exists for taking some steps to remedy this evil."

Mr. Watkins says—

"Out of 160 schools (in this district) receiving annual grants, more than one-half of them are now without pupil-teachers. Considering pupil-teachers as the chief reservoir from which the great supply of school-masters and mistresses is to be drawn, their diminishing quantity is a fact of great importance for the future. Their place is not adequately supplied by assistant teachers."

He would only add, in corroboration of his (Mr. Corry's) opinion as to the danger of the decline of the pupil-teacher system, a short extract from the evidence of Mr. Tufnell, a gentleman of great ability, who was well-known by many Members of the House, and who had devoted his whole life to the promotion of education. In his examination before Sir John Pakington's Committee in 1865, Question 1,160, that gentleman said—

"There is one part of the Revised Code which is doing an injury to the country, which it is impossible to lament too seriously. I allude to the discouragement which is thrown upon the engagement of pupil-teachers. The whole pupil-teacher system is now in danger of being upset, and, with it, that of the training schools, and if you upset those two things you bring back education to the state in which it was twenty-five years ago, and all the labour which has been undergone, and the £4,000,000 which have been expended in that office during the last quarter of a century, will be rendered useless."

He was aware that the falling off was attributable, in a great measure, to the state of the labour market, and that there was great difficulty in finding young persons willing to assist in schools at the small salaries which were given; but still, he did not doubt that the want of supply was, in a great measure, attributable to the want of demand, and the third object of this Minute was to encourage a greater demand for, and thereby a more adequate supply of, pupil-teachers.

Having now pointed out the defects which he wished to remedy, he might state that the plan which he proposed was based on a recommendation by Mr. Moncreiff, one of the ablest and most intelligent of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools. His attention having been directed to the great difficulties of small schools, Mr. Moncreiff offered the following remarks, which were quoted in the last Report of the late Committee of Council on Education:—

“The schools which suffered most from the introduction of the Revised Code were the very small schools with certificated teachers. The loss of the augmentation can very seldom in their case be made up by the new grants. And even the augmentation hardly balanced the greater proportionate expensiveness of a little school kept up to the standard of efficiency. I propose, then, without drawing any line between school and school, that the first 120 ‘passes’ in any school be paid at a higher rate—say 4*s.* instead of 2*s.* 8*d.* This would give but little trouble; the amount (£24) would become a fixed quantity for all except the very smallest, or the very feeblest schools. It is obvious that the additional amount would be a boon to the small, and but a trifle to the larger school. It would also diminish the relative loss by unavoidable accidents of inspection.”

It might here be right that he should explain to those hon. Members who were not conversant with the subject that every child might obtain three passes—one in reading, one in writing, and a third in arithmetic—so that forty children, if all succeeded without failure, would obtain 120 “passes;” but, at the present average rate, it would require about fifty-four children to do so. Mr. Moncreiff’s plan would, no doubt, have relieved small schools; but it would have done so in a costly manner, because it would have extended the increased rate to large schools, which, as a general rule, did not require it, and that without any compensating advantage. But when he (Mr. Corry) came to look into the subject, he found he had to deal not only with pecuniary poverty, but with educational poverty as well, and he therefore proposed, in conformity with Mr. Moncreiff’s suggestion, to offer the increased rate to all schools, but subject to certain educational conditions the general character of which he would presently explain.

The details of the plan embodied in the Minute were these:—in the first place, all schools fulfilling the required educational conditions would be entitled to payment at the rate of 4*s.* per pass (instead of 2*s.* 8*d.*) on any number of passes not exceeding 120; the present rate of 2*s.* 8*d.* per pass to continue in force in respect of all passes exceeding 120. The additional grant to a school obtaining as many as 120 passes would be £8, and less in proportion to any less number of passes obtained. In the second place, the educational conditions were—first, that there should be one pupil-teacher for every forty scholars above 25, instead of above 50, as at present (or one assistant teacher for every 80 above 25); and the result would be (as regarded pupil-teachers) that, to entitle a school to the additional rate of payment, a pupil-teacher must be employed when there were 65 scholars in average attendance instead of 90, as under the present rule, and in the same proportion in respect of larger schools, 25 being substituted for fifty as the starting-point throughout. The second educational condition was, that the number of passes obtained should bear a minimum proportion to the number of scholars above six years of age in average attendance. The third was, that a certain proportion of the whole number of passes should fall under Standards IV., V., and VI. The fourth, that a certain proportion of the scholars should pass a satisfactory examination in at least one subject beyond the elementary subjects specified in the several standards. Those were the educational conditions required by the Minute. It also provided that a scholar, after having passed in the sixth standard, might bring a further grant to the school for one year only, on passing a satisfactory examination in any higher subject or subjects. This last provision would, he thought, be found a very valuable one. At present, no scholar could earn a grant for his school after he had passed in Standard VI., and the result was that the managers had a pecuniary interest in presenting the more intelligent scholars, who might be capable of mastering two standards in a year, for examination in lower standards than they were qualified to pass in. In the third place, as a further encouragement to the employment of additional pupil-teachers, the Minute provided that grants should be made to the managers of all schools fulfilling the conditions of the Minute in respect of pupil-teachers (but not otherwise), of £10 for every male pupil-teacher passing into a Training College in the first class, and of £5 for every male pupil-teacher passing in the second class. Also, that grants should be made at the examination after the first year’s residence of £8 for the students placed in the first division, and of £5 for those in the second division. This would also be found a valuable provision, and would encourage managers of schools, and he hoped teachers also, as he had no doubt a portion of these grants would be assigned to them, in their endeavours to induce the pupil-teachers to remain in the profession, and become candidates for certificates in the Training Colleges. This provision would be limited to male pupil-teachers, and would not at present extend to Scotland, where the payments, as he had before observed, were still made under the old Code. He would now come to the estimated cost of this scheme. The increase for the first year would not be very considerable, from three causes. In the first place, all schools were paid for the year, down to the last day of the month preceding that of their inspection—so that a school inspected in May next, for example, would be entitled to only one month's payment of the increased rate, from the 1st of April—and so in proportion, in respect of other schools, inspected in other months of the year. Another reason would be the difficulty which would be experienced for some time of complying with the educational conditions; and the third was that there would be no premiums on the second year's examination of pupil-teachers coming in course of payment during the ensuing financial year. For these reasons the Estimate of 1867-8 for the increased rate of grants was only £13,000; and for the premiums on the admission of pupil-teachers £2,200, making a total of £15,200. It was right, however, he should frankly tell the House that in future years the cost would be much more considerable. The Estimate for 1868-9 would probably fall not far short of £40,000; and eventually, in the course of three or four years, when the scheme would be in full operation, the annual increased expenditure calculated on the present number of schools would probably exceed £60,000, or might amount to £70,000. The plan which he had described had no pretension to be a complete remedy for the various defects he had indicated, still less for those shortcomings which had been the subject of debate two nights ago, and to which the attention of his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department had been directed; but he trusted it would give a stimulus to education, and produce results far more than commensurate with the cost of obtaining them. He hoped to give help to small and needy schools, already in connection with the Privy Council. He hoped to encourage small and needy schools, not in connection with the Privy Council, to place themselves in connection with it. He hoped to improve the quality of the teaching in all assisted schools, and to obtain a more adequate supply of pupil-teachers; and it would be a source of the highest gratification to him if the plan should prove conducive to the extension and improvement of the education of the poor.

Mr. BRUCE said, that the House was aware that ever since the Revised Code had been established efforts had been made to break down the certificate system, in order to facilitate the conditions of aid, and the extension of education. The question whether the certificate should be a necessary condition of the grant from the State was thoroughly examined by the Committee appointed the year before last on the Motion of the present First Lord of the Admiralty; and he believed he might venture to say that although no positive conclusion was arrived at, there was a very general concurrence of opinion on the part of the Committee that no change should be made in that respect. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) went into the Committee with strong views; but the result of the evidence adduced was that his opinions underwent much change, or at least modification, and a similar change took place in the opinion of at least one other member of the Committee. At the same time, there was a concurrence equally general that there were certain portions of the Revised Code which were susceptible of improvement, by which, without infringing any principle of that Code, greater encouragement might be given to schools in the poorer districts both of town and country. He should be the last man to underrate the advantages of the Revised Code, for he well knew how much it had effected. It had supplied an admirable, a searching, and a discriminating test of the education given in the schools; it had swept away a great deal of superfluous expenditure, and, above all, it had secured for every class of children, the youngest as well as the oldest, an equal share of instruction. Those were only a few of the advantages of the Revised Code; but, on the other hand, he was bound to admit that the change, coming suddenly as it did, pressed very heavily on the resources of managers, and tended in some cases to check the ardour displayed in the promotion of education. It had considerably reduced the salaries of teachers, and by so doing had affected the supply of pupil-teachers; and by its tendency to raise school-fees to meet the deficiency of the grant, it had aggravated one of the evils most strongly urged against our system—namely, that it gave aid where it was least wanted, and withheld it where the need was sorest. It was the object of the right hon. Gentleman, as the House must have perceived, to deal with all these points. As the right hon. Gentleman had truly stated, the position of the smaller as compared with the larger schools was no doubt one of hardship. The contribution of the State was a fixed quantity, whereas the expenses of the schools varied according to the numbers attending them. A large school might be conducted for 20s. a head, whereas in a small school the expense might be as high as 40s. or even 45s. per head, while the contribution of the State in both cases would be about 9s., and of course the difference had to be made up from the local contributions. The Revised Code, not as it was originally introduced, but as it ultimately passed that House, had the effect of reducing the grant from 11s. 6d. per child to 8s. In the country districts the pressure fell on the resources of the clergy, already overburdened. The decrease in the salaries of teachers had been very considerable. The salaries of the masters in 1865, as compared with 1861, had fallen from £92 to £84, and the salaries of the schoolmistresses had been diminished by the still larger proportion of about one-seventh, and there was every year an increasing difficulty in supplying the schools with proper staffs. So strongly was that felt to be the case by the Lord President and himself last year that, before they left office, they had determined to propose for the consideration of the Government a plan somewhat similar to the one which the right hon. Gentleman had just submitted to the House. An important point, no doubt, for the consideration of the House was the increased cost of these changes. They must, however, remember what had been the effect of the Revised Code in reducing the cost to the State of their educational system. In 1861 the sum expended for educational purposes by the State was £813,000; and last year it was only £626,000; they were, in fact, educating 300,000 more children in 1865 than in 1861, at a cost of £177,000 less. If this branch of their expenditure had gone on increasing in the same ratio as it had done before 1861, no doubt it would have exceeded £1,000,000 at that moment; so that it might be fairly said that the Revised Code had saved them somewhere about £400,000 per annum. But if that great reduction tended in any way to impair the efficiency of the education given, or to cut off the future supply of teachers, he was sure the House would be ready to make due provision for that which they had all most earnestly at heart—namely, the education of the poorer classes. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Corry) had endeavoured to grapple with these difficulties; but there was one point having an important bearing upon the case of the rural schools especially, for the maintenance of which additional means were to be provided, which deserved the greatest attention. He referred to the settlement of the question of the conscience clause. The chiefs of the Established Church had in many instances come forward and expressed most just and liberal views on that subject, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not during his tenure of office lose any opportunity of bringing that matter forward and endeavouring to effect its satisfactory settlement. Those among the clergy who objected to the Conscience Clause would, not improbably, accept from Parliament terms which, if consulted, they would not agree to; and the time had come when a final solution of this irritating controversy might, in his opinion, be effectually applied.

Mr. POWELL congratulated the right hon. Gentleman that he had been able to lay on the table a Minute conceived in a liberal spirit, and designed to carry out a reform of a kind and generous character towards those interested in promoting the education of the people. If there was any omission in his statement which he (Mr. Powell) regretted, it was the omission of any promise for larger building grants. There had recently been a great increase in the cost of building, and circumstances had arisen which had greatly increased the difficulty of all operations of that nature. He had hoped that whenever any amendment was made in the Revised Code, one important alteration would have been the providing of a more liberal grant towards the foundation and building of new schools. However, he hoped that during the Session of 1868 an Amendment of that kind might be introduced. He had heard with satisfaction that the Government intended to adhere to the practice of having certificated masters, the evidence in favour of which was very complete. There was some variety of opinion upon the question, and reference had been made to the United States, it being said that in many States of America there was not a system of giving certificates from the central Government. The reason, however, was that while in England we had a central grant and central certificates, they had in the United States local administration, local taxation, and, as a necessary consequence, a system of local certificates. On the Continent, wherever the educational system was of the same nature as our own, there was the same system of certificates as in England. There were now in many of the districts of the country signs rather of retrogression than of progress in popular education, and the Inspectors, who dealt with the small schools, were unanimously of opinion that those schools were falling back; it was therefore necessary that we should make some effort to stop the decay and disappointment that might otherwise ensue. The masters, it appeared, felt a great reluctance to have pupil-teachers, doubtless because of the trouble involved in instructing them; and on the part of the managers the same feeling existed, owing to the great complexity of the Revised Code; but he hoped that the portion of the Code which dealt with that point might be amended. He was sorry to find that the schools had been falling off in the supply of material—in maps, books, and illustrations. The contrast between the schools in England and Ireland was greatly to the disadvantage of the schools in this country, and we certainly had a right to expect that our schools should not be inferior to those in Ireland. Let the Irish schools be improved as far as possible; but let the English schools be equally improved at the same time. He was glad that the proposed step was to be carried out, and thought our educational system would be much benefited.

MR. LOWE: Perhaps the House will remember that the system of education in this country is a voluntary system, and that if it is pronounced by its friends and advocates, like the hon. and learned gentleman opposite (Mr. Powell), to be inefficient, the blame is not to be thrown principally on the Government, but on those by whom the present denominational mode of management has been set up. The hon. and learned Gentleman compares the case of England and Ireland; but in Ireland the system is a Government system almost entirely, and if the schools are bad, then blame the Government. But in England the foundation is voluntary, and all the Government does to the schools is to aid them. This is not from the wish of the Government, but from the wish of the different denominations themselves, for they knew very well that those schools which were supported by rates would soon cease to be denominational. It is too much for those who are the friends and supporters of the system to turn round and complain of the Government because education on the system on which they have placed it does not go on so well as could be wished. Look at the fact as it stands. We undertook the Revised Code in 1862, when we found the expense of the grant was increasing at the rate of £100,000 a year; and when we found that the education given was very bad indeed. When we examined the children the statement of the Commissioners was borne out, for not one-fourth of the children were found sufficiently taught to be worth speaking of at all. We believed we could reduce the cost and increase the efficiency of the schools; and what have we done? We have reduced the expenses to the amount of £400,000 a year, according to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who is supplied with later information than I am; though it occurred to me, when I estimated the matter from data supplied to me by Sir James Kay Shuttleworth and other gentlemen, that the figure should be put somewhat higher. And for this decreased expenditure I believe we have given a much more efficient education than before. We were told at the time "You may do that, but you will so screw and injure the schools that they will not be worth nearly so much afterwards." But what has been the result? As my right hon. Friend opposite has stated, 1,300 new schools have come into existence, and 110,000 more children have been added as scholars—and that at an expense, proportionately speaking, of £500,000 a year less than you would have been paying had not the system been altered. But then you are not contented, although the work is done better and cheaper. You are not satisfied, but must all begin tinkering and pulling to pieces the system which has produced such results, because you say fewer pupil-teachers are employed. Of course there are fewer pupil-teachers, and so there ought to be. Under the old system we were paying the whole salary for every pupil-teacher, and only part for other teachers—giving a bounty for every one of them—and of course all school managers got as many as they could. But afterwards, a grant was given to the managers to spend as they pleased and they naturally spent it as economically as they could, fewer pupil-teachers were employed, the cost of education was diminished, not only to the State, but to the managers themselves, and now we have a better, because better tested, education, at a considerably less cost. Why cannot you let the matter alone? Why are we to be asked in the name of education to give £70,000 more to the grant, in order to undo the work that has done so well? You have adopted a system faulty in principle in deference to the feelings, or, I should say, in deference to the prejudices of the different denominations. If the managers are not contented, when it is proved to demonstration that the system yields much good, notwithstanding its faulty principle, I say they are acting most unwisely, and that if they attempt to bend the bow any tighter it will break in their hands. The system is not defensible upon abstract principles, and the only way to defend and maintain it is by making it so economical and so effective that practical men may hesitate to sweep it away, knowing the immense waste of time, of power, and of trouble which would be involved before you could get a new system which, though theoretically better, would be practically as good. If you, by making it needlessly expensive, break the system down, there is nothing before it but a speedy extinction.

COLONEL SYKES thought it an immense drawback in the progress of education that children of ten years of age were generally withdrawn from school and sent out to work by their parents. The consequence was, that they learned nothing that they retained. They got a smattering of reading, writing, and arithmetic, but that was soon forgotten; and even if it were not forgotten, it was not education—it was only a means for education. Reading, writing, and arithmetic no more made an education than knives and forks made a dinner. The consequence of all this was, that only 15 per cent out of 850,000 children acquired anything like an education at all. How, then, was the present state of affairs to be remedied? By nothing less, in his opinion, than the establishment of a compulsory system, as in Prussia, where the parent of every child was made responsible for its attendance at a public school. He should also recommend the giving of State aid to evening schools to which adults might be enabled to go when their day's work was over.

MR. HUBBARD said, it was an entire mistake to suppose, as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bruce) seemed to suggest, that the builders of schools would accept from a Tory Administration a less measure of justice than they were prepared to accept from a Whig Government, as regarded the privileges which, in a denominational point of view, they were entitled to expect. But he wished to correct an impression that seemed to have been conveyed in some of the remarks which had been made upon the Conscience Clause and the building grants. With regard to the building grants, the diminution in them arose out of the diminution in the applications for them—a circumstance which was due to the operation of the Conscience Clause. As to the clergy of the country generally, and their view of the Conscience Clause, they had a great duty to perform, and all they wanted was fair treatment—the same fairness which was given to Roman Catholics, Wesleyans, and other denominationalists.

MR. AYRTON asked on what night the right hon. Gentleman opposite proposed that his scheme, subverting that of his right hon. Friend the Member for Calne, should be taken into consideration by the House?

MR. CORY replied, that his plan, so far from subverting, would, in his opinion, rather tend to strengthen the system introduced by the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe). As to fixing a day for the discussion of the Minute, he could only say that it would, in accordance with the rules, lie on the table for a month, when, if not opposed, it would be inserted in the Code for next year.

MR. LOWE: I am afraid there will be no vacant day during the ensuing month when the Minute can be discussed. Will the Government undertake that it shall not come into effect until we have an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion upon it?

MR. WALPOLE replied, that such an opportunity would present itself on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. ADDERLEY: Sir, I rise to move the second reading of a Bill for the union in one Dominion, of the Canadas, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia. What I have to ask the House to do is to give their consent to the proposal of the representatives of these three Provinces. Eminent public men representing all shades of political opinions in these Provinces are in this country at the present moment, having been delegated by the Governors, on Addresses of the Legislatures, to ask Her Majesty to submit to the Imperial Parliament a scheme of union which embodies almost literally and without modification the Resolutions adopted at a representative Conference at Quebec in the year 1864. I need not go far back to show the origin of this desire of the Provinces to be united in one Dominion. It has gone on increasing from year to year, and if it was well founded years ago it is infinitely more justified by the circumstances in which the Provinces are now placed. The first official document in which the many obvious reasons for this union are stated with great ability, is the Report of Lord Durham's Commission, published nearly thirty years ago. Since that Report was made the union has formed a prominent subject of discussion both in public and in private. It became the leading topic at public meetings and in Parliamentary debates, and the frequent subject of men's conversation throughout the Provinces. In the year 1849 an association called the North American League was formed, and held its meetings in Toronto, for the purpose of promoting this object. Its name will recommend itself to many Members of this House as expressive of popular feeling, and legitimate agitation. In the year 1854, the Legislative Assembly of Nova Scotia came to a Resolution in favour of a general union, the Resolution being promoted by the most prominent men of all political parties. Mr. Johnston on one side, and Mr. Howe on the other, share together the credit of the first legislative action on the subject. In the year 1858, the Coalition Ministry of Canada, Sir Edmund Head being the Governor General, first made this scheme a Ministerial measure, and a despatch was addressed to the Home Government on the subject. This was the first correspondence with the Home Government relative to the union. In the year 1861, Nova Scotia again took the lead in the matter, and proposed a conference of delegates from each of the Provinces to consider the subject. The result of their deliberations was communicated to the Colonial Secretary of that period, the late Duke of Newcastle; and in reply to their communication he stated, that if it was clearly the desire of the Provinces to be united the proposal would be carefully considered in this country. I refer particularly to this fact, because it has recently been asserted that the measure was pressed on reluctant colonies by the Home Government, while in reality a more calm and colourless answer than that of the Duke of Newcastle was never sent from any public Office. In consequence of that answer, at the end of 1863, the people of Nova Scotia and of their fellow Maritime Provinces proposed to hold a conference, and Canada then, for the first time, asked to be a party to the proceeding. These are all important points in the history of this proposition, because it has been stated that Canada urged the measure on the smaller Provinces, and thus used its superior influence for local purposes; while that is so far from being the case, that it was after the Maritime Provinces had determined on holding a conference for the promotion of that object that Canada requested to be allowed to join in their deliberations. It has also been said that it was the constitutional difficulties of Canada that led to the formation of this project. Now, it is true that Canada had at that time constitutional difficulties to encounter; but those difficulties were no more the cause of the proposal for the union of the Provinces than the divorce of Henry VIII. was the cause of the Reformation. It was but an accident which precipitated that which was in itself desirable, and which every one wished to see effected. Those delegates from all the Provinces met at Quebec in the month of October, 1864, and they adopted a series of Resolutions for the project of an union which are embodied in the Bill now before the House. The proposals which they adopted were communicated to the late Minister of the Colonial Department, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cardwell), than whom I will now venture to express my opinion, as I have already frequently expressed it in opposition, this country never had a more statesmanlike Colonial Minister. He having received and carefully considered these Resolutions, replied in a despatch addressed to Lord Monck, the Governor General—to whom also I will pay this tribute, that I believe it was fortunate for those Provinces that they had so able, so judicious, and so successful a Governor at so critical a juncture. The right hon. Gentleman opposite in his despatch expressed his belief that it was high time that the inhabitants of those Provinces should take upon themselves those duties of citizenship which we took upon ourselves at home; that it was absolutely necessary they should make greater military preparations and undertake some works of defence. It is by no means true that there is anything in that despatch which can be fairly represented as urgently forcing on the union—the fact is that at that time a correspondence was going on relative to the insecure condition of those colonies, and the right hon. Gentleman was justified in telling their inhabitants that they should take on themselves the duty of citizens, and that it was necessary that they should make greater provision for the defence of their country. To that appeal the colonies made a noble response. In the following year the Colonial Legislatures met, and in the three Provinces to which this Bill applies addresses were passed which led to the Governor General sending to this country those delegates who are now among us for the purpose of asking the Imperial Parliament to sanction in the form of a Bill the Resolutions to which they agreed at Quebec.

I need not, I believe, now weary the House by entering into any minute explanations with respect to the details of the measure; for though the Bill was presented to Parliament only about fourteen days ago, yet the substance of its provisions have for a long time been discussed in the public press before it became the subject, a few nights ago, of an able and elaborate statement made by the noble Earl the Secretary for the Colonies. I therefore may reckon on the House being pretty well acquainted with the details of the Bill, and it will be sufficient if I give only a general outline of its provisions. The Bill provides that the Canadas, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia should form one dominion, under the common name of Canada; and that the colonies so united should comprise four Provinces—Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick. It was proposed that the four Provinces should have a common Parliament at Ottawa, consisting of a Senate and a House of Commons. By Her Majesty's Proclamation, Ontario, which is now called Upper Canada; Quebec, which is now known under the name of Lower Canada; New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, will become one Government. The Senate will be composed of seventy-two Senators, nominated by the Governor General, in the name of Her Majesty, for life—twenty-four of them for Ontario, twenty-four for Quebec, and twenty-four for the Maritime Provinces. But as the strict limitation of these numbers might lead to a dead-lock between the Upper and the Lower Chambers, it is provided that the Governor General shall, with the Queen's approval, have the power of adding two triplets of Senators to these seventy-two, so that he might enlarge the Senate to seventy-eight members; but that number they can never exceed. If on any occasion such additions are made the number will be allowed to die down again to seventy-two. The House of Commons is to consist of, at first, 181 Members—eighty-two for Ontario, sixty-five for Quebec, nineteen for Nova Scotia, and fifteen for New Brunswick. The existing election laws will continue; but these numbers are to be adjusted to population from time to time, according to a decennial census, in the manner adopted in the American House of Representatives. The Provinces are to have Local Legislatures for local purposes; and each of them is also to have a Lieutenant Governor, named by the Governor General. Ontario will have a single Chamber, to be styled the Legislative Assembly; Quebec will retain the present form of the Legislature of the United Canadas; New Brunswick and Nova Scotia will retain their present Legislatures. The power of the Provincial Legislatures, in reference to legislation, will be confined to a certain number of specified subjects. The Governor General will have a veto on all legislation; and the Central Legislature will be invested with a general power of providing for the good government and peace of the country; but without derogating from the general power, certain specified powers are enumerated for the Central Legislature. It will be seen that by these provisions arrangements are made as far as possible for ensuring the unity and strength of the Central Government. I think I need hardly trouble the House with the other provisions of the Bill. There is, I believe, only one other clause to which I need now allude, and that is a clause by which these Provinces bind themselves immediately to proceed to the construction of a great international railway, which they regard as the backbone of the general scheme of union. There is nothing in this Bill which implicates this House or this country in that undertaking; but it is only right I should add that the adoption of that provision will render it necessary for me to ask the House to guarantee the interest of a loan by means of which the railway is to be constructed. I think I have now sufficiently described the Bill. The House will see that its most striking feature is a scrupulous adherence, as far as the circumstances of the case would permit, to the constitutional forms of this country. I leave every Gentleman to judge for himself, and appreciate, as I hope they will, the causes which have led to this sensitiveness of filial piety—this almost morbid dread of departure from the institutions of the mother country, and of any approximation to institutions nearer to themselves; but certainly that is one main feature of the Bill as presented to the House. The adoption of the principle of federation, as compared with what might be preferable if practicable, a solid legislative union, is simply the consequence of the absolute necessity of the adjustment of inveterate local interests, and the ultimatum of mutual compromise between the Provinces. The House may ask what occasion there can be for our interfering in a question of this description. It will, however, I think, be manifest, upon reflection, that, as the arrangement is a matter of mutual concession on the part of the Provinces, there must be some external authority to give a sanction to the compact into which they have entered. It is very true we have often given to colonies, secondary in importance to these, the task of framing their own Constitution. A general Act was passed two years ago which gives to all colonies with representative institutions the power, at any time, of altering their Constitution within certain limits; but it is clear the process of federation is impracticable to the constituent Legislatures. If, again, federation has in this case specially been a matter of most delicate treaty and compact between the Provinces—if it has been a matter of mutual concession and compromise, it is clearly necessary that there should be a third party ab extra to give sanction to the treaty made between them. Such seems to me the office we have to perform in regard to this Bill. We have, in fact, to accept or reject the proposal which the Provinces have made to us. We certainly ought to guard most carefully against anything being effected by the Act injurious to Imperial interests, as distinguished from colonial interests; but I ask the House whether any Imperial interests are involved in this Bill which can in any way be distinguished from colonial interests? I say our interests are identical. Whatever develops the resources and contributes to the prosperity of the colonies contributes to the prosperity of the Empire; whatever strengthens them strengthens us; and no one can for a moment harbour the thought of doing anything to impede or obstruct the progress of the colonies by way of retaining them in a condition of dependent weakness. But if no Imperial interest is sacrificed by this Bill, let us see whether we can hope to improve it in the interest of the Colonies. I think the time has gone by for either the Parliament or the Government of England to attempt to teach colonies like these their interests better than they can judge of them themselves. It is now nearly 100 years since the Parliament of this country was engaged in precisely the same task for the New England States which it is now undertaking for our present North American Colonies, with the object of enabling colonies that never thought of coming here for any assistance, either in money or arms, better to defend themselves against the attacks of neighbouring Indian tribes, and even against the invasion of European armies. It is to no purpose to say that the union which afterwards took place was in antagonism to ourselves—that was simply our own fault and folly; but it is significant that the union proved its effectiveness. We have since attempted both to maintain and govern colonies from this country, but the attempt has utterly failed; and to our largest colonies within the last few years we have, without exception, given the powers of self-government. What the North American colonists ask us to do by this Bill is to extend to them the natural corollary of self-government, and to enable them by union to take upon themselves all the duties of British citizenship. But I am aware that criticisms of this scheme are not wanting; and I find that some persons object to the existence of a nominated Senate. Those critics allege that a nominated Chamber of Legislature never succeeds in our colonies, and that as regards this particular case the Canadians themselves had a nominated Chamber, and afterwards thought it advisable to substitute an elective Chamber. Strange that those who are quite willing they should have made this change cannot allow that they may have satisfactory reasons, on further experience, for returning to the system of nomination. I say nothing of what may have made the old nominated compact distasteful and the new elections intolerable; but who is the best judge? If they wish for nomination in the new plan, why should we forbid it? Another critic, who demands that the central power shall be strengthened by every possible means, says the Lieutenant Governor should be elected. I think the difficulty lies in making the central power sufficiently strong. The nomination of the Provincial Governor by the Central Power is in the interest of united government. Lastly, there are some who say that, whatever the merits of the measure, it ought not to receive the sanction of the Imperial Parliament until it has been referred again to the voice of the people. Can anything be more absurd or inexplicable, except by an utter ignorance of the subject? For instance, is Canada to be thrown back upon a General Election in order to repeat an expression of her opinion upon this subject, which she has been discussing and urging for the last twenty years? There was a General Election in 1863, and both in 1863 and 1864 the question was fully debated in the Colonial Legislature. Since that period, there have been no less than twenty-four vacancies in the Legislative Council, and every one of these has been filled up by unionists. Can any other proof be required of the sustained conviction of Canada that her interests require that the proposed union shall be carried out without unnecessary delay? Canada, indeed, has not been precipitate in this matter. She was the last to come to the conference at Quebec, and the last to come now to England. She kept the delegates of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick waiting six months before she came to this country. Therefore, the very last assertion which could be made by the Maritime Provinces against Canada would be that of precipitancy of action in urging on them this scheme of union. But no more do the other Provinces require re-consultation. New Brunswick has had an election on the subject itself, and deliberately pronounced in its favour. Nova Scotia initiated the proposition, and has had repeated elections since. I must point out that the advocates of delay are of the most remarkable kind, both personally and with respect to the nature of their arguments. The person who is most anxious for delay was the first and ablest in promoting the proposition; and what does he say? He says—"I allow something must be done. It is impossible to leave things as they are. But there is another alternative, and that is, the whole British Empire might be organized into one—Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick might meet here in Westminster, instead of having their Provincial Parliament in Ottawa." This, Sir, is a subject that has been discussed over and over again, more as a exercitation than as a practical or rational proposition. It does not require more than a moment's consideration to show that it is futile and visionary. The objections to union, then, being futile, and the only alternative proposed being visionary, I will ask the House to consider what are the palpable reasons and advantages which fully account for and justify the deliberate decisions to which these colonies have come to ask this House to sanction the terms of union to which they have agreed among themselves. The commercial advantages are, perhaps, the most prominent, and the least open to question or dispute. The idea is absurd of retaining a system of different commercial tariffs amongst these contiguous Provinces which are ruining and keeping down their trade. Why, the effect of the reciprocity treaty between the United States and Canada was to develop the commerce between these countries in one year from 2,000,000 to 20,000,000 dollars. That treaty has now ceased; but surely that is a reason why, at least amongst themselves, there should be the most perfect reciprocity. Well, then, as to their mutual interests, who can doubt that these three Provinces—the wheat-growing West, the manufactures Centre, and the fisheries and outlet on the coasts, are necessary to each other to make one great country jointly developing diverse interests. Was there ever, let me ask, a country so composed by nature to form a great and united community? By their mutual resources—by the assistance of their different interests, they would make together a powerful and prosperous nation. As long as they remain separate they are a prey to the commercial policy of other nations, and mutual jealousies among themselves. Disunion saps their liberty as well as their power, and paralyses their self-reliance. On the other hand, one united Government would be able to keep the peace, and would remove every temptation to aggression. One national Government composed of the best men out of all the Provinces, would draw out and develop the resources of the country for the common interest; and, at the same time, a combined revenue would give larger credit, and enable greater economy. I wish to read a short extract from a letter of Queen Anne to the Scotch Parliament in 1706, on the union of these two countries. It bears upon the case before us in two ways; because it not only shows the reasons for union in striking language, but is a precedent for existing Legislatures being considered able to deal with a question of this sort without any further appeal to the people. In the letter, Queen Anne said—

"An entire union will be the solid foundation of a lasting peace between you. It will remove animosities, jealousies, and differences amongst yourselves; it must increase your strength, your riches, and your trade. By this union the whole country, being joined in affection as well as resources, and free from all apprehensions of different interests, will be able to resist all its enemies. We earnestly recommend unanimity in this weighty affair, that the union may be brought to a happy conclusion. It will be the only effectual way to secure our present and future happiness, to disappoint the designs of your enemies, who will certainly use all their efforts to prevent or delay your union."

This extract is taken from the Federalist, where it is quoted by the eminent statesman who wrote that work as expressing their own views respecting the necessity of a closer union between the American States.

In conclusion, I will say that I believe and think that it is a great and grave undertaking that we are engaged in this evening. It is no less than liberating to its natural destinies of self-reliance and innate growth and expansion a large portion of the largest pastured quarter of this earth. When we remember with what rapid strides, and in how short a time, America has taken a great place among the Powers of the world, and that its vast extent and gigantic features are not yet animated by not one-hundredth part of the life which will soon replenish them, it is a serious occupation to be engaged in even having a share in the disposal of its future destinies. A large portion of this Continent is already in full vigour, and might have been so in connection with ourselves but for our own folly. I believe, however, that at heart the American people are still attached to us as brothers, though they are disposed to quarrel, as brothers often are. The rest of this large Continent, still British, is now asking us to assist them to develop their own strength and resources in retained connection and in partnership of allegiance to one common Sovereign; and confident that this House will willingly contribute its sanction to the measure now introduced in order to carry out so great a purpose, I move the second reading of this Bill, which presents for our acceptance their own proposition.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Adderley.)

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, I rise with the greatest satisfaction to support the Motion of my right hon. Friend. I have the greatest pleasure in congratulating the noble Earl now at the head of the Colonial Office and my right hon. Friend in having the honour of submitting this most satisfactory measure to the British Parliament. My right hon. Friend in his opening speech stated, what was most true, that there was no occasion during which I had the honour to hold office, when I submitted to the House any measure dealing with subjects to the consideration of which he had devoted so large a portion of his time, that he was not forward in expressing his cordial concurrence, and rendering to those who were his political opponents all the assistance in his power. I therefore rejoice to see in his hands a measure which is calculated not only to be of the greatest benefit to those whose interests are more immediately involved, but which also will prove an era in the history of the government of dependencies by a great Imperial and metropolitan country. The right hon. Gentleman has so well stated both the provisions of the measure and the arguments by which they are to be supported, and I believe the House has so unmistakably signified its concurrence in the remarks he has made, that it would only be an unpardonable waste of time were I to meet by anticipation arguments which I do not believe will be raised. I only wish, therefore, to make a few remarks in illustration and support of the arguments of my right hon. Friend. It requires, indeed, no argument to justify the intended union of these colonies. Look at the map which displays their geographical position—look at the great inland seas of Canada, and the fertile plains which border them;—look also upon the fertile plains of the United States of America that are so close to them, and to that noble river which, by the aid of mechanical science, affords opportunities to carry the produce of the Western Provinces to the sea. This alone is sufficient to show what great advantages must necessarily be derived from an union between the inland and the Maritime Provinces. Look at the shipping and timber trade of New Brunswick, the mineral wealth and commercial enterprize of Nova Scotia, and the noble harbour of Halifax, and let me ask you, Is it possible to believe that it was the intention of nature and Providence that all these great sources of wealth and power should be separate? And as they are physically conterminous, so they are morally united in the firmest and deepest attachment to the Crown of England and her institutions. This remark applies not only to those who have sprung from our own loins, and who speak our language, but also to that other people resident in Lower Canada, which is to be called in future the Province of Quebec. They yield to no other British subjects in their loyalty and attachment to the throne and to the institutions under which they live. Well, then, if you have the unanimous request of these Provinces, if you have their earnest wish and desire that these bounteous intentions of Providence should be realized, what objection can there be against it? I am, at least, certain that the House of Commons will not seek to prevent so laudable a desire from being gratified. What, let me ask you, is the country you are about to constitute if you agree to this Bill? It is a country—and here I am speaking solely of the three Provinces embraced in the measure—of nearly 400,000 square miles and 3,750,000 of inhabitants. But in speaking of it prospectively, I am not disposed to exclude the two Provinces which are not comprehended in the Bill. When I think of Newfoundland and Prince Edward's Island, and their objection to join in this arrangement, I am reminded of some of those towns which, when railways were first introduced, petitioned that they should be excluded from the benefits of railway legislation. Optantibus ipsis Di faciles. Parliament acceded to their request, and what has been the result? Why, some of them have been "out in the cold" ever since, vainly endeavouring to place themselves in the position which they had improvidently lost. That last observation, however, does not apply to Newfoundland or Prince Edward's Island, the door being left open to them to join this federation at any time, and I rejoice to see in the papers that my right hon. Friend has laid upon the table that the expression of feeling in this country and the arguments employed will, probably, not be without result. If, then, I speak of these five Provinces, what a country you are going to establish—a country greater in extent than France and

Spain united—a country which at the present moment has 4,000,000 of inhabitants, but which it is reasonably calculated, according to the ordinary rate of computation, at the end of the present century will include 12,000,000 of people—a country which, in the strength of its commercial marine, will be inferior only to Great Britain and to the United States of America, with a population superior to many of the most flourishing kingdoms of Europe. My right hon. Friend, speaking of the policy of establishing this great organization, said truly, Does it require any argument to show where will be the field for enlightened public spirit—where will be the field for honourable ambition—where is it likely that the highest intellects will be devoted to the public service—where will be shown the greatest amount of public spirit in the discharge of public duties? Will it be in a great community like this which the Bill under discussion will constitute, or in small and scattered communities like those which desire to continue no longer in their inferior and isolated condition, but wish to enter this great Confederacy? Consider the nature of the duties which these Provincial statesmen are called upon to discharge. During the time I had the honour of holding the seals of the Colonial Office duties of no merely Provincial or ordinary character were necessarily discharged by Canada. At the time when the St. Albans raid attracted so much attention and alarm in this country, what were the duties discharged by the Government of Canada and the Governor General—to whom my right hon. Friend has paid so just a tribute? The highest Executive duty was discharged by the Government of Canada when it called forth its own army to guard its own frontier. The highest judicial duties were discharged when, under your statute, they were constituted interpreters of the treaty for the extradition of offenders subsisting between you and the United States of America. The highest legislative duties were discharged when, in compliance with the suggestion of the British Crown, they passed an Act to render such raids impossible for the future. I ask you, then, if you have the statesmen of these countries necessarily discharging the highest Executive, legislative, and judicial functions, is it desirable that men exercising these duties should be the representatives of 4,000,000 of people, and should be animated by the public spirit of these

4,000,000, or that they should exercise them as the representatives of small communities such as Prince Edward's Island will continue to be, if it remains excluded from the provisions of this Bill? Again, let us consider the bearing of this measure upon the diplomatic relations of this country. Look at the disadvantages which were incurred when we were endeavouring at Washington to negotiate the renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty. The fiscal portions of the treaty, if we had succeeded, must have been submitted to five Parliaments before it could have received the Royal Assent. Is it desirable, that when the populations of these Provinces, through the representative of the Queen, negotiate treaties with foreign Powers, the adoption of these treaties should be ratified by the Parliament of one great community, or should be subject to the criticisms, and, perhaps, the local interests of five Parliaments of five different communities? Then, again, with regard to the complicated question which arose in the spring of last year between this country and the United States of America on the subject of the fisheries. These fisheries were regulated by the municipal laws of different colonies. When we had to deal with this, was it desirable in the negotiations between this country and the United States of America upon a matter of that vital importance—was it desirable that we should be required to go to several Parliaments in order to get these laws altered? Sir, no practical difficulty, I am happy to say, arose in the case; but I think all those things I have referred to are proofs of the great advantages that will accrue, both to the colonies and to the mother country, by such a scheme of consolidation as that which is proposed in the present Bill. Look, again, to the important matter of defence. My right hon. Friend has referred to the despatches which I addressed to the colonies, pointing out, that while the mother country makes the defence of the colonies a matter of Imperial concern, she still calls upon them to discharge the first duties of citizenship, to be the main agents of their own defence, and to protect their own shores. But if the colonists are thus to be the principal agents in their own defence, is it not obvious that they will be best able to discharge this duty when they are united under one government? Why is one policy to be established for Italy and Germany, and another for the Provinces of British

North America? Is union to be the general law, and yet not be the law for British North America? Is it not the law over the whole world that union is strength? Is it, therefore, not perfectly obvious that the country, which by this Bill you are to create, will be as powerful for defensive purposes as if you reject it the colonists will be powerless? Time was when it was the policy of this country to exercise a strong Imperial control over her colonies. If that policy continued, it would be unwise to pass this Bill; divide et impera would be the maxim of a country which wished to rule its colonies from home; but that policy has now passed away, and the sole object of our Colonial Government now is to have the satisfaction, pride, and pleasure of witnessing the growth, under the Crown of England—under the flag of England—of great and powerful communities attached to the mother country by no other ties than those of love and affection and a reciprocal regard, which will prove a source of strength in the hour of danger. For all these reasons I cordially support the proposal of my right hon. Friend. I admit that there is a provision not in the Bill which I should have been glad to have seen there—namely, the overriding and controlling power on the part of the Central Legislature which was given in the New Zealand Act. But I think the noble Earl at the head of the Colonial Office and my right hon. Friend are perfectly right in not pressing the question more at the present moment. It is, as he justly said, not our arrangement, but theirs. It has been made by men of great ability, patience, and temper, and they have done it with a perfect knowledge of the circumstances with which they had to deal. Even we, who do not know and cannot appreciate all these difficulties, can yet see many reasons why, on the first creation of this Confederation, it might have been impossible to have given that power. In the first place, the intercolonial railway is not completed; and though in a few years these Provinces will be physically united, still a little time must elapse before the union proposed by the Bill can be entirely accomplished and consolidated. Another reason is that it is necessary that for municipal and local purposes there should be large powers of legislation in the Provinces there. They will, I hope, gradually approach more nearly to the character of municipal institutions than the Bill at present contemplates. But even then they must continue to be more than mere municipal councils. They must discharge for the several Provinces much of that private business which is here discharged by Parliament at so much cost to the suitors and so much inconvenience to ourselves. Therefore it is well that these wise men have left it to a future time, when experience will enable them to determine how far these legislative bodies may continue to retain their inherent powers, and how far they can be reduced to the level of municipal institutions. As the matter now stands, the Bill gives to the Governor General an actual veto over every measure passed by the local Legislatures, and it allows the local Legislatures only to deal with those questions which are supposed to be matters of local concern. There is also provision in the Bill that a certain sum of money shall be allowed from the central Government to each of the Provinces for the maintenance of its institutions. If the sum be exceeded the Provinces must provide the difference by direct taxation upon its inhabitants; and if it does not equal the amount it may carry the balance to its own account for local purposes. That will be a strong inducement to the Provinces to reduce their local institutions to a moderate level. I do hope that for the reasons I have stated the House will give the Bill its cordial assent. I cannot be surprised if, in a great undertaking like this, we make a tentative arrangement which hereafter may be susceptible of such improvements as experience may suggest. The subject is one in which I take so deep an interest, and its details are so familiar to me, that I might trespass on the attention of the House, but I will not now further enlarge on the subject. My right hon. Friend has stated the particulars of the measure. I congratulate him on being the instrument of proposing a measure like this to the British Parliament; I cheerfully join him in supporting it, as I have, while in office, cordially assisted in promoting it; but the main honour is due to those who have laboured, with great patience, temper, and sagacity to bring about a plan which they believed calculated to strengthen the colonies in time of war and increase their prosperity in time of peace, and who have adopted that course, not as a preliminary to a future separation from this country, but under the influence of a loyalty to the British Crown and an attachment to British institutions which cannot be surpassed

MR. AYTOUN protested against this measure being pressed forward with such unprecedented and inconvenient haste. It had been introduced into the House of Commons only on Tuesday last, and only been placed in the hands of Members that morning; and the fact that it had been discussed in "another place" and in the newspapers was no reason why the House should be asked to proceed to a second reading without the usual notice. It might be, as had been said, that the Bill would prove very beneficial to the colonial interests—of that he could not speak—but many hon. Members were under the impression that its provisions concerned only colonial interests; but so far was this from being the case, that the 118th section would most materially affect the interests of the people of this country. That clause provided that it should be the duty of the Canadian and other local Parliaments to construct a railway from Halifax to Quebec; and if the House assented to that provision they would be bound in honour to give the Imperial guarantee to the loan which was to be raised for the purpose, upon the promise of which it was that the delegates from the colonies had undertaken the construction of this line. Now from what he had heard of the prospects of the line unless this clause was struck out, this country would have to pay the guarantee. The railway itself would be useless for military purposes, because it would pass through a strip of territory which was exposed to a flank attack, and it might at any moment be cut by the Americans, and as a commercial speculation it would, in his opinion, result in failure. Some years ago a friend of his, who was in favour of the line, admitted that its earnings would never pay for the grease of the carriage wheels. He should be glad to see the colonies united; but he should feel bound at a future stage to move the omission of the 118th clause, the retention of which would in nowise affect the general character of the measure.

MR. BRIGHT: Although this measure has not excited much interest in the House or in the country, yet it appears to me to be of such very great importance that it should be treated rather differently, or that the House should be treated rather differently in respect to it. I have never before known of any great measure affecting any large portion of the Empire or its population, which has been brought in and attempted to be hurried through Parliament in the manner in which this Bill is being dealt with. But the importance of it is much greater to the inhabitants of those Provinces than it is to us: but it is not on that account that we should be expected to examine it less closely, and see that we commit no errors in passing it. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) has not offered us, on one point, an explanation which I think he will be bound to make. This Bill does not include the whole of the British North American Provinces; I presume the two left out have been left out because it is quite clear they do not wish to come in.

MR. ADDERLEY: I am glad I can inform the hon. Gentleman that they are, one of them at least, on the point of coming in.

MR. BRIGHT: Yes; the reason of their being left out is because they were not willing to come in. They may hereafter become willing, and if so the Bill will admit them by a provision which appears reasonable. But the Province of Nova Scotia is also unwilling to come in, and it is assumed that because some time ago the Legislature of that Province voted a Resolution partly in favour of some such course, therefore the population is in favour of it. For my part, I do not believe in the propriety or wisdom of the Legislature voting on a great question of this nature with reference to the Legislature of Nova Scotia, if the people of Nova Scotia never have had the question directly put to them. I have heard there is at present in London a petition complaining of the hasty proceeding of Parliament and asking for delay, signed by 31,000 adult males of the Province of Nova Scotia, and that that petition is in reality signed by at least half of all the male inhabitants of that Province. So far as I know, the petition does not protest absolutely against union, but against the manner in which it is being carried out by this scheme and Bill, and by the hasty measures of the Colonial Office. Now, whether the scheme be a good or a bad one, scarcely anything can be more foolish, looking to the future, than that any of the Provinces should be dragged into it, either perforce, by the pressure of the Colonial Office, or by any hasty action on the part of Parliament, in the hope of producing a result which Probably the populations of those Provinces may not wish to see brought about. I understand that the General Election for the Legislature of Nova Scotia, according to the Constitution of that colony, is inevitable in the month of May or June next; that this question has never been fairly placed before the people of that Province at an election, and that it has never been discussed and decided by the public; and seeing that only three months or not so much will elapse before there will be an opportunity of ascertaining the opinions of the population of Nova Scotia, I think it is at least a hazardous proceeding to pass this Bill through Parliament, binding Nova Scotia, until the clear opinion of that Province has been ascertained. If, at a time like this, when you are proposing a union which we all hope is to last for ever, you create a little sore it will in all probability become a great sore in a short time, and it may be that the intentions of Parliament may be almost entirely frustrated by the haste with which this measure is being pushed forward. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, I think, in the early part of the evening, in answer to a question from this side, spoke of this matter as one of extreme urgency. Well, I cannot discover any urgency in the matter at all. What is urgent is this—that when done it ought to be done wisely, and with the full and free consent of all those populations who are to be bound by this Act and interested in its results. Unless the good-will of those populations is secured, in all probability the Act itself will be a misfortune rather than a blessing to the Provinces to which it refers. The right hon. Gentleman amused me in one part of his speech. He spoke of “the filial piety”—rather a curious term—of these Provinces, and their great anxiety to make everything suit the ideas of this country; and this was said particularly with reference to the proposition for a Senate selected, not elected, for life by the Governor General of Canada. He said they were extremely anxious to follow, as far as possible, the institutions of the mother country. Well, I have not the smallest objection to any people on the face of the earth following our institutions if they like them. Institutions which suit one country, as we all know, are not very likely to suit every other country. With regard to this particular case, the right hon. Gentleman said it is to be observed that Canada had had a nominated Council, and had changed it for an elected one, and surely they had a right, if they pleased, to go back from an elected Council to a nominated Council. Well, nobody denies that; but nobody pretends that the people of Canada prefer a nominated Council to an elected Council. And all the wisdom of the wise men to whom the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) has referred in such glowing terms, unless the experience of present and past times goes for nothing, is but folly if they have come to the conclusion that a nominated Council on that Continent must be better than an elected Council. Still, if they wish it, I should not interfere and try to prevent it. But I venture to say that the clause enabling the Governor General and his Cabinet to put seventy men in that Council for life, inserts into the whole scheme the germ of a malady which will spread, and which before very long will require an alteration of this Act and of the constitution of this new Confederation. But the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that with regard to the Representative Assembly—which, I suppose, is to be called according to his phrase the House of Commons—they have adopted a very different plan. There they did not follow the example of this country. They established their House of Representatives directly upon the basis of population. They adopted the system which prevails in the United States, by which upon every ten years' summing up of the census in that country the number of Members may be changed, and is by law changed, in the different States and districts as the rate of population may have changed. Therefore, in that respect his friends in Canada have not adopted the principle which prevails in this country, but that which prevails in the United States. Well, I believe they have done that which was right, and which they had a right to do, and which was inevitable there. I regret very much that they have not adopted another system with regard to their Council or Senate, because I am satisfied—I have not a particle of doubt with regard to it—that we run a great danger of making this Act work ill almost from the beginning. They have the example of thirty-six States in the United States, in which the Senate is elected, and no man, however sanguine, can hope that seventy-two stereotyped provincial Peers in Canada will correspond and work harmoniously with a body elected upon a system so wide and so general as that which prevails in the States of the American Union. There is one point about which the right hon. Gentleman said nothing, and which I think is so very important that the right hon. Member for Oxford, his predecessor in office, might have told us something about it. We know that Canada is a great country, and we know that the population is, or very soon will be, something like 4,000,000, and we may hope that, united under one Government, the Province may be more capable of defence. But what is intended with regard to the question of defence? Is this new State—or this new nation, as I think Lord Monck described it—to be raised up under the authority of an Act of Parliament—is everything to be done for it? Is it intended to garrison its fortresses by English troops? At the present moment there are, I believe, in the Province 12,000 or 15,000 men. There are persons in this country, and there are some also in the North American Provinces, who are ill-natured enough to say that not a little of the loyalty that is said to prevail in Canada has its price. I think it is natural and reasonable to hope that there is in that country a very strong attachment to this country. But if they are to be constantly applying to us for guarantees for railways and for fortresses, and for works of defence; if everything is to be given to a nation independent in everything except Lord Monck and his successors, and except in the contributions we make for these public objects, then I think it would be far better for them and for us—cheaper for us and less demoralizing for them—that they should become an independent State—and maintain their own fortresses, fight their own cause, and build up their own future without relying upon us. And when we know, as everybody knows, that the population of Canada, family for family, is in a much better position as regards the comforts of home than family for family are in the great bulk of the population of this country—I say the time has come when it ought to be clearly understood that the taxes of England are no longer to go across the ocean to defray expenses of any kind within the Confederation which is about to be formed. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies has never been an advocate for great expenditure in the colonies by the mother country. On the contrary, he has been one of the Members of this House who have distinguished themselves by what I will call an honest system to the mother country, and what I believe is a wise system to the colonies. But I think that when a measure of this kind is being passed, having such stupendous results upon the condition and the future population of these great colonies, we have a right to ask that there should be some consideration for the revenue and for the taxpayers of this country. In discussing this Bill with the delegates from the Provinces, I think it was the duty of the Colonial Secretary to have gone fairly into this question, and, if possible, to have arranged it to the advantage of the colony and the mother country. I believe there is no delusion greater than this—that there is any party in the United States that wishes to commit any aggression upon Canada, or to annex Canada by force to the United States. There is not a part of the world, in my opinion, that runs less risk of aggression than Canada, except with regard to that foolish and impotent attempt of certain discontented not-long-ago subjects of the Queen, who have left this country. America has no idea of anything of the kind. No American statesman, no American political party, ever dreamt for a moment of an aggression upon Canada, or of annexing Canada by force. And therefore, every farthing that you spend on your fortresses, and all that you do with the idea of shutting out American aggression, is money squandered through an hallucination which we ought to get rid of. I have not risen for the purpose of objecting to the second reading of this Bill. Under the circumstances, I presume it is well that we should do no other than read it a second time. But I think the Government ought to have given a little more time. I think they have not treated the Province of Nova Scotia with that tenderness, that generosity, and that consideration which is desirable when you are about to make so great a change in its affairs and in its future. For my share, I want the population of these Provinces to do that which they believe to be the best for their own interests—remain with this country if they like, in the most friendly manner, or become independent States if they like. If they should prefer to unite themselves with the United States, I should not complain even of that. But whatever be their course, there is no man in this House or in those Provinces who has a more sincere wish for their greatness and their welfare than I have, who have taken the liberty thus to criticize this Bill.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I have seldom heard an observation in the House with greater regret than that of the hon. Member for Birmingham when he said, a few moments ago, that he thought the loyalty of Canada has its price. [Mr. BRIGHT: I did not state that as my opinion.] I do not know whether the hon. Member stated it as his opinion; but certainly he stated it in such a way as to leave a very painful impression on the minds of the House; and I am sure that in the colonies a most painful impression would be created if it went forth that the House of Commons for a moment believed the loyalty of Canada has its price. Sir, we have not forgotten the events in which the loyalty of Canada was strikingly displayed. We have not forgotten the way in which, at the time of the Crimean War, the Patriotic Fund was swollen by contributions from the colonies, and on that occasion no colonies were more conspicuous than the North American Provinces. We have not forgotten the spirit with which the colony of Canada raised a regiment at a time when it was supposed that additional troops might be required. The Canadians, on those and other occasions, have acted with a most honourable and loyal spirit; and therefore, in the face of such facts, I regret the hon. Gentleman has used an expression which, whatever may have been his intention, is so obviously liable to be misunderstood. I may further observe that I believe, if any one feeling has been stronger than another with Canada in taking the part she has done in obtaining this Bill, it is a feeling of attachment and loyalty to the mother country. I do not collect from the speech of the hon. Gentleman that he is opposed to this Bill—on the contrary, I think he concluded his speech by saying he would not oppose the second reading; but the hon. Gentleman throughout his argument seemed to be contending for delay. He appeared to think that this was not the moment when this Bill ought to be put forward. Now, it seems to me that if ever there was a favourable conjuncture of affairs for bringing about a union of the North American Provinces, it is at the present moment. I cannot see that in his views concerning Nova Scotia the hon. Member for Birmingham is borne out by the facts. The best way of collecting the opinions of the Province on a question of this kind is, I should say, through the acts of its Legislature—through the proceedings of its representative body; and the hon. Gentleman is the last person from whom I should have expected an objection to our ascertaining the opinion of the Province from the sentiments of its representative body. [Mr. BRIGHT: It has not been elected on this question.] But the hon. Gentleman must recollect that this union of the North American Provinces has been the subject of discussion and of proceedings in the different colonies for a long time. The union of Nova Scotia with the other Provinces has been discussed on several different occasions. In 1862, I think, debates took place on this question, and the Representative Assembly was called on to express its opinion. It did so by deciding in favour of a union of the Provinces. In 1863 a General Election took place, and again in 1864, after that General Election, we find the representative body still favourable to the union. These are facts which, in my opinion, at once destroy the argument of the hon. Gentleman. I know that there has been opposition in Nova Scotia. Mr. Howe, a gentleman well known in the colony, is opposed to the union, and the hon. Member for Birmingham is to-night the exponent of Mr. Howe's views. But I would remind the hon. Member that the views on the subject entertained by Mr. Howe a short time ago were the very opposite to those held by him now. No man in Nova Scotia was a more prominent advocate of the union than Mr. Howe, though he opposes it now. The hon. Member for Birmingham proceeded to argue that as two of the Provinces are not included in the Bill, it must be presumed that they are opposed to the union. I believe, however, the facts to be this—that one of those Provinces is negotiating for an entry into the union, and that the other is prepared to do so at the earliest opportunity. It appears to me that the hon. Member's appeal for delay is grounded on an entirely erroneous argument, and that he has not approached it with that frankness and candour which characterized the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford. We must not forget that, with great judgment, the Provinces selected statesmen of opposite political parties to represent them as their delegates in this matter. Such delegates may be regarded as men who fairly represent the opinion of the Provinces; and, under such circumstances, I trust this Bill will receive the unanimous approval of the House.

Mr. WATKIN said, he fully concurred in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington), that the House of

Sir John Pakington

Representatives and the Senate of Nova Scotia had approved the scheme of Confederation. The Representative Body approved it in 1861, not 1862, as the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty had stated. There was a General Election in 1863, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Tupper) went through the country preaching this Confederation of the Provinces. It was brought under the notice of the electors at every polling-booth, and at every hustings the issue was distinctly raised. Well, after that General Election, the plan of the Government was sustained by an enormous majority in the House of Representatives, and delegates were sent to the Conference to carry out the plan. If there was any question on which the British North American Provinces not only had enjoyed an opportunity of expressing, but had actually expressed opinion, it was on this very question of Confederation. Mention having been made of the name of Mr. Howe, whose acquaintance he had the honour of possessing, he might state his own conviction that a man of purer patriotism, or one who had rendered more able and distinguished service to the Crown of this country did not exist. He remembered the speech delivered by Mr. Howe some years ago at Detroit, on the question of whether the Reciprocity Treaty should be continued or not, and he believed it was in no small degree owing to that remarkable speech—one of the most eloquent ever heard—that the unanimous verdict in favour of continuing the treaty had been arrived at. It was matter of surprise and regret to him that the valuable and life-long services of Mr. Howe had not received any recognition at the hands of either the late or the present Government. The hon. Member for Birmingham seemed dissatisfied with the phrase used by Lord Monck respecting the establishment of a new nation. Now he (Mr. Watkin) supported the Confederation, not because it was the establishment of a new nation, but as the confirmation of an existing nation. It meant this, that the people of the Confederated colonies were to remain under the British Crown—or it meant nothing. He joined issue with those who said, "Let the colonies stand by themselves." He dissented from the view that they were to separate from the control of the British Crown the territory of this enormous Confederation. But there was a vast tract beyond Canada, extending to the Pacific, and the House should bear in mind that more than half of North America was under British dominion. Did the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) think that it was best for civilization and for public liberty that this half of the Continent should be annexed to the United States? If that were the opinion of the hon. Gentleman he did not think it was the opinion of that House. Every man of common sense knew that these territories could not stand by themselves; they must either be British or American—under the Crown or under the Stars and Stripes. The hon. Member for Birmingham might think that we should be the better of losing all territorial connection with Canada; but he could not agree with that doctrine. Extent and variety were amongst the elements of Imperial greatness. Descending to the lowest and most material view of the subject, he did not believe that, as a mere money question, the separation would be for our interest. Take, again, the question of defence. Our North American possessions had a coast line of 1,000 miles on the east, and 800 on the west, and possessed some of the finest harbours on the Continent, and a Mercantile Marine entitling it to the third rank among maritime nations. The moment these advantages passed into the hands of the United States that country would become the greatest naval Power in the world. In preserving commercial relations with the United States, the Canadian frontier line of 3,000 miles was likewise extremely useful. As long as British power and enterprise extended along one side of this boundary line, and as long as the tariff of extremely light duties was kept up by us, and that imposed only for the purposes of revenue, it would be impossible for the United States to pursue what might be called a Japanese policy. If England, therefore, desired to maintain her trade, even apart from other considerations, it was desirable for her to maintain her North American possessions. They had lately had to pass through a cotton famine, and they had been taught the inconvenience of the prohibition of the export of cotton by the American Government. Now a large proportion of the corn imported into this country was brought from America, and in what state would England find herself if all the food exports of North America were placed under the control of the Government at Washington? If the frontier line became the sea-coast, what might be looked for then? Scarcely three years had elapsed since Mr. Cobden declared that if there had not been a plentiful harvest in America he did not know where food could have been procured for the people of this country. Now, the corn-growing fields of Upper Canada alone ranked fifth in point of productiveness. Did England not wish to preserve this vast storehouse? Suppose that Canada belonged to America, in the event of a quarrel with England there was nothing to prevent the United States from declaring that not an ounce of food should leave its territories, which would then extend from the Arctic regions to the Gulf of Mexico. He had hoped that upon this Bill, not only both sides of the House, but every section of the House might have been found in unison. It was no use blinking the question. This would not be a decision affecting Canada merely. We had sympathies alike with Australia and the other colonies. If it were seriously proposed that England should denude herself of her possessions, give up India, Australia, North America, and retire strictly within the confines of her own islands, to make herself happy there, the same result might be brought about much more easily by those who wished it. They might become citizens of some small country like Holland, and realize their ideas of happiness in a moment. But he hesitated to believe that the people of England did really favour any such policy. If any one were to hoist the motto, "Severance of the colonies from the Crown" he did not believe that 1 per cent of the people would adopt it. He believed that the people of England felt a deep attachment to their Empire, and that not even a barren rock, over which the flag of England had once waved, would be abandoned by them without a cogent and sufficient reason. Every argument used in support of the necessity of giving up the Provinces, which lay within eight days of our own shores, would apply with equal force in the case of Ireland, if the people of the United States chose to demand possession. Was this country prepared to give up Gibraltar, Malta, Heligoland, all its outlying stations merely because some strong Power took a fancy to them? He did not believe that the people of England would ever act in such a spirit. As to the argument of expense, if Canada chose to pick a quarrel on her own account, clearly she ought to pay the bill; but if she were involved in war on Imperial considerations, then he maintained that the Imperial revenues might properly be resorted to. The British Empire was one and indivisible, or it was nothing. And what was the principle upon which the United States acted? If any portion of the territory of the Union was touched, were there one of its citizens who would not be ready and forward to defend it? Should we then be less determined to maintain intact the greatness and the glory of the British Empire? He, for one, would not give up the opinion that Englishmen were prepared to maintain, in its integrity, the greatness and glory of the Empire; and that such a feeling would find a hearty response in that House.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, he did not regret that the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had made the speech they had heard that night, as it had elicited so conclusive a reply from the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and because they had at last arrived at what the real opinions of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham were. The hon. Member had, in the first instance, cast doubts upon the loyalty of the people of Canada; and, having done so, he concluded his speech by an expression of opinion that we ought to sacrifice our colonies, and said that England would be as well without them. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the defences of Canada. Now, if there was one thing more honourable than another to the Canadians, and to those who now represented Canada in this country, it was the fact that the only danger Canada ran of a collision with the United States must invariably arise from Imperial questions. The Trent difficulty, the Enlistment question, and the dispute about the Oregon territory, were all Imperial questions, and were therefore questions upon which this country was bound to step forward to the protection of Canada. To what, in a great degree, was our greatness owing? It was our manufactures that had made us the greatest country in the world—the conquerors of the conqueror:—and to what was the growth of our manufactures so much due as to our colonies? [“No, no!”] Did the House suppose that England would ever have been so powerful on the seas, had it not been for our colonies? He thought that the noble Lord at the head of the Colonial Office, his right hon. Friend who had introduced the measure, and also the late Government, were entitled to great credit for the ability, assiduity, and care with which they had promoted a measure which was calculated to be so beneficial, not only to the colonies, but to the mother country. He would concur in expressing his congratulation on the admirable judgment displayed by the colonists themselves in this matter. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham had stated that the majority of the people of Nova Scotia were opposed to this Confederation; but he (Mr. B. Cochrane) doubted whether that was ever their feeling.

MR. BRIGHT: What I said was, that there was a petition in London from 31,000 of the people of Nova Scotia, and that that number amounted to one-half of the adult males of that colony.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: If the hon. Gentleman would refer to the papers he would find that the sentiments of those colonists had very much changed. He had seen it stated that the Governor of Maine had expressed his disapprobation of this scheme of Confederation; and he believed that that expression of opinion by the Governor of Maine had had a very great effect in opening the eyes of the people of Nova Scotia, and had made it appear to them that this Confederation would be beneficial to the colony. There were one or two points, connected with this Bill, which he thought were open to some discussion. He understood from his right hon. Friend, or rather from the noble Earl at the head of the Colonial Office, that, as the Bill was a kind of compact between the colonies, the House could not alter it at all; for, if they touched any part of it, the alteration would affect the whole of the measure. Now he (Mr. B. Cochrane) did not see how that could be: and he would remind his right hon. Friend that there were parts of the Bill which were not quite clear. He would ask, whether the Governor General would be appointed for life? [“No!”] The Bill did not state for what period the Governor General would hold his office, and he would suggest that a constant change would be a very great disadvantage to the colony. Another important point was this—it appeared that the Lieutenant Governors were to be appointed by the Governor General. He regretted that very much; because they all knew how important it was that the Lieutenant Governors should be persons of position and distinction. It would have been better if there had been a provision that the Lieutenant Governors should be appointed by the Crown. He must say upon this occasion, when such an arrangement as proposed by the Bill was about to be carried out, they ought not to lose sight of the fact that the tariff imposed by Canada had been excessively high. The ad valorem duty upon imports from this country to Canada was, some time ago, 25 per cent; while New Brunswick imposed only 12½ per cent upon her imports. It was true that Canada had reduced the ad valorem duty to 15 per cent upon her imports; but he thought the people of this country might fairly claim that when they were giving to Canada almost perfect independence—with the exception of the appointment of the Governor General—and paying a large expense for troops and other things in the defence of the colony, and guaranteeing the construction of railways, the ad valorem duty upon goods from this country should not be excessive. He threw out these considerations, although he feared, from what had been said, that they could not make any alterations in the Bill. He thought that, upon the whole, they might congratulate themselves upon the heartiness with which these four colonies had entered into this arrangement. As to Prince Edward's Island and Newfoundland, they occupied quite a different position. It was true that Prince Edward's Island was near to Nova Scotia; but Newfoundland was at a great distance from that colony, and there was a very small connecting link between them and the Confederating colonies. But their joining the Confederation was not a question of immediate interest. What was of interest was this—that when persons had been going about the country, trying to make Englishmen believe that England would be as great a country without her colonies as with them, they found that the colonists themselves had, by joining in this great Confederation, entered their protest against doctrines which, if carried out, would not only be injurious to the material interests of the country, but be destructive of the greatness of this Empire in the counsels of Europe.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that as it had been his fortune for some years to take an official and personal interest in colonial affairs, he was unwilling to allow this great measure, upon the successful introduction of which he congratulated his right hon. Friend opposite, to pass without remark. The occasion was one for congratulation both to our fellow-subjects in North America and ourselves. The people of Canada, a name rightly retained for the Confederation, would continue to enjoy all the rights and privileges of British citizenship, and would also become members of a great community with larger opportunities for social and political distinction and a promise of more rapid growth in wealth and strength. On the other hand, he thought, too, this measure was matter for congratulation for ourselves, not only because we were by this great measure giving effect to the wishes and promoting the happiness of our fellow-subjects in North America, but because we were now enabling them to perform much more effectually than heretofore the duties they owed towards the great Empire of which they continued to form a part. This great change would make no change in the relations between the mother country and her great dependencies. The duties which devolved upon her now would rest with her still, and those duties might possibly, though he hoped not probably, become most difficult and dangerous; they were duties, nevertheless, from which she had no right to shrink; at the same time, this measure would fit the colonists, by a rapid development of resources and of public spirit, for taking their rightful share in the performance of these duties. One point required to be carefully watched—he referred to our military expenditure in North America. The accounts procured, some eight or ten years back, by the Committee upon Military Defences in our Colonies, showed that while our military expenditure was decreasing in places like the Cape and New Zealand it had very largely increased in North America. Mr. Merivale, a most competent authority, reckoned that in 1858 our military expenditure in colonies to which we sent troops, not as a protection against Native tribes, but against possible external attack (these being, almost exclusively, our North American colonies), amounted to £400,000 a year, whereas the Estimate for the present year for British North America alone amounted to £950,000. No doubt this large expenditure was due to exceptional causes, such as the circumstances which had arisen in the neighbouring States, and the curse of that Fenianism which the Canadians had so effectually silenced within their own borders, and so gallantly repelled from without. They might hope that these exceptional causes would pass away; but it was of importance to remember that we were now placing our colonists in a position to play their part in the defence of their own territory more effectually than they had hi-thereto done. He trusted and believed that to-night would be the birth of a large British community in North America, which they might hope, whether in union with this country or at any distant day separate from it, would continue in their prosperous career in cordial friendship not only with the mother country but with the great neighbouring people of the same race as themselves; and they might also hope that Canada in her prosperous history would follow in the happy footsteps of the people of the United States; but that that history might not be disfigured by the follies and misfortunes which had sometimes marked the relations between the United States and Great Britain.

MR. HADFIELD desired to know why Nova Scotia should not be left out of this Bill. The people of that colony had not approved of it; but their General Election would shortly take place, and then if they approved of the measure they could have the benefit of it. The right hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Admiralty had taunted the hon. Member for Birmingham with saying that the people of Canada had their price, and the right hon. Gentleman who spoke last had shown that Canada had cost this country this year for military expenses £950,000. He thought that a Bill of such great importance ought not to be pushed through Parliament with such haste. It was read a third time in the House of Lords only on Tuesday night, and two days after they were called to give it a second reading in that House. That was a bad precedent to establish, and might produce ill effects at another time. If the Bill had been delayed only for a few weeks the people of Nova Scotia would have been able to express an opinion upon it. He had not had time to consider either the Bill itself or the papers on the subject which had been put into his hands.

MR. MARSH desired only to make one suggestion—he thought it would have been better that the Lieutenant Governors should be appointed directly by the Crown, and not by the Governor of the Confederation, for in that case the men appointed would be less likely to be objectionable on local grounds. As far as Nova Scotia was concerned, it would have been better to have waited a little time until they should have learnt the result of the General Election upon this particular point; and even if unwilling at first, he had no doubt the people of that Province would come into the Confederation afterwards, just as those States of America which did not join the Union in the beginning afterwards came in. He wished to say one word as to our military expenditure in colonies. Hon. Gentlemen were not, perhaps, aware that the protection of our trade cost very much more in places which were not colonies than in those which were. For instance, our expenditure in the Mediterranean, China, Japan, and South America for the protection of our trade was enormous; while it was very light as regarded our great trade with Canada and the Australian colonies.

DUTY ON DOGS BILL.

[BILL 36.] COMMITTEE.

Clause 1 (From and after 5th April, 1867, in England, and 24th May, 1867, in Scotland, Assessed Taxes on Dogs to cease.)

MR. READ said, he should feel obliged if the Secretary to the Treasury would give the House some of his reasons for reducing the duty on dogs. The greyhound was a useful animal, no doubt, but he saw no reason why the duty payable for a greyhound should be reduced 75 per cent, nor why the tax upon poodles and pug dogs should be reduced from 12s. to 5s. The real difficulty experienced in collecting the dog tax in rural districts was the number of exemptions. Then, again, the proposed transfer to the Excise of the collection of the tax could not be in consequence of a desire to lessen the expense, for he believed that no taxes were collected at so cheap a rate as the assessed taxes, as the cost of collection amounted only to 3d. in the pound. Unless the police were employed he did not see how the Exciseman could collect this tax. In his opinion, if all exemptions from the payment of the tax were abolished, and the present machinery was kept up for the purposes of collection, the existing duty might be kept up on sporting and fancy dogs. A large increase in the revenue, and a cure for the dog nuisance, would be the result.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

MR. MARSH hoped that the collection of all the assessed taxes would be transferred to the Excise; but he doubted whether 5s. was a sum sufficiently large to secure the collection. He trusted that his hon. Friend had considered whether under the reduced duty he would get as much money as he did at present, for if he calculated upon twelve dogs being kept in future where five were kept now, that would be a great nuisance. One could hardly have an idea as to the nuisance dogs were where there was no dog tax. In Australia he had several times endorsed petitions from the inhabitants praying that a tax might be imposed; and every one would admit that the nuisance must be very great indeed when people, in order to get rid of it, asked that they might be taxed. Then in Ireland it was universally admitted that dogs were a nuisance. The curs which abounded in that country bit children, flew at horses, killed sheep, and did all kinds of mischief. Indeed, most of the evil deeds laid to the account of the innocent fox were in reality the work of these curs.

MR. HUNT said, the Government proposed to do away with all exemptions, and to make no distinction between different kinds of dogs. His hon. Friend thought that sporting dogs should be rated higher than sheep dogs; but then the question arose, "What is a sporting dog?" Supposing a man was found walking upon another person's land accompanied by his dog, he would say, "Oh! this is a pet dog or a lap dog;" although if an inquiry were made about the dog when he was lying quietly before the fire in his master's house, the reply might be, "That is a most valuable sporting dog." Again, it would be difficult to say exactly what was a greyhound. There were sporting dogs which some people would term lurchers, though their masters, when they took them to a coursing match, would describe them as greyhounds. Thus dogs would be described differently, according to the circumstances in which their owners were placed when the character of their dogs was called in question. The Government, therefore, thought it would be better that no exemptions should be allowed, and that no distinction should be made between different classes of dogs. At present the duty was 12s., and when the tax was high there would, of course, be considerable evasions, which, to a great extent, were sanctioned by public opinion. When, however, the tax was reduced to 5s., he hoped public opinion would be in favour of the tax collector. As regards the transfer of the jurisdiction from the assessed tax collector to the Excise, the House was aware that under the present system a return was made one year, but the person making it did not become answerable until the year following. So that if a question were raised about the age of a dog, a difficulty was experienced, as in many instances the most clever man could hardly tell in the succeeding year whether the animal was under six months old a twelvemonth before. It was believed that the tax would be collected upon a great number of dogs which were now exempt, or which evaded the duty, and that the revenue would not suffer from the reduction. The Government found that a Bill had been prepared by their predecessors transferring the duty from the assessed taxes to the Excise, and fixing the amount at 6s.; but they thought this rather too high, and believed that, considering the abolition of exemptions, it might be reduced to 5s.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK inquired whether an addition to the Excise staff would be required by this collection of the duty being imposed on them?

MR. HUNT said, no addition would be required. Notices would be published in every parish stating where licenses were to be procured, and the police would be required to give information of what dogs were kept.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Assessed Tax on Dogs kept within the year ending 5th April, 1867, in England, and 24th May, 1867, in Scotland, reduced to Seven Shillings.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK reminded the hon. Gentleman of the Asylum recently established in the metropolis for Destitute Dogs, and asked whether it was intended to levy the tax upon that institution, in which he was told there were about 3,000 dogs?

MR. AYRTON inquired whether the hon. Gentleman had considered the case of the dealers in dogs? It appeared to him that there ought to be an express provision to meet that case.

MR. HUNT said, the question as to charitable institutions had been raised some years ago, and a strong opinion was expressed that they should be exempted from taxation. But he was not aware that the feeling extended to the case of the canine charitable institution. He took it that if any persons became owners of dogs within the meaning of the Act, even for charitable purposes, they would be required to pay the tax. The dog-dealers would, of course, have to pay under this Bill; but as dog-dealers were at present liable for the largest number of dogs they kept in the year, he thought that they would be rather benefited in the reduction of the duty by this measure than otherwise.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 (Duties of Excise to be paid on Dogs) agreed to.

Clause 4 (Duties and Licences to be under the Management of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.)

MR. CANDLISH asked what were the powers under the Excise laws of modifying or reducing penalties? The penalty for evading the tax—£5—was too much—he would move that it be reduced to £2.

MR. HUNT said, under the General Excise Act all the Excise penalties might be reduced to one-fourth the amount stated. The penalty of £5, therefore, might be reduced to 25s. at the discretion of the magistrates before whom the case was heard. It frequently happened that the magistrates thought in some cases that even one-fourth was too much. Under such circumstances, it was usual for the bench to make a representation to the authorities at Somerset House for a further reduction of the penalty, and then the application might be granted.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Licences to be in such form as the Commissioners shall direct), and Clause 6 (Register of Licences to be kept) agreed to.

Clause 7 (Commissioners to cause Notices to be affixed on Church Doors) agreed to.

Clause 8 (Penalties for keeping a Dog without a Licence.)

MR. CANDLISH thought the penalty of £5 much too high, and moved that £2 should be inserted in the clause instead. He also considered the wording of the clause somewhat obscure, and would move after the word "pounds" the insertion of the words "for every dog so kept."

MR. MARSH did not think the penalty too high, particularly when it was recollected that there was £50 penalty for not putting a penny stamp to a receipt for money over £2.

MR. HUNT was of opinion that if the penalty were lowered parties would be tempted to run the risk of evading the tax. The prosecutions would be left in the hands of the Excise.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK had every reason to believe that the difficulty in the way of the collector was to obtain the tax from the poor man.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 (Penalty [of £5] for not producing the Licence when demanded by the Excise Officer.)

MR. HUNT moved the addition of the words "or Police Constable" after "Officer of Excise."

MR. AYRTON said, there ought to be a provision that the Excise or the police should have the power of killing dogs for which no owner could be found. Under the Act, if a humane person fed a stray dog that was dying of starvation, he would be treated as the owner, and be liable to the duty or the penalty. The result would be that dogs would die of starvation after doing all sorts of mischief.

MR. HUNT said, it was to be hoped that persons would be indisposed to take a strange dog home and feed it, when it was known they made themselves liable to the duty. The Government in this Bill only treated the fiscal question. The subject of killing dogs for which no owner could be found might be dealt with hereafter.

MR. CHILDERS said, he approved of the Bill, not only as to its general object, but as to nearly all its details. It had been the intention of the late Government to introduce a Bill with almost identical clauses. That Bill contained a provision which this Bill did not, under which it was possible for the officers of Excise and the police to take up dogs which were not properly licensed, and either to sell or kill them under proper restrictions. When a licence was taken out it would bear a particular Excise number, and it was provided that when a dog was away from its master, unless it had a collar bearing that Excise number, it should be liable to be seized. The officers of revenue thought such a proposal reasonable, and anticipated no difficulty in working it. His hon. Friend, legislating for the subject in the cooler months of the year, had left out this provision from the Bill; but last Session during the dog-days a pressure had been brought to bear upon the late Government from all sides of the House to make some provision to meet the case of ownerless dogs. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would introduce into the Bill some clause of this nature, for if he did not he would be sure to hear something of it when the dog-days came round.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that many persons kept dogs who were not able to pay the tax, and he wished to know what was to be done with those dogs. It would be necessary to enforce the law in some way.

MR. HUNT said, it was quite true that in the Bill prepared by the late Government every dog, except a sporting dog, was required to bear a ticket, which should be a voucher that its master had paid the license duty. He did not approve of this sporting exemption, and the very fact of there being such an exemption showed that the system could not work.

MR. CHILDERS said, the provision of the Bill was not an exemption; but dogs out with their masters, or being one of a pack of hounds, were not to be required to carry a ticket.

MR. HUNT said, that when he came into office he had to look into this question as a practical man, and to say whether the owner of a dog that had lost his ticket ought to be liable to have the dog destroyed. A boy in the street might wrench it off, or two dogs might fight together, for "'tis their nature to," and one might get the other's ticket in his mouth and run off with it. The ticket, too, would involve the necessity for a collar, and that would be an additional burden for the poor man, who would have to pay for the collar as well as the duty. He could not therefore bring himself to defend the ticket system. He had had to consider the question whether, if a dog during the year were transferred from one person to another, one license should be paid between them. He thought it advisable that every person should pay the license if he kept a dog for only a portion of the year. It was the intention of his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to consider the question of police regulations respecting dogs, and he hoped to submit to the House in the course of the Session some proposal on the subject.

MR. CHILDERS explained that the proposal of the late Government simply was that dogs found about the streets, without owners or without collars, should be liable to be taken to the police-station and kept there for a certain number of hours.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Act not to apply to Dogs under Age of Six Months.)

MR. READ proposed that three months should be inserted instead of six.

MR. HUNT supported the clause as it stood. Many persons were in the habit of breeding dogs, either to make presents of them or for sale, and as it was not thought that they should be made to pay duty for them, the limit of six months had been proposed.

MR. MARSH said, that puppies began to be dogs at three months old, and people then made presents of them to their friends.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

CONSIDERATION AS AMENDED.

Order for Consideration as amended read.

MR. HUNT said, that when this Bill was last upon the Order of the Day he stated that he was in hopes that he should be able to-night to state the exact day upon which the new scale of duties and drawbacks would come into force. Since then communications had been made to the other Powers that were parties to the Convention, and though France and Belgium had expressed their willingness to give effect to the arrangement at once, an unexpected difficulty had arisen with regard to Holland. At the Conference of September it was recorded in a Minute that the alterations should take place on the 1st of May, or at an earlier day, in case Great Britain should have sooner obtained legislative sanction for the modifications that would be required in her Customs duties. The Government, therefore, anticipated no delay on the part of other countries; but as the Declaration signed in November at Paris mentioned the 1st of May as the latest on which the alterations must come into effect, it was in the power of the Dutch Government to delay the changes in her tariff to that date. Her Majesty's Government had that day learnt from the Hague that the 1st of April was the earliest day that the Government there could fix upon, and this only on certain conditions as to floating cargoes. Her Majesty's Government required a few day's time to confer with the other Powers who were parties to the Convention as to the effect of these conditions, and whether England could accede to them; but the House must understand that under no circumstances could the change be made before April 1. On Monday he hoped to state whether that day would be fixed upon, or whether they must postpone the alteration until the latest day named in the Declaration—namely, May 1.

MR. CRUM-EWING regretted the hitch which had taken place, and thought the Dutch had got the better of our Government considerably. He acknowledged the courtesy and attention shown in that matter by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt); but he believed they would have these hitches occurring continually as long as the sugar duties continued in their present anomalous state.

Consideration, as amended, deferred till Monday next.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM— REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE.

Order for Committee to consider the Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45, read.

MR. HIBBERT asked, whether it was the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to bring forward his Reform Bill on Thursday next?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I stated on Tuesday that at the earliest moment I would state to the House the day on which I hoped to be able to bring forward the Reform Bill; and at that time I thought it was not improbable that on Thursday next it might be brought forward. I was not certain as to the day, and I said it was then impossible to bind myself to any particular day, but that I would give fair notice to the House; and I will give it fair notice.

COUNSEL TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA BILL—[Bill 51.] (Mr. Selwyn, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Coleridge.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SELWYN, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that as there was no notice of opposition from any quarter, he need not make any lengthened statement in introducing it. The Bill was rendered necessary by a recent decision of an Election Committee of that House, which had held that by the combined operation of the statute of Queen Anne, and that of 1858, transferring the dominion of India to the Crown, the person holding the office of Standing Counsel to the Secretary of State for India was precluded from sitting in that House. That exclusion did not apply to the Standing Counsel of the Admiralty, inasmuch as the late Mr. Phinn and the late Solicitor General both sat in the House while holding the office; and the present Counsel to the Admiralty (Mr. Huddleston) was then sitting in the House as Member for Canterbury; nor was it understood when the Act of 1858 passed, to apply to the holder of this very office, for its then holder, Mr. Wigram, sat at the time of its passing, and for some time afterwards, as Member for the University of Cambridge; and no one questioned his right to do so, while those who were intended to be excluded—that is, the Members of the Council, were expressly excluded by the Act. This exclusion was therefore at once an accident, and an anachronism. He would not dwell on the legal attainments or literary eminence of the learned Gentleman (Mr. Forsyth) who now held the office, lest he should be suspected of excessive partiality—he would rather rest his advocacy of this measure on the convenience of the House. On Friday last they had a long and interesting discussion on the construction of Indian treaties, and a question was soon to be brought forward respecting the tenure of land in India. These discussions, he believed, would become more frequent as our connection and commercial and social intercourse with India grew, and as the Native Princes came over, as he hoped they would, to this country, for education; and it was extremely desirable that a gentleman who, from his professional practice, must be familiar with the questions that would thus from time to time arise, should be a Member of that House, to supply the special information the House might desire. But he would put it on the still higher ground—advantage to the public service. It was an office the emoluments of which were not large, but which it was very desirable should be filled by a man of ability; and if in addition to the smallness of the salary, they were to say that its holder should be disqualified from that object of honourable ambition, a seat in that House, he was afraid the choice of the Secretary of State for India would be limited to a very narrow range. For these reasons he hoped the House would assent to the second reading of the Bill. The only objection he had ever heard to the measure was that it did not go far enough, and that there were a great many other cases of exclusion which might be properly dealt with. He would admit the force of that argument if the Bill were proposed by the Government, but he had confined himself to such a measure as he thought a private Member could carry; while he admitted there were other disqualifications that ought to be removed, and he would be ready to assist others in removing them.

Mr. Hunt

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Selwyn.)

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, the learned Gentleman who at present filled that office would be an ornament to the House as a lawyer, a scholar, and a gentleman; but he objected to the Bill on principle. The learned Gentleman (Mr. Forsyth) had been returned for the borough of Cambridge; the question arose whether he could sit, and a Committee decided that he was excluded by the statute of Anne (the 6th Anne, c. 7, s. 55). The object of that Act was expressly to exclude persons holding places under the Crown—"placemen"—from the House of Commons. If that statute was not a wise one, repeal it altogether; but he did object to repealing it by piecemeal and in favour of an individual. If the learned Gentleman had a seat in that House, he doubted whether the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India would permit him to open his mouth. The case of the Solicitor to the Admiralty had been referred to; but that gentleman was appointed by the First Lord of the Admiralty, and not directly by the Crown, and when Mr. Wigram, the counsel for the East India Company, sat in the House, that company was distinct from the Crown. He thought it was not desirable to increase the number of placemen in that House, and he therefore moved that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

★ MR. WHITE seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Serjeant Gaselee.)

MR. WALPOLE said, it seemed that the main objection of the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved the Amendment was not an objection to allowing the Counsel of the Secretary for India to be a Member of that House, but that this measure should be adopted in place of re-considering the statute of Anne, with a view to determining how many other offices should be relieved from the existing disqualification; and no doubt it might be desirable to consider whether that Act might not be altered so as to enable persons, not under the direct influence of the Crown, to obtain seats in that House. There were two clauses in the statute of Anne of very different and distinct operation, the one requiring persons who took office under the Crown to go back to their constituents, and therefore effect a permanent exclusion from the House of Commons; and the other prescribing that certain offices should be disqualifications altogether from sitting in Parliament. The object of this distinction was to exclude those who were under the direct influence of the Crown; but the office now in question was not one of that description which could be said to place the holder under the direct influence of the Crown. The office of Counsel for the Secretary of State for India was held independently of the Secretary of State for the time being; and therefore not being under the direct influence of the Minister, or of those who exercised the patronage of the Crown, it was not one of those offices to which the argument founded upon the statute of Anne would apply. That being the case, it did not appear to be desirable that they should continue to exclude from a seat in the House a person who might be of great use in its deliberations. The holder of this particular office would have been enabled to sit in the House had not the Government of India been transferred from the Board of Control to the Crown; and yet the Board of Control was as much appointed under the influence of the Crown as the Secretary of State for India. It therefore seemed to him that this particular office was one from which the disqualification might well be removed. The Bill of the hon. and learned Member appeared to be a reasonable measure, and one that would add to the character and influence of the House.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, it was not the President of the Board of Control who made the appointment to this office before the transfer of India to the Crown, but the Chairman of the East Indian Company, and he apprehended that the Secretary of State for India on entering office might appoint a new Standing Counsel. It was no doubt important to have the best information when they were discussing questions of Indian law or land tenure; but, at the same time, it would be very inconvenient to have the Standing Counsel getting up in the House to answer the Secretary of State, as might very well happen if this measure passed. If Mr. Forsyth were admitted to a seat, although counsel to the Secretary for India, what was to exclude Mr. Greenwood, of the Treasury? The Bill would altogether upset the principle of the statute of Anne; and if that was to be done they had better at once take the whole subject into consideration, and determine what placemen should be permitted to hold seats in the House.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE submitted that the argument founded on the statute of Anne did not apply to the case. The real point seemed to him to be this—that it was of the utmost consequence that the India Office, which had to decide upon questions of the most enormous importance, should be able to secure the assistance of the very highest talent in the legal profession. Happily, in the present instance, they had a gentleman of great eminence; but if they laid or continued a penalty on the office, if they shut the door to a distinction which was not only the highest to which an Englishman could aspire, but in the particular instance of the legal profession led to all the highest awards of that profession, he apprehended that men of first-class talent would no longer be willing to accept the office. It seemed to him, therefore, that the balance of advantage lay in the removal of this disqualification, the argument for which rested rather upon old prejudices than on sound reason. He should therefore support the Bill.

MR. AYRTON objected to the Bill, on the ground that Parliament had formerly found it necessary to limit very narrowly the number of placemen who were allowed to hold seats in the House, and the present Bill was calculated to evade this wise precaution. The question had been deliberately decided when the Government of India was transferred from the Board of Control to a Secretary of State. The measure would, moreover, be attended with practical inconvenience. The Standing Counsel to the India Office was the confidential adviser to the Secretary of State for India; and it would be extremely inconvenient that a Member of the Opposition should hold that office and be in the secrets of the Government for India. Yet this was likely enough to happen if the gentleman who filled that position was suffered to sit in Parliament. The question was one of considerable importance; and, as it had been brought on unexpectedly, he trusted that his hon. Friend would not press it to a division in so thin a House.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, in opposition to the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), maintained that there was never any intention to deprive the Standing Counsel to the India Office of the power of a seat in Parliament; that the exclusion had resulted accidentally from the Act of 1859. By that Act it was necessary that, within a few days after its enactment, a list of the establishment should be submitted to Her Majesty, and in that list appeared the officer in question. He (Sir James Fergusson) was a member of the Committee which had had to perform the painful duty of unseating Mr. Forsyth; but they had done so not because the patronage of the office had been transferred to the Crown, which would not have rendered it a new office under the Act of Anne, but because the sanction of the appointment by the Queen in Council, as one of the Establishment of the Secretary of State, had that effect. But there was no ground, in reason or precedent, why the holder of the office should not have a seat; and, indeed, after the transfer of the Government of India to the Crown, the Standing Counsel to the Court of Directors—who was continued in office—was allowed to sit without objection. Mr. Forsyth had been unseated under very peculiar circumstances; for until the petition was presented no person was aware that the learned Counsel was disqualified from sitting in that House by reason of the office he held. ["No, no!"] At all events, his predecessor had sat without objection for the University of Cambridge.

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, that of the five Secretaries of State three were assisted by Standing Counsel. The Standing Counsel to the Secretary of State for the Home Department was not able to sit in that House, and he did not see how the Standing Counsel to the Colonial and Indian Secretaries could have any better claim to sit there. As the course taken by the House on the present occasion would probably form a precedent, he thought it would be better to read the Bill a second time, and then refer the question to a Select Committee for careful consideration.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the real question before the House was, whether the Bill before them should be read a second time. His own belief was that had the attention of the House been drawn to the matter at the time the Act creating the office was passed, the Standing Counsel to the Secretary of State for India would have been permitted to sit in Parliament. What was the state of things? For many years before the passing of the Act there had been an office of Counsel to the India Board, and it had never been suggested that the person holding it was incapable of sitting in Parliament. Under the Act the office was retained, and it was now held that persons holding it could not sit. The office was the same, and the functions were the same; and therefore it could not have been the real intention of the Legislature that the holder of the office should be incapacitated from having a seat in that House. Parliament had frequently authorized persons holding office under the Crown to sit in the House of Commons. It must be recollected that the holder of the office in question only advised upon legal and not upon political questions. He hoped that the House would read the Bill a second time.

MR. WHITE thought the question of so much importance that the House should not decide hastily upon the matter. In his opinion there were already too many placemen in the House. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

MR. WHALLEY supported the second reading of the Bill, contending that there was no tangible objection to such an officer of the Crown sitting in the House, and that had it had his assistance at the time of the India Bill, he would have been able to have given it much information on the question then before it.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. White.)

The House divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 58: Majority 24.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he had voted for the adjournment because he thought the question was one of considerable importance and delicacy, and because he thought it would have been better to have the further discussion on the Bill before, instead of after, the second reading. The House, however, having decided otherwise, he would counsel his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee) not to oppose the second reading any further, but to debate the matter as a constitutional question on the Motion for the Speaker's leaving the Chair.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

THE CONVERTED ENFIELD RIFLE.

QUESTION.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War a Question, of which he had given him private notice. There had recently appeared in the newspapers some statements which, if they were correct, tended to show that the Enfield rifles converted on the Snider principle had proved, since they were issued to the troops, by no means so efficient and so calculated to make good shooting as was anticipated when the system was first adopted. The Reports which came in just before he left the War Office gave good reason to believe that this system of conversion afforded a satisfactory mode of tiding over the time that must necessarily elapse before it was possible to determine what was the best breech-loading rifle to place in the hands of the troops. His noble Friend the late Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) determined that a considerable number of Enfield rifles should be converted on that principle at once, with a view to their being placed in the hands of the troops in case any emergency should arise. The present Secretary of State for War was so satisfied with the Reports, that shortly after he took office he presented a Supplementary Estimate to the other House of Parliament, and ordered a very large and extensive conversion. The statements, however, which had recently appeared in the public papers had caused fears to be entertained that the system of conversion was not so satisfactory as was at first supposed. But the main defect appeared to be not so much in the rifles as in the ammunition which was made by machinery, and which had not made as good shooting as ammunition prepared by hand. Taking into consideration the importance of this subject on account of the large sum of money which had been spent in this system of conversion, and the necessity of arming the troops with the best possible arms, he hoped the noble Lord would state what information the Government had received on the subject.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that reports had been current much to the disadvantage of the Snider system of converting Enfield rifles, the fact being that, although they had been tested and experimented upon in every possible way, previous to their adoption into the service, some small defects had developed themselves in the cartridges and in the mechanism of the arm. The first cartridge adopted in the course of practice did not prove satisfactory. A second was then tried, and was not found satisfactory; but although these cartridges failed in accuracy at target practice, they were not unserviceable. A third had now been adopted which there was every reason to believe would be perfectly satisfactory. The small defects which had developed themselves in the mechanism of the arm were such as could easily be remedied without making any change in the original plan of the arm. He held in his hand a letter from Sir James Yorke Scarlett, who is commanding at Aldershot, and whose attention had been directed to the exaggerated reports which the noble Earl had referred to. It was as follows:—

“Aldershot, Feb. 26, 1867. I forward a letter from Captain Thompson, District Instructor of Musketry, under whom the practice so erroneously described took place. . . . Though I believe a still simpler plan will be produced, I consider the present pattern Snider rifle an admirable weapon, and perfectly efficient when well made and well handled.”

The enclosure from Captain Thompson was dated February 25, 1867, and was in the following terms:—

“Having noticed an article respecting the recent trial of Snider rifles and ammunition at Aldershot which is likely to lead the public to form erroneous opinions as to their general efficiency, I think it right to inform you that the trial which took place here, instead of proving not very favourable to the new arm and ammunition, may be considered the reverse. Out of 8,000 rounds fired, only twenty cartridges burst, none of which in any way injured the breech arrangement, and only three missed fire. In very few cases were the old cartridge cases found difficult to withdraw, and those frequently from the awkwardness of the men who were firing for the first time with an entirely new weapon. As regards accuracy at 500 and 700 yards, notwithstanding an apparent inferiority of the Snider to the Enfield at the longer ranges, I think that the very little practice which was made with the Snider rifle at the longer range should not be received as a test of accuracy, as the sighting of the rifle is altered in consequence of the reduction of the weight of the bullet; and the accuracy of the Snider may probably not be found inferior to that of the Enfield rifle when the soldiers become accustomed to its use, which, up to the present time, they have had no opportunity of becoming.”

Sir James Scarlett added—

“My only regret is that the correspondents who furnish information on military matters to the press do not first make themselves acquainted with the subjects on which they write.”

He trusted that this explanation would be satisfactory to the noble Earl; and he might add, that although it would be a great disappointment to be obliged to confess a failure, the War Office would not have proceeded with the conversion, as they were now doing, if they had lost confidence in the arm.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he was not satisfied either by the answer of the noble Earl, or by what he had read of the Snider rifle in the newspapers. Considering the vast sums of money to be laid out in putting a proper weapon into the hands of our soldiers, he thought that proper means had not been taken with regard to the selection of that weapon. Last Session, when this question was mooted in that House, he strongly recommended the noble Lord at the head of the Government to appoint a Committee other than the Ordnance Committee, in which he had no confidence, to consider the question of a selection of small arms. He recommended that the Committee should consist of some of the lieutenant-colonels commanding the regiments which had the highest number in musketry, and to add to them some of those gentlemen who took a deep interest in, and were thoroughly conversant with, the long range shooting of our Volunteers. If such a Committee were appointed to consider the best weapon, there would be a good chance of obtaining a good, a simple, and an effective arm. Before the country was put to very great expense in obtaining improved arms, it was but right and just that all engaged in the manufacture of arms, and all interested in putting a good and simple rifle in the hands of our soldiers, should have an opportunity of competing before a competent Committee, which should recommend such weapon as it might think best adapted for military use, and above all adapted to receive the rough usage which was given to any rifle put in the hands of the common soldier.

MILITARY AT ELECTIONS IN IRELAND. MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE DUKE OF ST. ALBANS, in moving for Papers on the subject of the Employment of the Military at Elections in Ireland, said, that in any allusion he should make to recent events, he did not seek to throw blame upon any one. It would be improper in him to do so, if for no other reasons than that, arising out of the two elections to which he should refer, there were petitions to the other House of Parliament against the return of Mr. De la Poer and Captain White for Waterford and Tipperary, and that some men of the 12th Lancers might be put upon their trial for an event which took place at Dungarvan during one of those elections. He should have been ready to leave the duty which he was now about to discharge to some noble Lord locally connected with the part of the kingdom in which those elections had taken place; but he was glad to be the means, however humbly, of showing that in Irish affairs a warm interest was felt on this as well as on the other side of St. George's Channel. Further, he ventured to think that the use of Her Majesty's troops at an election was a matter which any Member of their Lordships' House might reasonably bring under the notice of Parliament. He should now very briefly state the reasons which had induced him to put his notice on the paper. In England it had been found unadvisable to call on the military either to convoy voters to the poll, or to parade the town or village in which the polling was taking place. In Ireland it was quite the reverse. In Ireland when violence was apprehended troops were called out, and the election was put under military supervision and control. In England it was thought better to run the risk of individual encounters between the inhabitants rather than that a single man should receive a wound at the hand of any of the Queen's troops. In Ireland, however, electoral purity and independence and freedom of election were upheld at the point of the lance and with the edge of the sword. Now, what was the Parliamentary declaration with respect to English elections, made on the 17th of November, 1645? It ran in these words—

"That all elections be made without interruption or molestation by any commander, governor, officer, or soldier."

Again, on the 22nd of December, 1741, it was declared—

"That the presence of a regular body of soldiers at an election is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom."

But Parliament had gone still further. By the 10 & 11 Vict. c. 21, s. 3, it was enacted—

"In order to secure freedom of election it is directed that the Clerk of the Crown or other officer making out any new writ shall as soon as the writ has been made out, give notice to the Secretary at War, or, in case there be no Secretary at War, to the person officiating in his stead, and he to the General commanding the district, who is to see that no soldier, within two miles of the place of election or poll, shall be allowed to go out of barracks on the day of nomination or polling, unless to mount or relieve guard, or give his vote at the election, and that going out for such purpose, he shall return with all convenient speed."

Such was the law as regarded England. In Ireland the principle appeared to be quite the reverse. At the recent elections in Tipperary and Waterford the military had been called out. The events of the Waterford election were so recent and so well-known, that he need not detain their Lordships by detailing them. In the town of Dungarvan, in the latter county, a number of the 12th Lancers were engaged in escorting voters to the poll, when a disturbance took place, and a gentleman named Captain Keily, who lived in the town, received a fatal wound from the lance of one of the soldiers. A coroner's inquest was held, and a great deal of evidence was given as to the throwing of stones at the troops; but the result of the inquiry was a verdict of wilful murder against several of the Lancers. It would appear to him that while the troops were powerless to protect the voters, unless they were allowed to use their arms freely, their presence on such an occasion was a cause of irritation. Every officer knew that it was impossible for him to order his men to act; the men knew the same thing; and the Irish mob was equally well aware of the fact. He found that in the reports of the inquest these observations were attributed to Mr. Waters, a professional gentleman who appeared for the friends of the deceased Captain Keily. Mr. Waters said—

"It was asked was a trooper to sit in his saddle and be stoned, and not resist it? He asserted that he was, and such was the law of the country."

That doctrine might appear extraordinary to some of their Lordships, but an Irish jury had borne Mr. Waters out in his view of the law. What, he would ask, was the result of the employment of troops at the Waterford election? First, it had placed gallant officers in a very painful position; next, it had led to a stigma being for a time cast on one of the finest regiments in the service, and, of course, had rendered that regiment unpopular in one of the richest recruiting districts of the Empire; and lastly, it had, in all probability, raised a hostile feeling between Her Majesty's troops and a portion of her people. Soldiers in the discharge of their duty were but men after all, and at the inquest it came out that one of the Lancers said to his officer, referring to the conduct of the mob, "Flesh and blood cannot stand this." Under such circumstances, officers must feel it extremely difficult to decide how they ought to act. He spoke in the presence of illustrious and distinguished officers, and he asked them whether he was not correct in making that statement? He submitted that the proper instruments for securing freedom of election in Ireland were the Irish police, and the power of petitioning Parliament against any return which was brought about by violence. It might be said that there would be breaches of the peace if the military were not employed; but it must be remembered that the Irish constabulary was a very large and a very well disciplined armed force. During the last election for the county of Dublin the troops were confined to their barracks, and yet no disturbance took place. He had been assured on all hands that the noble Lord now at the head of the Irish Government (the Marquess of Abercorn) conducted his administration not only with great splendour and liberality, but with a hearty desire in every way to promote the best interests of the country. At the same time, when the true interests of the people in both countries pointed to a perfect assimilation of rights and privileges, an elector of the county of Waterford might well ask why he was to exercise the franchise under different auspices from an elector in the county of Sutherland. He would conclude by thanking their Lordships for the kind attention with which they had listened to him.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for,

Copy of the Instructions or Orders issued to Officers commanding Regiments and Detachments called upon to aid the Civil Power in maintaining Order at recent Elections of Members of Parliament in Ireland: Also,

Copy of the Instructions issued to the Stipendiary or other Magistrates concerning the Use of Troops on such Occasions: Also,

Copy of any Reports or any Extracts of Reports to the Government from the General commanding the Forces in Ireland respecting the Employment of the Military in aid of the Civil Power during any recent Elections in that Country, and the Conduct of the Troops upon such Occasions.—(The Duke of St. Albans.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, there had been three elections lately in Ireland, at which troops had been employed in aid and upon the demand of the civil power. He did not find that, at any one of these, special instructions had been issued, relative to the conduct of officers or soldiers, whose duty, in such cases, was well understood. The Queen's Regulations provided generally for the movements of troops to aid in the suppression of riot, and were applicable, generally speaking, to Irish elections. Each officer was provided with a small book, in which the Queen's Regulations were somewhat amplified; and those books were also supplied to magistrates. There would be no objection to produce one of those books, if the noble Duke wished, but their contents were simply what he had stated. He was further informed that the stipendiary magistrates acted under their ordinary instructions; those he could not produce, as they were not actually in his hands; but his noble Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department would, no doubt, be able to say whether there was any objection to produce them. To enable 3,400 electors of the county of Waterford to exercise their constitutional privileges, nineteen stipendiary magistrates were collected to co-operate with the local magistrates; and a force of 1,900 soldiers, besides a body of police, was stationed in the county, and stationed in vain; for since the election a petition had been presented, setting forth that a number of voters, through the violence and intimidation which prevailed, had been unable to record their votes. Voluminous reports had been received from the General commanding the district, covering other reports from officers who had exercised independent commands, bearing testimony to the admirable conduct of the troops under gross provocation, harassing duties, and violent assaults. These reports also gave details of numerous instances of violence perpetrated by organized bodies of men, who openly set the law at defiance, constructing barricades most skilfully disposed, accumulating with prudence and foresight great heaps of stones, at points where they might prove serviceable, and generally obstructing, by all the means in their power, the progress towards the poll of those electors to whose opinions they were opposed. At Tipperary election, although there had been considerable violence, although the troops had been insulted, and subjected to most disagreeable duties, no loss of life, at the hands of the military, had been reported. But at Dungarvan, as the noble Duke had stated, the outrages were carried to much greater extremes. In the town of Waterford, at Dungarvan, and at many other points in different parts of the county, attacks were made upon the military, sometimes in small parties, sometimes even when they were in large bodies. At Dungarvan an affray took place, in which the Lancers were obliged to defend themselves from the violence with which they were assailed; two men, unfortunately, lost their lives, one a person who, he believed, had taken no part in the disturbances. The responsibility, however, of that loss of life rested on those who organized bands of rioters to disturb the public peace, and not on those who, in the exercise of their duty, and by no will of their own, were placed in a position which brought them into conflict with the populace. A charge had been put forward against the soldiers of having acted with unnecessary violence; but, having read the various reports which had reached him, and also those which had been published, he was disposed to concur with what an officer upon the spot, unconnected with the troops, had declared as to the great forbearance exercised by the soldiers under great provocation and most trying circumstances. The noble Earl having read extracts from reports received from Lord Strathnairn, Colonel Sawyer, Captain Betty, 6th Dragoon Guards, and other officers, descriptive of the movements and duties of the troops during the elections, and of the outrages to which they had been subjected; and from Mr. Fleming, senior magistrate of Tipperary, Mr. Gore Jones, one of the most experienced stipendiary magistrates in Ireland, Mr. Miller of Waterford, Mr. Warburton, stipendiary magistrate, who read the Riot Act—testifying to the forbearance, good conduct, and efficiency of the soldiers—proceeded to say that all these reports tended to prove that the skirmishes were not local or accidental, but formed part of an organization deliberately set on foot. Into the legal aspect of the question, he would not enter, for it had been debated only a few evenings ago, on the question raised as to calling out the Volunteers in aid of the civil power; and it would, he believed, be brought directly under the notice of the other House by a Bill introduced with the object of extending to Ireland the English law as to the non-employment of military at elections. If it were decided to withdraw the military, there were two alternatives, either such an increase of the civil force as will make them equal to the performance of such duties as the civil power may require; or, police as well as soldiers might abstain from taking any part in elections, leaving it to each individual voter to make his own way to the poll, by whatever means, and with whatever arms for his protection, he thought best. Upon the propriety of the latter alternative, of course, he offered no opinion whatever; but he would gladly concur in any project by which the military may be relieved from a most ungracious duty. If the noble Duke pressed for such documents as he had declared it to be in his power to produce, the desired information would, of course, be afforded.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD said, that in the case of riot at an election the troops were sometimes called in in England in aid of the civil power; and he had himself, on two occasions, commanded troops in Warwickshire under such circumstances.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that no instructions of a special nature had been issued by the Home Office to the stipendiary or other magistrates with reference to such occasions as were referred to in the Motion.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I wish to express my sentiments with respect to the employment of troops at elections, and I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without doing so. I think the practice most objectionable; and I believe there is no duty of which the troops have so great a horror. At the same time, it must be remembered that the initiative must always be taken by the civil authorities themselves; and it is clearly laid down that when the troops are called on by the civil power it is necessary that they should support it in the preservation of the peace. I apprehend that these troops are not sent to attend the election, but practically in obedience to the requisition of the magistrates stating that they apprehended a breach of the peace and that the civil power at their command was not sufficient to meet the emergency. Unfortunately, in Ireland it almost always happens that the services of the military are called into use at elections, at the request and in aid of the civil power. Under these circumstances, the law is clear; and although, for the sake of the troops as well as the people, I should very much like to see such a change as would enable the civil authorities altogether to dispense with the use of troops, I am afraid that it is impossible to make any change in this respect. How is it possible if the civil authority requires assistance on the ground that it apprehends a breach of the peace, bloodshed and loss of life, that the Government could withstand the pressure from without if they refused to do all in their power to prevent such a calamity? I should heartily wish to see a more conciliatory spirit prevailing at Irish elections on both sides; but until such a change takes place I am afraid you cannot alter the law. At the same time, I am strongly of opinion that no troops should ever be exposed to unnecessary insult or provocation. With reference to the acts of the troops in cases of riot, I desire to say that, although I have no wish to screen any from the censure due to those who exceed their duty, I think every allowance should be made for bodies of troops employed in the suppression of riots; and respecting the cases under discussion, I have every reason to believe, from the representations we have had from responsible persons, that the troops were exposed not only to the greatest obloquy and insult, but that they were actually attacked with stones and other missiles. This, I think, is almost beyond a man's powers of endurance; it is not to be expected that men are to sit still under such a state of excitement; such a passive endurance is not in human nature, and is more than can be expected of the troops. I verily believe that, if we were to go critically into the conduct of the troops, we should find that the amount of forbearance which they exhibited redounds very much to their credit. I deplore, perhaps more than any of your Lordships, that two cases of death resulted from the riots at the Waterford election; but I must express my belief that these deaths were occasioned by one of those unfortunate combinations which it is almost impossible to avoid in a dense and excited crowd of people, crushing upon one another, and surrounding a few soldiers endeavouring to extricate themselves from the general confusion. We must not forget that upon such occasions as these the throwing of stones and shouting not only irritate the men, but make their horses uneasy; and in this particular instance the horse of the officer in charge became so restive that it was unmanageable. These are incidents which still further complicate the difficulties of the situation. I merely wish to point out to your Lordships the great difficulties to which the troops have been exposed. I hope, then, on full consideration of the circumstances of the case, not only your Lordships, but the public at large, will appreciate these difficulties, and be led to take a generous view of their conduct. I do not wish to defend anything palpably wrong, and I think that the whole profession will deplore these results. There is not one of the men who were engaged who would not, I am sure, feel with me delighted if these sad events could have been avoided. I am satisfied that nothing would be a greater solace to the troops than to know that the country believed that they had endeavoured to do their duty without recklessly or inconsiderately availing themselves of the opportunity to exceed it. My Lords, I feel called upon to make these remarks in justice to the troops. If I felt the slightest doubt as to their conduct, I should be the first man to admit that censure might be due. I feel, however, justified in stating distinctly I believe honestly and sincerely that no censure is due, but that the troops, on the occasion in question, did conscientiously and moderately perform their duty.

EARL GREY: My Lords, we must all have heard with great satisfaction the observations which have fallen from the illustrious Duke, and we must all concur in deploring the necessity of using troops to quell civil disturbances; but, at the same time, we must not forget that it is the first duty of the Government to protect Her Majesty's subjects in the exercise of their lawful rights. Riots with violence must, at all hazards, be put down; if the civil force cannot do it, then the military must support them, and if painful consequences ensue, the fault lies, not with the troops, but with those persons who have broken the law in the first instance. The very essence of free Government is violated if an elector is coerced by fear when giving his vote. It is therefore absolutely necessary that violence at elections should be put down; and if any fault was committed by the troops upon the occasion referred to, it was an excess of leniency, inasmuch as they allowed, so far as we can judge from the published reports, an excess of rioting before they decisively interfered. It should be understood by the populace that troops are not sent out at elections as a mark for stone-throwers and as subjects for violence; and it should be understood that they are justified—nay, that it is their duty to use their arms to put an end to the violence of rioters.

LORD VIVIAN expressed his belief that the troops were not only called out at the request of the civil power, but refrained from acting until the civil power directed them to do so. He presumed, then, that the Lancers at Dungarvan did not act until called upon, and then he believed they performed their duty with great forbearance. He rose, however, for the purpose of inquiring of the Under Secretary for War as to the actual position of the Volunteers. The old adage, "Quot homines tot sententiæ," had never fitted any case so admirably as it applied to this question.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that on the last occasion when the subject was discussed in that House, it was stated that very shortly would be published instructions, which are under preparation in the Home Office, for the guidance of the civil authorities and Volunteers in the cases referred to.

LORD VIVIAN hoped that the Government would give proper attention to the subject, as it was a matter of considerable importance.

(NO. 12.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that from communications which had been made to him from various quarters, he had been led to believe that this Bill would not be received favourably by any noble Lord connected with Scotland, and therefore he had not felt in a very agreeable situation. What had occurred, however, on the previous evening had re-assured him on that point. He should perhaps be pardoned if he entered into a short explanation of the objects of the measure. Hypothec is a right by the common law of Scotland which the landlord possesses over the fruits of the ground, and over the cattle and other property of his tenant, as security for his rent. Perhaps it might be convenient to explain to those who were familiar only with the law of England the difference between it and the law of Scotland as to the relation of landlord and tenant. In England, the landlord has no power over his tenant's property until the rent is due ; and then, if the rent is due and unpaid, the landlord may seize all movables, with a few exceptions, and may, by statute, distrain upon the growing crops ; and if the tenant does not pay the rent within five days, the landlord may sell the goods and crops, and out of the proceeds pay himself the rent, and hand the surplus, if any, over to the tenant. If a tenant, being in arrear, clandestinely removes his goods to avoid a distress, the landlord may, within thirty days, follow and seize the goods, and make them available for the payment of the rent in the same manner as if the distress had been on the land ; but if the tenant removes his property the day before the rent becomes due in order to prevent the distress, the landlord has no remedy. In Scotland the law is quite different. The law of hypothec, in fact, gives the landlord a security for the current rent ; the landlord may retain the property of the tenant on the land, even if no rent is due ; and if the tenant removes the property the landlord may follow it and bring it back on the land. If there is no rent due, he retains it as a security ; and if there is rent due, he appropriates it in payment. The hypothec extends to the produce of the year for which the rent is due, and the year is taken to expire three months after the conventional term at which the rent becomes due—namely, on Whitsunday (15th May), and Martinmas (11th November). If the tenant removes the crops after the rent is due, the landlord may follow and seize them in the hands of a bond fide purchaser, unless the property has been sold to him in bulk in market overt. If the goods are sold by sample in market overt, or out of market overt, the landlord's remedy remains ; and there was a case in which the landlord exercised this right seven years after the removal of the property from the land. Hypothec is a general right of retention or recovery. If a landlord wishes to exercise it over specific objects, he must do it by sequestration, and obtain a warrant of sale from the sheriff. This peculiar law of landlord and tenant in Scotland has at different times undergone discussion chiefly as it affected bond fide purchases, and Bills have been introduced upon the subject, which have not been proceeded with. But in the year 1864 a Royal Commission was issued for the purpose of inquiring into the law of hypothec. That Commission made an able Report, and upon the recommendations contained in it this Bill is founded. The Commissioners stated that they sat for thirty days at Edinburgh, and examined 102 witnesses, including landlords and agents, bankers, corn and manure dealers, and tenants, so that they might be informed of the state of the law in Scotland, and they were satisfied that the information laid before them was complete, and had exhausted the subject. Two of the Commissioners thought that the law ought, subject to existing leases, to be abolished, and they dissented from the general Report of the majority of the Commissioners, who thought that the law ought to be retained subject to certain alterations which they recommended, and which were embodied in the Bill. The clause to which he would first direct attention was the third, which gave protection to the bond fide purchaser of corn, &c., for valuable consideration, actually delivered, removed, and paid for. The provision was, he thought, a very necessary and proper one, because, in the present day, there were very few bulk markets, crops being generally sold by sample. To the next clause some noble Lords might possibly object, as it provided that hypothec was not to be available beyond three months after the rent was due. He did not think that clause would meet with any very decided objection, provided he consented to protect existing contracts from the operation of the Bill, and he might say that he felt disposed to make that concession. By Clause 5, the stock of a third party taken on a farm to graze was made liable only to the amount of consideration payable for the grazing. By Clause 6, it was provided that in the sequestration for rent of any farm or lands it should not be competent to include any household furniture or agricultural implements, or imported manures ; and lastly, the Bill provided that all sequestrations for rent should be entered in a register, to be kept at each court where sequestrations for rent were granted. The Bill was, as he had stated, founded upon the recommendations of the Royal Commission, which had sat in 1864 to inquire into the matter, and, in his judgment, its provisions introduced a wholesome alteration into the law.

Moved, " That the Bill be now read 2^d." —(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF SELKIRK said, he entertained a very strong objection to the Bill, and his opposition was on behalf of the small tenants in Scotland, whose position would be greatly changed by the operation of the Bill, and not because it was likely to affect the pecuniary interests of the landlords. In 1830 the attention of Lord Brougham, who was at that time Lord Chancellor, was called to the law of hypothec by a case that came before him, and in November of that year he introduced a Bill identical with the three first clauses of the present Bill. But having better considered the question, and having heard strong remonstrances from Scotland, the noble and learned Lord withdrew the Bill. Another Bill was introduced in the same Session by Lord Belhaven, to enable grain to be sold by sample in the open market, but this was also withdrawn, and nothing more was heard of the matter until the year 1848-9, when great numbers of the smaller tenantry of Scotland became bankrupt, and an agitation was got up by the corn-dealers, who were anxious that some alteration should be made in the law which would enable them to secure bargains in grain from bankrupt stock, by transactions which, though they might be considered bond fide and legal, partook, nevertheless, of the nature of sharp practice. The matter having again dropped it was not revived until the present Bill was brought in. A great change had taken place during the last few years in the position of the farming class in Scotland in consequence of farms having been much consolidated, and farmers had become divided into two distinct classes, those holding large farms, and those having small holdings. Some landlords were in favour of large farms, and he believed that the effect of this Bill would be to increase the temptation, already strong enough, to further consolidation of the farms, which must injuriously affect the interests of the holders of small farms. If this Bill passed it would very much discourage small holdings in Scotland. In the part of Scotland in which he lived, the usual practice was that rent was payable half yearly, in May and November, but practically it was not collected till August and February. Under this Bill sequestration would be taken away three months after the period at which rent became legally due. The three months' grace now allowed were of infinite value to small tenants, as they were thus enabled to reap their crops and to realize their cattle before they were called on to pay their rents. The withdrawal of this accommodation would, to many small tenants, be almost ruinous, and that would necessarily result from this Bill. He recommended that the Bill should be hung up as Scotch Bills generally were till after the 30th of April, when the county meetings took place, and if strong remonstrances were not made on the subject by the small holders of land, he would take no further step against the measure. But unless he received such an assurance he should make a Motion that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he did not intend to offer any active opposition to the Bill, though he thought it would have been better if this matter had been allowed to rest. Such an agitation, however, had been got up, most unreasonable, as he thought, in itself, that it was wise and prudent on the part of the Government to offer some concession, rather than let an agitation go on, the object of which was to get rid of the law altogether. The law was one which, as the Commissioners stated, they could not trace to its origin. It was founded on the old Roman Law, and was the law of Scotland up to the year 1623, when the term "hypothec" was first introduced into the statute; and a few years after that time, by certain decisions of the Courts in Scotland, the law assumed the form which it had held ever since. It was under this much-maligned law of hypothec that all the improvements in agriculture had taken place in Scotland. It was rather a delicate thing, then, to touch a law which had conferred such great benefits on the country. But the law did not apply to agriculture alone; it protected landlords, in common with merchants and those engaged in commerce; and if they broke down the protection which the landlord enjoyed, other classes must also suffer. His great object in maintaining this law was not that he considered it essential for the benefit of the landlord; it was a law of protection for the humbler class of tenants. At the root of the great agitation against the law was an attempt by the large tenants of Scotland to get rid of the competition of smaller tenants for land and compel landlords first to throw their farms together into large farms, and then be at the mercy of these large farmers who should dictate to them the prices at which they should let the land. He did not think Parliament should encourage such objects. Under the present system a landlord was enabled to do much for his smaller tenants, by giving them credit, enabling them to reap an entire crop, and to turn it into money before paying their rent, but this he would not be able to do if the Bill now before their Lordships became law. He could easily understand the large farmers pursuing this course for their own benefit; but he was sorry to say that a great many of the smaller farmers were so blind to their own interests as to be as clamorous for a change as the large farmers. He did not wish to see the Bill hung up until after the 30th of April; but he believed that the House of Commons would be so much engaged in business of another character when the Bill should go down there, that the measure really would be hung up until after that date. He was glad to hear that the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) had consented to give protection to existing rights under existing leases, and he considered that the provision regarding registration had been deprived very much of its sting, in consequence of publication not been insisted upon. The change proposed by the present Bill constituted the full extent to which he could go in modifying the law of hypothec, and any attempt to do away with that law altogether would meet with his most strenuous resistance.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, that after the explanation of the noble and learned Lord he was not disposed to offer any opposition to the Bill, but would be glad to see the concession made in the fourth clause extended to the fifth.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

GAS AND WATER BILLS.

RESOLUTION.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN moved the following Resolution:—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee of Selection that they have power to refer every Gas and Water Bill of the present Session, except those relating to the Metropolis, against which a Petition indorsed for hearing before the Referees has been presented, to the Court of Referees instead of to a Committee of the House, with power to the Referees to inquire into the whole subject-matter of the Bill, and to report the Bill, with or without Amendments.”

MR. WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE said, that he did not rise to offer any opposition to the Instruction, but to throw out a suggestion to the hon. and gallant Member. By the present practice of Committees on Private Bills, it is not competent for a Select Committee on a Private Bill, whether opposed or unopposed, to make any inquiry into matters which by Standing Order No. 92 were ordered to be inquired into by the Court of Referees. In this way several Bills passed through the House with too little inquiry as to the engineering merits of the scheme. Sometimes inhabitants of a town or parties interested did not like the expense of opposing a Bill, and thus schemes of very inferior merit often passed into law. The suggestion he would like to make was, that every Private Bill, whether opposed or unopposed, should be referred to the Court of Referees for inquiry as to the matters detailed in Standing Order No. 92. That Standing Order required the Referees, in the case of all opposed Bills, to inquire into the engineering details and efficiency of the works, and the sufficiency of the estimate for all railways, &c.; also in the case of Waterworks Bills, into the proposed source of supply, the quality of water, and the storage reservoirs; and in the case of Gas Bills, into the quality of the gas, its supply and price, cost of production, &c. He merely wished to throw this proposal out as a suggestion to the hon. and gallant Member as Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that if his hon. Friend would bring the matter forward before the Standing Orders Revision Committee, they would be very glad to consider the suggestion.

METROPOLIS—BUNHILL FIELDS CEMETERY.—QUESTION.

MR. REMINGTON MILLS said, he wished to ask the Judge Advocate General, If, when the present lease of the ancient Burial Ground of Bunhill Fields to the Corporation of London expired, it is the intention of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to preserve it inviolate and in perpetuity, together with the vaults and graves, and to provide for its future maintenance in decent order; if so, whether it is intended to promote a Bill in Parliament for these purposes?

MR. MOWBRAY: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Wycombe, I have to say that it has throughout been the intention of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and still is the intention of those Commissioners, to preserve the ancient burial ground of Bunhill Fields inviolate and in perpetuity, together with the vaults and graves. This intention will be found fully expressed in a Correspondence which will be on the table of the House in a few days. With respect to a provision for its future maintenance, I have to inform the hon. Gentleman that some questions are pending between the corporation of the City of London and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, on which the Commissioners have twice offered a reference to arbitration, which has not been accepted. Till we receive the answer of the corporation of course I can give no further reply. With regard to the last question, it is not intended to bring any measure on the subject into Parliament during the present Session. The Commissioners had no intention to devote the ground to any other purpose than it had always been devoted to.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask Mr. Solicitor General, If his attention has been called to the length of time Jurymen in the Metropolis have frequently to wait before they are called on the trial for which they are summoned, to the inconvenience of their having three or four summonses for different courts in one week, and to the frequency with which the same persons have to serve; and, if so, whether it is his opinion that a measure could be devised to fix the day when Jurymen are actually required to attend, to make the fees of Special Jurymen more in accordance with the time they are compelled to serve, and if it would not be to the public interest that trials should be shortened?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL replied, that his attention was directed almost daily to the time that jurymen in the metropolis had to wait before the trial was called on for which they were summoned. This, however, was unavoidable. Special jurors were summoned to try a particular case, and if the preceding cases occupied much time the jurors were obliged to wait. As to the inconvenience of having three or four summonses for different courts in a week, that arose from the existing state of the law. In London and Middlesex juries were summoned for particular cases. In the rest of the country the law was different. When the law was altered in 1852 as to the mode of summoning juries in the provinces it was allowed to remain as it was in London and Middlesex. As to the frequency with which some persons were summoned to serve, that also arose from the state of the law. In his opinion, no measure could be devised to fix the day when jurymen were actually required to attend, because the time when any trial would take place must depend on the time which the cases preceding it in the list occupied. As to making the fees paid to special jurors more in proportion to the time they were compelled to serve, he would remark that special jurors were paid a guinea each trial. It would be easy to fee the special jurymen higher; but however easy it might be, it would not be a measure of justice unless something were also done in the way of paying common jurymen, who now received only 8d. per cause. And although a guinea was the proper fee payable to special jurors, he knew a case—the celebrated Windham trial—where each special juror received thirty-five guineas for thirty-five days' attendance. As to shortening the duration of trials, his opinion was that it would not be expedient to shorten them. The complaint generally was, that trials were not too long, but too short. Nor did he think it would be for the public interest that trials should be shortened.

SCOTLAND—ROAD REFORM.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT ANSTRUTHER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government have any intention of introducing any general measure of Road Reform for Scotland during the present Session?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that he was not aware that any measure for road reform in Scotland would be likely to lead to a satisfactory result.

QUESTION.

MR. HENDERSON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether Specifications for building Iron Gunboats and other Ships of War are not being prepared; and whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to invite Tenders from the builders on the Thames exclusively, or whether builders in other parts of the kingdom will have the opportunity of tendering for such vessels?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: My answer, Sir, to the Question of the hon. Member for Durham is this—it is the intention of the Government, in moving the Navy Estimates, to propose the building of two iron gunboats; and the specifications are now being prepared, so that we may receive the tenders as early as possible. This course has been taken on account of the great distress which has been found to prevail among the shipbuilders in the East of London, and with the object that, if Parliament sanction the building of those ships, the companies on the Thames may, as early as possible, prepare for work. This is the course the Admiralty are taking; but it is not the intention to confine the tenders to the Thames companies only. On the contrary, it is intended to call on all the shipbuilders, usually called on, to send in tenders, and the most satisfactory ones will be selected.

MR. HENDERSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that as great distress prevails among those engaged in the iron trade as among the shipbuilders on the Thames?

The Solicitor General

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I think I can say that no favour or partiality will be shown to the builders on the Thames over those anywhere else.

GOVERNMENT PRISON CLERKS.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Petition from the clerks in the various Government Prisons, praying for an increase of salary, as sent to the Directors of Convict Prisons on the 19th of November, 1866, has been forwarded to the Treasury; and, if so, whether an answer may soon be expected, or if its prayer will be granted?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that the petition had been sent to the Treasury at a much later date, and had not come under his notice until the Estimates for the year 1867-8 had been closed. It required to be referred to another Department before coming to the Treasury for decision.

PARIS UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION AND MUNITIONS OF WAR.—QUESTION.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether all or any portion of the Munitions of War, including machinery, have been shipped for or otherwise transmitted to Paris for the purposes of the Great Exhibition in that city; and, if so, at what date such transmission took place, and by whose authority?

GENERAL PEEL: The Question, Sir, respecting the exhibition of munitions of war was decided before I became Secretary of State for War. The War Department had been requested by the Commissioners of the Exhibition to make a selection of those munitions which they desired to have exhibited. In consequence of that, contracts were entered into for the conveyance of the munitions; the contracts were concluded on the 14th of February; the vessels arrived in the Thames on the 21st of February, and commenced lading. A question was raised in this House as to the propriety of exhibiting munitions of war, and if any notice had been laid upon the table of the House I certainly should have taken upon myself to delay the departure of the vessels until the question was decided. As the contracts had been entered into, and no notice on the subject had been given in this House, the vessels sailed on the 28th of February.

SUPPLEMENTARY ARMY ESTIMATES. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, When he proposes to lay the Supplementary Army Estimates upon the table of the House? He wished also to know, whether he was to understand from a reply of the right hon. Gentleman on a former evening that he declined, under any circumstances, to lay upon the table the Report of the Committee on the Land Transport Corps?

GENERAL PEEL: I propose, Sir, to lay the Supplementary Army Estimates on the table on Monday next. With regard to the Report of the Land Transport Committee, my answer was that that Report had not yet reached me, and until I had seen it myself I could not say whether it should be laid upon the table or not.

WAR IN THE RIVER PLATE. QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the continuation of the Correspondence relative to the war in the River Plate may be expected to be laid upon the table; and if the Mediation of Her Majesty's Government has been solicited by either, and which, of the belligerents, and with what result?

LORD STANLEY: The Correspondence to which my hon. Friend refers is now in the hands of the printer, and I hope to be able to lay it on the table in a few days. The mediation of Her Majesty's Government has not been solicited by either of the belligerents.

DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND—THE "CORK HERALD" REPORTER. QUESTION.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is true that a reporter employed by the Cork Herald newspaper was arrested at Killarney, and has been imprisoned, and is still in close confinement, because, in the discharge of what he considered to be his duty, he offered for transmission by Telegraph a message bearing the heading "Disaffection amongst the Military;" and, if it be true, by what legal authority that arrest has been made?

LORD NAAS: Sir, on the 20th of February a telegram was taken to the telegraph clerk at Killarney to this effect—

"Rumoured disaffection of troops. Officers heard men singing songs with civilians. Removed by police. Military sent to quarters. Fourteen soldiers missing this morning. A wire cut last night at Cluanmullane."

I need hardly assure the House that with the exception of the last—the cutting of the telegraph wire—the whole was entirely false. On this message being taken to the magistrates by the person charged with the conduct of the telegraph at Killarney, the magistrates thought it their duty to order the arrest of the person who was proved to have sent the telegram. It turned out that the gentleman's name was Tracey, and that he was a reporter of the Cork Herald. The magistrates considered that this person, in sending this message, had been guilty of a very serious offence against the law of the land; and they committed him to take his trial at the ensuing assizes. Bail, however, was offered on his part and accepted. As the trial is pending, and as this gentleman has given notice of his intention to take action at law against the magistrates for false imprisonment, I am sure the House will feel that I should exceed my duty if I expressed any opinion on the transaction.

NAVY—COURTS MARTIAL.—QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the sentence passed by the Court Martial on John Hawkins, of Her Majesty's Ship Cherub, on the 30th November last, has been approved by the Board of Admiralty, and if the opinion of the Legal Adviser of the Admiralty has been taken thereon; whether the attention of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty has been called to the sentences recently pronounced by Naval Courts Martial; and, whether it is in contemplation to issue any regulations with regard to the scale of punishments in future?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I have, Sir, to state, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member for Marylebone, that the attention of the Board of Admiralty was called on the 8th of February to the court martial to which he has now referred, and by direction of the Board this Minute was passed—

"Their Lordships have to call attention to the extreme severity of this sentence, which the facts elicited at the trial did not justify; and under the circumstances their Lordships have directed that the future imprisonment shall be cancelled."

As to the other Question of the hon. Member, whether the attention of the Admiralty had been called to the sentences recently pronounced by Naval Courts Martial, I have to state that in the course of the last autumn the very serious attention of the Board of Admiralty was directed to the sentences of the courts martial. And in answer to the last part of the Question, whether it is in contemplation to issue any regulations with regard to the scale of punishments in future, I can hardly say it is in contemplation, because early in last December a confidential circular was issued to the Commanders-in-Chief and the captains of ships, calling attention to the severity of the sentences, and expressing an opinion that their severity ought to be relaxed.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE. QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the preparation of the promised Reform Bill, the practice adopted in 1858 of availing himself of the services of the professional agents of the Conservative party, in lieu of the ordinary advisers of the Government, will be followed, seeing that such a mode of procedure led to a cost of £3,608 17s. 2d., as per Treasury Minute of June 13, 1859?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am sorry, Sir, to say that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Brighton is under an erroneous impression as to the ordinary Advisers of Her Majesty's Government in drawing Bills. I regret to say that at the Treasury at the present moment there is no equity draughtsman who can assist the Government in that respect. There ought to be one; and I made an offer this year to one of the most distinguished men in the profession; but so great is the reward which first-rate professional talent now commands, that the application of the Government was fruitless, and I did not think myself justified, though the sum offered was considerable, in increasing that offer. The hon. Gentleman perhaps had in his mind the case of Mr. Thring, a very eminent man, who is usually employed professionally in drawing Bills for the Government. The appointment really filled by Mr. Thring is that of standing counsel to the Home Office, though he is employed mainly in drawing up Government Bills. But Mr. Thring is so over-worked just now, and such considerable appeals have been made to his energies, owing to the number of Bills introduced by Her Majesty's Government, that we have been obliged to give him extra assistance, and to ask him to undertake the work of draughting a Reform Bill, in addition to the labours which already overburden him, would be almost an insult. I trust the House will feel that the Government are not asking for too much confidence when they hope that the House will allow them to select the best talent they can procure to perform the work now in hand; and I will not therefore dwell further upon that point. With regard to the sum mentioned by the hon. Member of £3,600, which appears in the Treasury Minute as the cost of the Reform Bill of 1859, I would observe that that sum really includes, besides the cost of drawing the Bill, which was comparatively small, the payments made to some of the most eminent statisticians and men of science, whose services were engaged in procuring facts and information upon the subject of Reform. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if he believes that £3,600 is an extravagant sum for the preparation of a Reform Bill, he labours under a very erroneous impression. To my knowledge there have been other Reform Bills which have cost much more than £3,600. But I am sure the House will never grudge payment for any conscientious efforts in this direction. I believe I am right in stating that owing to the accumulated information now at our disposal, the cost of the present Reform Bill will amount to a sum which will quite satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman arising out of the answer he has just given to the question of the hon. Member for Brighton, and also respecting an entirely different point. The right hon. Gentleman has not merely dealt with the right of the Government, which is undeniable, to engage the services of any gentleman they may select for any particular task, but also with their right to appoint a new draughtsman of Bills, who is to stand in an official relation with the Treasury. Now, I think the House would wish to receive from the right hon. Gentleman an assurance that in making any such appointment he will be careful to make it known that any title which any gentleman may obtain from such an appointment, and the salary connected with it, will be subject entirely to the judgment of this House. The other point to which I wish to refer has reference to a misapprehension existing on a subject of great public interest—I mean respecting the time when we may anticipate the introduction of the Government measure relating to the amendment of the Representation of the People. On Tuesday I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he could not then name a day for the introduction of that Bill, but could state with tolerable confidence that it would not be later than Thursday in next week. I have understood from other sources that last night an assurance was given that before the right hon. Gentleman introduced such a Bill, he would give notice of the day. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will have the kindness to say in what way these different versions are to be reconciled, because great anxiety prevails upon a subject of so much importance. I think I have stated clearly the two versions, and I hope that the first of them is accurate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The two statements I made were, I think, perfectly consistent. I hoped that I might be able to introduce the Bill on Thursday, but I particularly guarded myself on that subject. The right hon. Gentleman said—as I thought, courteously and fairly—that it was a business in which a Minister ought not to be bound to any particular day. Yesterday there was some conversation in the House on the subject. I said that fair notice should be given; and I propose on Monday next to name the day on which I will bring forward the Bill.

SUGAR DUTIES.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: With a view to remove misapprehension in the public mind, although I myself am under the impression that a perfectly clear account was given on the subject, perhaps the Secretary of the Treasury will answer a Question with respect to the operation of the new system of duties and drawbacks upon sugar. From a telegraphic message I have received to-day from Hull, it appears that those concerned in the sugar trade there are not aware of the effect or the reason of the delay in bringing into operation that system; and perhaps the hon. Gentleman will have the kindness to repeat the information which he has given in this House, and which appears not to have been quite accurately conveyed?

MR. HUNT: Last night, Sir, in moving the postponement of the Bill on this subject, I stated the present position of affairs with regard to the operation of the sugar duties and the reason for delaying the Bill at present. I said that by a Minute of the Conference, which was agreed to in September last, it was arranged that the new scale of duties and drawbacks then adopted should come into operation on the 1st of May, or at an earlier date, in case Great Britain should then have obtained Legislative powers to make these alterations. In consequence of that arrangement we supposed that the only delay likely to arise was the delay in procuring a Legislative sanction in this country; and we believed that the other Powers were immediately in a position to give effect to the Convention. But on our taking steps to submit a measure on the subject, we communicated the Resolutions in the first instance to the other Powers, and we learned there would be some delay on the part of Holland, though France and Belgium said they would be willing to give effect to the Convention on the very earliest day. The result of the communications since made is that the Dutch Government say that, under no circumstances, will they be able to carry out the alterations before the 1st of April, and that if they come into effect then, they must be accompanied by certain conditions as to floating cargoes. We have not been able to apprehend the exact nature of those conditions, and further communications have been made to the Hague on the subject. It must be clearly understood, then, that under no circumstances can the alteration take effect before the 1st of April, and if these conditions are such as cannot be agreed to by the other Powers concerned, there is every probability that the alteration will not take effect until the 1st of May.

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope the hon. Gentleman will inform the House promptly of any communication that he may receive on the subject.

MR. HUNT: I have already promised to do so.

QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether he has any objection to lay on the table of the House a copy of the Correspondence that has taken place between the Admiralty and Lieutenant Brand subsequent to his being placed on Half-pay?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, before answering the Question of the hon. Gentleman I must apologize to him and to other hon. Members for my not being in the House yesterday at the time a question on this subject was put. In answer to the hon. Member's Question I have to say, that as soon as Lieutenant Brand landed in this country he addressed a letter to the Board of Admiralty with regard to the rebuke which he had received from them in consequence of his letter to the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Buxton), and I am bound to say that letter was written in very becoming and proper terms. It was acknowledged by the Admiralty, and no further correspondence has taken place. If the hon. Gentleman moves for the letters, they will be produced.

IRELAND—INSPECTORS OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—QUESTION.

MR. BRUEN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to recommend that compensation shall be given to the county inspectors of weights and measures for the loss of their office, of which they have been deprived by Act of Parliament?

LORD NAAS replied that on the transfer of the inspection of weights and measures from inspectors appointed by grand juries to the constabulary, a proposal was made to give compensation to those officers. It was, however, negatived, and he conceived that were the proposal renewed it would not be likely to receive the sanction of the House.

MR. BRUEN said, that he should therefore bring the Question forward on a future day.

DISQUALIFICATION OF CROWN OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, that as he understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer contemplated the appointment of a Draughtsman to the Treasury, he wished to know, Whether the right hon. Gentlemen proposed to exempt him from the operation of the Statute of Anne, disqualifying Officers under the Crown from sitting in Parliament?

IRELAND.

RELEASE OF JOHN MORRIS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

MR. BRUEN said, that in this instance the policy of extending leniency to the minor offenders, and being more severe upon the leaders of the Fenian movement, had not been observed. It was well-known that Morris was a head centre of the Fenians in Carlow, and that he had been most active and energetic in fomenting discontent in that district. It had been proved on the evidence of two witnesses at the trials of Luby and Moore, before the Special Commission, that Morris had received fifty pikes on an order in the handwriting of Stephens, and that he had taken these pikes with him by train, and had been called upon to pay excess of luggage upon them. There was at this moment in the hands of the Irish Government a ledger containing the names of all the persons to whom pikes had been delivered on the order of Stephens, and in this list the name of Morris appeared. In consequence of this evidence, the arrest of Morris was determined upon, and a reward of £50 was offered for his apprehension, the amount being subsequently increased to £100. The people of Carlow, anxious to show their loyalty and support the Government, raised by public subscription £177 to supplement the reward offered by the Government. The result was the apprehension of Morris in the spring of last year, he having been arrested with some difficulty and committed to Mountjoy Prison. In the month of August last the Government communicated with the magistrates as to the course that ought to be pursued with reference to Morris, and their advice was that Morris should be brought to trial. This advice, however, was disregarded, and a few days afterwards Morris was placed on board a steamer for America, and a free passage given to him in order that he might assist in cutting the throats of our esteemed friends the Canadians. It was not for him to cast any blame on the Government, because he believed that the release of Morris was the act of a subordinate, without the knowledge or consent of the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland; but it was evident that the magistrates had been grossly snubbed, that a failure of justice had taken place, and that there were sufficient grounds for further inquiry. He could not believe that that the Irish Law Officers had advised the exercise of such dangerous leniency. The best way of clearing up the matter would be by the production of the papers asked for.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Opinion of the Law Advisers of the Crown in Ireland relative to the release of John Morris, lately a prisoner, arrested on a charge of Treason-felony and Fenianism,"—(Mr. Bruen,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD NAAS said, it was perfectly true that Morris had been a man of considerable importance, and had been connected with the Fenian conspiracy. He was consequently arrested and underwent a certain amount of imprisonment; but the Attorney General for Ireland being of opinion that it would be well to accept the offer which he made and to release him on condition of going to America, he was released in the same way as a number of other prisoners equally guilty. The Government had always acted on the principle that persons arrested under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant should not be kept in confinement any longer than the public safety required. Such persons were not arrested for the purpose of punishment, but as a preventative measure, in order to secure the preservation of the public peace. His hon. Friend was in error in supposing that a free passage to America had been given to Morris or to any of the released prisoners. No assistance was given to them either by the late or present Government, and they had invariably gone out at their own expense. Many others would have accepted the alternative of the Government sooner had they possessed the means of paying their passage. He was sorry he could not accede to the request of his hon. Friend to produce the opinion of the Law Officers. The arrest and discharge of Morris were equally effected on the responsibility of the Irish Government, and it would not be proper that the reasons which induced the Government to issue Lord Lieutenants' warrants should be made public. All he could say was that the Government acted upon each case on its own merits, and in deference to the opinion of those best qualified to advise them on the subject.

MR. CONOLLY said, he thought the documents ought to be produced to satisfy the House of the prudence of the step taken. There was one point which the noble Lord had omitted to notice—namely, that Morris, who had promised to remain in America when he went thither, had now, in spite of that undertaking, returned to Ireland, or at least to some part of Her Majesty's dominions. This fact had been substantiated, and ought to be brought under the notice of the Government, for it certainly suggested the inference that there had been some negligence in this instance in granting Morris his liberty without taking a sufficient guarantee that it should not be abused.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MORRIS) said, that he thought it would be highly improper if confidential communications of this character were to be laid before the House. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) had informed the Government that Morris had returned to this country. As far as the Government were concerned, they had no knowledge of the circumstance, nor had they any reason to believe that Morris was in any part of the United Kingdom. If the hon. Member for Donegal could furnish the Government with precise information on the point they would be glad to avail themselves of it.

MR. KER: If Fenianism that has been over-riding the country is to be put down it will not be by allowing the leaders to escape and go to some other point more convenient for their designs. I cannot refrain from expressing my deep regret that the Government should have allowed these men to go free, and that you did not, when you had caught them, keep them. When you catch rats—

MR. BRUEN said, that in the face of the opinion expressed by the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland he could not persevere in his Motion.

LIGHT AND AIR TO ANCIENT WINDOWS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GOLDNEY said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the existing state of the Law as regards the right of access of light and air to ancient windows, and to the necessity of providing by Legislative enactment some means by which owners of property, under proper regulations, and on payment of compensation, if necessary, may be enabled to increase the height of their buildings. It appeared that so far back as the reign of Richard the First it was anticipated that the City of London would become overcrowded with buildings, and from that time till 1834 there was a custom which enabled the owner of a house in the City to raise it to any height he pleased, notwithstanding his doing so might diminish the access of light and air to adjoining tenements. A jury of twelve aldermen, with the Lord Mayor as Assessor, were to sit and determine the rights of the parties. But in 1834 an Act was passed which gave the owners of property a right to a perpetual injunction to prevent any diminution of the access of light and air to their property. This question was one of considerable importance, owing to the constantly increasing pressure for increased extent and accommodation of buildings in the metropolis, and the consequent necessity that was felt more and more of increasing the height and improving the character of ancient buildings. The law as it at present stood was such that persons anxious to improve and heighten their buildings were at the mercy of their immediate neighbours, and most extortionate demands were commonly made when any alterations of this character were contemplated. When the Act of 1834 came into operation the difficulties which now existed began to arise, and it has been held by Lord Westbury that when any window of a dwelling-house shall have been actually enjoyed for a period of twenty years without interruption, the right to such window shall be absolute and indefeasible. The difficulties to the public arose in this way. Supposing a man to have only a small window, admitting only a comparative small quantity of light, and another, in order that he might alter his house or premises, wanted him to enlarge his light, the law said you shall do nothing that can compel a man to enlarge his window unless he chooses. Suppose a person wishing to build said to the owner of a small window, "If you will enlarge your window, or do anything that will bring in rays of light, and will at the same time allow me to erect a building near your property, then you will not suffer from any diminution of light and air, but will obtain a greater access of them." The owner of the small window might refuse unless a very large pecuniary compensation was given to him. A case came before Vice Chancellor Wood, and the answer given by the Court was, the plaintiff cannot be compelled to make any alteration in his house to enable another to deal more advantageously with his own property. On that decision a party owning a small window could make terms advantageous to himself. In a work recently published, he found in the preface this extraordinary statement—

"Since the demand has arisen for new and enlarged buildings, the right to window lights has become of considerable pecuniary value."

That was to say, a person having a small light was not held to have it as an enjoyment for himself, but as of large pecuniary value; because, unless a large pecuniary compensation was given, he would go to the Court of Chancery, and prevent any one erecting a building which should have the effect of diminishing that light. But the law extended not only to adjoining property, but to property on the other side of the street. Supposing a street to be twenty, twenty-five, or thirty feet wide, if it could be shown that by any building on one side the area of light did not come at its original angle, an application could be made to the Court of Chancery to restrain anything from being done, and there were cases where half a street had been stopped from anything like improvement. Some few years ago it was necessary for a man to go to a Court of Law to have his rights determined by a jury; but now a Court of Equity could deal with the legal rights of the parties, and a person might obtain a perpetual injunction. The Building Act did not provide any safety-valve; for even supposing an order to be made by the district surveyor, a man might still apply to the Court of Chancery. Suppose two building plots, of 100 square yards each, were purchased by two persons, and that one of the plots let very quickly to builders, while no buildings were raised on the other plot for a period of twenty years. Under the present law, the owner of the latter plot could be prevented by a perpetual injunction from raising buildings which would interfere with the access of light and air to buildings raised on the former plot. The law in France was different. An owner there could not acquire any right against an adjoining owner without giving him notice; and if he did acquire any such right it could always be restricted to six feet directly and two feet laterally. The consequence was that large decorative and other improvements were continually going on in Paris. He did not want to give any man the power to injure his neighbour. What he wished to do was this—that as there was an absolute necessity for carrying up buildings, so as to give a greater amount of accommodation to the mercantile public, any injury should be compensated by damages and not by a perpetual prohibition. If the House was in the habit, for the public convenience, of granting to railway companies the right not only to shut up lights but to take property, surely some plan might be devised for settling the cases to which he had referred by means of a jury. The suits instituted for the purpose of preventing an interference with light and air occasioned lengthy discussions on the difference between perpendicular light and lateral light, and the Court itself was sometimes puzzled to know what sort of a decree it should make. If his suggestion were adopted such discussions would be avoided. He wished to know whether the Government thought it was possible to prevent litigation on this subject by bringing forward a measure? If it was thought desirable he would move for a Select Committee on the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it would be impossible to accede to any such Motion. The subject was no doubt one of growing importance; but he thought it had been somewhat exaggerated by his hon. Friend. It should be borne in mind that the law was carefully considered and settled so late as the year 1834. In the City of London, up to that time, there was a custom that tenements might be built upon old foundations to any height without regard to other people's light. That was greatly complained of, and it was thought proper to abolish that custom. The owner of a tenement had a right to a certain amount of light, and if he had enjoyed that light for twenty years it was his property. Of course, if the interests of the public required it, the right might be taken away on payment of compensation. No doubt there must be some cases of hardship under the present state of the law; but he thought it would be unreasonable in an offhand manner to unsettle what had so lately been, after full consideration, settled. It was impossible either for a Select Committee or the Government to take the subject into consideration during the present Session; and he therefore trusted that the hon. Gentleman would not press the matter further. In another Session, perhaps—if the hon. Member again introduced the subject—the matter might be fully considered.

EXPORTATION OF COOLIES (EAST INDIES.)—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I rise, Sir, to call the attention of the House to the exportation of Coolies from the East Indies. There is no doubt a great difficulty in calling the attention of the House to a question of this nature, seeing that it does not possess any political interest, and is of long standing; but if the House will grant me their attention for a short time, I think I shall be able to show that the subject is one of the saddest and most melancholy interest, and one well deserving the attention of the country. It affects the lives of a great number of persons, who, although not our countrymen, have a claim upon us to the fullest protection. At one time we encouraged the slave trade. We afterwards abolished it at an immense cost. Since the abolition of that trade, we have kept up a large force on the coast of Africa at an expense of nearly £1,000,000 a year, for the purpose of suppressing the slave trade. But, whilst we have been incurring that heavy expense we have been encouraging, promoting, and developing a system of what is called free labour, in the shape of emigration from the East Indies, which is nothing more than the slave trade in another shape. The system is objectionable on another ground. At this very moment—I believe the noble Lord (Viscount Cranbourne) will bear me out in the statement—labour is wanted in our Indian dependencies, especially in Bengal, and all this time we have been promoting the system of free labour emigration. When we abolished the slave trade, and made the Negroes free, the natural result was that they would not work, and it was therefore impossible to cultivate the plantations in the West Indies. To meet that evil the Government promoted the system of exporting coolies from the East Indies. When colonies state what number of labourers they require, an officer is appointed in the East Indies to collect these labourers, and ship them to the different colonies with all possible despatch. If there be a demand for labour in one place and a superabundance in another, it might naturally be expected that it would find its level. The system of emigration from the East Indies, on conditions which bind the labourers to periods of servitude for three, or five, or seven years, is open to very great evils and abuses. What is the manner in which these poor people are induced to emigrate? Officers are appointed to collect them together, and they are induced to embark on this venture by the most illusive promises. Their credulity is imposed upon by the picture of an El Dorado, which it is represented to them they will find on their arrival at their destination. Having by these means been brought together at some establishment at Calcutta, not more than five days are allowed them before they are shipped off to the colonies, and, no doubt, when they arrive there theoretically their rights are secured to them, and if the persons to whom they are articulated do not fulfil their obligations they have the power of appeal to the magistrates. But it should be recollected that the appeal is to the magistrates of the Province where the plantations are situated; and, in one instance, where a number of the workpeople, including several women, made a complaint to a magistrate at Durban, in Natal, because they ought to have complained to a magistrate in the district where the planter lived, they were not admitted, and afterwards the overseer came into the town, tied them to carts, and flogged them back again to their own district. Although they are surrounded with rights, yet, owing to their ignorance and their inability to understand their rights and privileges, they are of little or no value. It may be said that these are exaggerated statements; but there is one point which admits of no such accusation, and that is the treatment which these poor people experience on shipboard, and the conduct of the officers in India, in shipping them in vessels which they charter for the purpose of conveying them on these "voyages of death," as they are called in India. The official Report for 1864-5 contains the following figures:—

This statement shows that nearly one-third died on the passage, and great numbers died soon after their arrival from weakness and sickness. Surely such a state of things is deserving of the attention and consideration of the House and the Government. Now let us inquire into the causes of this state of things. The object of the officers is to secure a ship as cheaply as possible, and the consequence of the system was the fearful loss which occurred only eighteen months ago. All these things, notwithstanding their importance, attract little or no attention. Yet we are responsible for them if we approve them. But I will give you one more instance. The Eaglespeed, with a number of coolie emigrants on board, was wrecked the day after she set out, she not being a seaworthy vessel, and the loss of life was 262 souls. It is a remarkable fact, however, that none of the Europeans were missing. The Report upon that case points out some of the evils with which we should grapple. It appeared that both the emigration agent and the protector repudiated any responsibility in the matter. They both said they had nothing to do with the crew of the vessel and could not be held responsible. The wonder is, under such circumstances, that the loss of life in cases of this kind is not much greater. There were no life-buoys in the ship, although five had been provided, and the number of emigrants embarked was 425. The Report finds, with regard to the protector, that he was quite in error as to the scope of his duties, and then we come to another part of the Report, which is one of the most striking things I have ever read. Here you have a ship sinking the day after she sails, and 262 lives are lost; and on an investigation being made into the circumstances of the wreck, it is found that the chief officer of the ship was sick at the time, and did little or nothing; that the doctor was suffering from an attack of pleurisy, and therefore did nothing; that the second officer was sober, but suffering from the effects of liquor; that the boatswain had jammed his finger, and was in a great measure off duty; that the captain saved his own life, but did nothing else; and that the crew, with two exceptions, behaved disgracefully. It was shown that all the lives might have been saved with proper care; but as it was, the captain and crew left the ship, and 320 souls were left there to perish. The conclusion arrived at in the Report was that the emigration agent and protector failed in their duty; that the captain and doctor erred deplorably; that the second officer and boatswain behaved disgracefully; and that the crew also behaved badly, the only persons on board who behaved well, being two seamen named William Maynard and William Wilson. It may be said that this is an isolated case, and does not prove that other vessels are not properly manned and commanded; but we do not know that, for it is seldom we get so full a Report bearing upon the treatment the coolies receive. In 1859 an interesting article on the subject appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes. It reviewed a work by M. Du Hailly, who said—

“To him (the planter) the coolie merely took the negro’s place, and emigration was no more than a return to the old system; it was—if one may venture to say so—the slave trade of the 19th century.”

The same author said—

“It is curious that emancipation has brought back recruiting for labourers for our colonies nearly to the state of things prevailing before slavery existed as an institution. What virtually is the emigrant but a modification of those white bondsmen of the 17th century who paid for their passage by a three years’ surrender of their liberty, and whose sufferings brought to mind the most frightful features of the slave trade?”

A gentleman who has published a work in favour of the system of emigration (Mr. Beaton) writes—

“The Government, yielding to the popular clamour and the threats of the press, ordered the 656 coolies to be disembarked on Flat and Gabriel Islands, two miserable rocks, a few miles from Port Louis, where no sufficient provision had been made for affording them shelter and food. The condition of these miserable wretches was truly deplorable. The quarantine laws, strictly enforced, forbade them to land—the open sea and the bare rocks offered them only a grave. In the course of a short time the bones of 200 coolies were bleaching on those barren rocks, the victims of creole cowardice and Government mismanagement. This painful mortality created little sensation among the creoles. Cholera had broken out in Port Louis, and they had no sympathy for any suffering save their own.”

That cannot be an exaggerated account, coming as it does from a gentleman in favour of the system under which such things are done. Is it possible, then, for us to shut our eyes to the abuses which have occurred in the mode of carrying out this system of free labour? It is an absurdity that we are keeping up a fleet at an expense of £1,000,000 a year to suppress slavery, and that yet we are permitting it in another form, and misleading the poor people who are called free labourers. But what shall we say to the conduct of Earl Russell’s Government in entering into a treaty with the French to allow them to take our labourers to the island of Réunion at the rate of 10,000 a year? There is no doubt that in 1858 the French were engaged in the African slave trade at Zanzibar, and that they introduced slavery under a false pretence. The French ship the Charles et Georges was taken, and that led to a diplomatic difficulty. They induced labourers, under false pretences, to embark, and then treated them as slaves. We protested. Lord Malmesbury protested in a despatch to Lord Cowley, which would apply equally to our conduct now, saying—

“Your Excellency is aware that Her Majesty’s Government have not altered their opinion as to the analogous nature of the scheme of the French nation for exporting negroes with that of the avowed slave trade.”

At that time the Isle of Réunion required 10,000 a year of these so-called free labourers to keep up the supply. Subsequently, in 1860, Lord Russell entered into this Convention with the Emperor of the French, to allow the exportation of these coolies from India to the Island of Réunion, where we could have no control over them. That treaty, I believe, should have expired last year. I asked the late Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Layard) last year on this point, but he wished me not to bring the question forward, as he thought France would not ask to have the treaty extended. I believe, however, that the treaty was extended for another year after all, and whether it expires this year or not I cannot say; but I hope that if it does expire, or has expired, it will never be renewed. There is responsibility enough, and evil enough, for us in what we are doing in our own colonies, without giving other countries power over these unfortunate men. I am asked, “Do you propose to ruin these colonies by allowing no further exportation?” No! I think it would not be difficult to improve our present system, and to repress some of these evils. Some of the recommendations I am about to name to the House have been suggested to me by gentlemen who are perfect masters of the subject—who have themselves lived abroad, and given me accounts of more scenes of sadness and sorrow than I choose to trouble the House with. As remedies for the evils now existing the following suggestions had been made by exceedingly competent authority:—

“1. That no further extension of the present system be permitted. 2. That the trade in sea-going coolies be more nearly assimilated with that which has been found necessary in Assam and Cachar; and that the severe laws governing the latter, as recently passed by the Bengal Legislative Council, be followed so far as practicable. 3. That after a given period only those colonies should be allowed to recruit Indian labourers as can show an absence of such population as could develop its soil. 4. That no further treaties be entered into giving to any foreign Power the right to recruit in British India. 5. That it should be impressed upon colonial Governments that China affords a large market for available labour, if properly enlisted in that country. 6. That the laws of recruiting in India should be made more comprehensive, and that greater checks should be put upon the exportation of persons not thoroughly comprehending the nature of the servitude they are undertaking.”

It has been said that we do not take such an interest in the Chinese coolies; but it should be borne in mind that the Chinese are a very different race to the Bengalees. You cannot treat the Chinese as the Bengalees are treated. The Chinese combine together, and insist upon having their rights; and there is a great contempt of life in China, which leads the men to enter of their own free will and risk the chances. They value their life at so low a rate in China, that I have heard a man sentenced to execution may get a substitute to undergo his fate for him for some twenty or thirty dollars. Then the laws of recruiting in India should be made more comprehensive, and a check should be placed upon the exportation of coolie labour. Those who take charge of the coolies should be bound to give security for their own conduct, and every man taken should be supplied with a ticket upon which is written, in his own language, a statement of the objects of his enlistment, and the name of the place he is to be taken to. Heavy penalties should attach to any man moving a coolie ten miles from his home without having a certificate. These are very simple suggestions, but they are very important. The result, if adopted, will be to secure a better class of men than the miserable crimps now employed in India, and to give the fullest information to the coolies, so that they may know where they are going, and what conditions they are subjected to. The House will see, doubtless, that great hardship is done under the present system, and that British legislation should interfere on behalf of those who cannot defend themselves. I will now leave the matter in the hands of my noble Friend (Viscount Cranbourne), and I am sure the House will think that this is a case of so much hardship and grievance that I am justified in bringing it forward.

MR. ADDERLEY: Sir, the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane) has attempted to make out a case against the system of coolie emigration from the East Indies such as would induce this House to put a stop to it altogether. [Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE: No!] The hon. Gentleman says “No;” but he does not seem to be aware of what the result of his proposals would be. The proposal he makes is tantamount to the abolition of the whole system. I quite agree with the hon. Gentleman that, if his view of the case is true, no amount of advantage in the system of coolie emigration would justify such a state of things as that which he believes to exist; but I do not think he has at all made out his case, and from all the information I can acquire he is entirely mistaken on the subject. He began by saying that coolie emigration is only a modified slave trade; but that is a phrase which may be met by a counter assertion—that it is no such thing. The only facts that he has stated in his speech to base this assertion on are cases of very considerable mortality on the voyage between the East Indies and the West Indies, and of shipwreck. He states that the mortality on the voyage is 30 per cent, leaving the House to suppose that that is a fair sample of the mortality on all voyages, and that, therefore, they should be put an end to. It would be just as legitimate an argument to say that the cholera raging at the East End of London, the mortality in that district was ground enough for pulling down the East of London. In the case he has cited, occurring in 1864-5, the mortality amounted to 28 per cent, but that arose from typhus fever, arising from the starvation they came from, breaking out amongst a batch of emigrants. [Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE: But there were eight ships.] The hon. Gentleman will excuse me; but if he will turn to the page from which he quoted, he will see that the typhus fever raged in all those ships. He asks us, then, to do away with coolie emigration from the East Indies, because the typhus fever broke out on board eight ships in 1864. In the case of the Eaglespeed which he quoted, there was no doubt a great loss of life; but the case was investigated by the Courts of Law and also by a Committee of this House, and condign punishment was inflicted on those who were guilty. But is that to be cited as an illustration of the average state of things on board all emigrant ships which carry coolies? It would be too monstrous a state of things to be allowed to continue if it were true, but the real state of things is utterly unlike that. In point of fact, there is no class of British subjects who are so carefully protected as these East Indians, who are elaborately guarded and protected from harm in every way from the outset of their engagement through the voyage, and where they went. The prima facie justice of the system there can be little doubt of. The hon. Gentleman himself allows that there is a great demand for labour in one part of the world, and a great want of employment in another, and it is desirable, for the interests of the world, that the excess in one part should be utilized to supply the deficiency in the other. The hon. Gentleman says that that should be left to a natural process. But no natural process will cause the poor ryots, who are starving on 2d. a day in the East Indies, to tumble into the West Indies, where labour is as necessary to the planter as food is to themselves. Steps must accordingly be taken to convey the surplus labour from the East to the locked-up capital of the West. The Act by which this is done was passed in India in 1864 to consolidate and amend seventeen previous Acts passed there since 1839. As it now stands the Act effectually protects the coolies against fraud on the part of those who recruit them. The description which has been given by the hon. Gentleman of the mode of recruiting does not in the slightest degree resemble the real fact. The recruiters who bring the coolies to the ports are licensed and are bound to wear badges. Their licenses must be countersigned by a magistrate, and when a coolie agrees to emigrate it is their duty to take him before a magistrate, and it is the magistrate's duty to explain the matter to the coolie, and to see that he understands what he is about, and whether he wishes to go, and until that is certified by the magistrate he cannot even be taken to the port of embarkation. At each of the ports where this emigration is carried on—Calcutta, Madras and Bombay, Madras being the principal—there is a protector of emigrants, who has most elaborate functions, and is subject to heavy penalties for their non-performance. He has to see that the recruiter accompanies the coolies to the port, and provides them with necessaries on the road until the time of embarkation. There are stringent provisions also against their embarkation if in ill health, and against embarkation at all without a license. The ship is also surveyed before sailing, and the master has to give a bond of £1,000 for the proper observance of the conditions prescribed. I have made careful inquiries at the Emigration Office, and had all the reports diligently searched, and there was not found a single instance of neglect, or evasion of the regulations, in the records of the office. And now as to the French Convention. The hon. Gentleman has most justly stated that that Convention was first entered into in the interest of the negroes. No doubt, it was an inducement to the English Government to supply the French with labourers, on condition that they would cease to take slaves from the coast of Africa. That Convention was made for three years, beginning in 1860, and was continued indefinitely, subject to termination, upon notice on either side, of three months; but no such notice has been given. When the hon. Gentleman talked of 10,000 coolies having emigrated from the East Indies to Bourbon, [Mr. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I was not certain of the number] he adopted a very large figure; but instead of 10,000, I believe the number who now emigrate is not ten. In fact, the emigration has almost entirely ceased. The French did not like the coolies; the scheme was a failure, and, as I have just said, there is no coolie emigration to Bourbon now going on. I have alluded to the protection granted to these coolies in the East Indies at the time of their emigration, and I wish now to show the kind of protection which they receive on their arrival at the West Indies. The emigration takes place almost entirely from Madras, and the coolies go chiefly to Trinidad, Mauritius, and British Guiana. In all the colonies where these emigrants are received laws are passed expressly for their protection—laws which have been carefully drawn up and based upon instructions from the Colonial Secretary at home, and which guard most minutely the interests of the coolies. There are, moreover, agents and sub-agents, who periodically visit the coolies in the colonies, and report to the Governor upon their condition. It is the duty of these agents to see that the regulations are carried out; that proper provisions and medical attendance are provided; that the members of families are not separated from each other; that the hours of labour are limited; that their back passage is secured; and that the indentures are cancelled in cases where the emigrants have been subjected to cruelty or injustice. I can scarcely conceive of better arrangements being made than those at present enforced. It is perfectly true that there have been some disasters lately in the shape of shipwrecks. The Report which the hon. Gentleman quoted from stated that five vessels were lost from 1864 to 1866 inclusive. It must be remembered, however, that one of these was wrecked in a tremendous storm on the Hooghly, which destroyed all the shipping in the neighbourhood. Does the hon. Member ask us to put an end to coolie emigration because a tempest swept away the Ally? The case of the Eaglespeed I have alluded to. Another vessel put into shore on account of sickness on board, she dragged her anchor, and twenty-six emigrants perished. In another case, there was also a loss of life, and in the disaster of the Countess of Ripon, all lives were saved. Taking all together, however, I do not think that these shipping losses have lately been greater than they were in former years. There has certainly, however, been a very great mortality, particularly at the period to which the hon. Gentleman has referred to. But taking everything into account, its average has been nearer 5 per cent than 28 per cent of the number shipped; and last year, although famine was raging in Bengal, and at such a time many emigrants would embark who would be unable to stand the voyage, the average was only 2 per cent, the smallest that had yet been known. This certainly is most creditable as regards the efficient working of our agency. The House must bear in mind that, during a period of distress, such as the famine to which I have alluded, the utmost precautions will not prevent some emigrants being taken on board, who, though seemingly in good health, may, during the voyage, succumb to disease, on account of their bodies being weakened by privation. It is therefore matter for congratulation, and shows how ably our agents discharged their duty, that the mortality was not greater last year when such distress prevailed. I may state here that the agents at Calcutta have recently allotted to the coolies a larger amount of space on board these emigrant ships than was formerly given, in consequence of the mortality which prevailed during some of the voyages. The Act stipulates that only ten superficial feet of space shall be given to each person, but this has been increased to twelve superficial feet. I wish now to call the attention of the House generally to the beneficial effects of this system of emigration. It has been of the greatest possible benefit, both to the coolies themselves and to the planters of the colonies to which they are consigned. Those who have ever been the opponents of the system are the East Indian Government and the abolitionists, who blindly seek to promote the interests of the negro by the adoption of measures which are most detrimental to them. The opposition of the Government of the East Indies is easily explained. They wish to keep these coolies at home and get the benefit of their labour on the lowest terms. But, let me ask, is it fair to keep these men in India, earning wages at the rate of 2d. a day, when they can earn 1s. per day in the colonies to which they are sent? The coolies were much more slaves at home than where they went. It seemed that Pharaoh wanted to keep his slaves at home, and refused to let them go into the wilderness, where, in this case, they would get better fare. In the East Indies they wanted to keep down the mass of the labourers to the starving point. The very fever which destroyed them on the voyage should be set to the account of the condition they were taken from. When the coolies emigrate their condition becomes, not only physically, but morally improved. From being miserable and dependent creatures they become men, act the part of men, save money to a very considerable extent, and frequently return again, after taking their back passages, to their native land. I should like, while on this point, to quote some figures showing the savings which some of these emigrants have made. In 1859 there were 349 coolies who returned to the East Indies with savings to the amount of £7,496, or at the rate of £21 per head. In 1861 there were 270 coolies who returned with £3,076, being at the rate of £11 11s. per head. In another year the savings amounted on the average to £25, and in a second to £28 per head; while sums as great as £12,000 a year have gone back to India in the pockets of these coolies. Another fact, which is perhaps more striking, is the number of these coolies who having returned to the East Indies with money, have gone back again to the colonies where the hon. Member thinks they are so hardly treated. In 1866, 20,362 coolies went from the East Indies to the Mauritius; and of these 717, after returning to the East Indies, went back to the Mauritius because they liked it better. At the present moment there are 246,000 coolies in the Mauritius, the greater part of whom work regularly upon the estates. It is much the same with regard to the West Indies. There are almost as many cases of re-emigration to Trinidad and Demerara. The savings of the emigrants there are also very large, and only 13 per cent of those who go to these islands think it worth their while to return to their native country. The hon. Member has quoted one Report, allow me to quote another. It is the Report of Mr. Underhill, of whom we know something in connection with the recent proceedings in Jamaica. That gentleman, in the year 1860, went out to the West Indies as a Baptist missionary, and reported most elaborately upon the prosperity of the coolies there. The opinion of this gentleman is all the more valuable that his inclinations were all the other way, and that he wished to make out that the coolies interfered with the prosperity of the negroes. He winds up his Report by saying that prosperous as the coolies are they were not more useful to themselves than to the negroes, whose condition has been improved by the importation of the coolies among them. I need not point out to the House that if this system of coolie emigration has been useful to both coolies and negroes it has also been most useful to the planters. Nothing required steady labour so much as sugar cultivation, and since their emancipation, the negroes in our West Indian colonies could not be trusted to anything like the same extent that they were before for such labour. The slightest delay in getting in the crop was fatal; but the planters in many colonies had to trust to the negroes, who were constantly inclined to refuse to work, and he might say that their property had been saved only by the introduction of coolie labour. To abolish the system, therefore, merely because in a particular case two or three crews had been destroyed by typhus fever, and because the Eaglespeed had been lost, owing to great carelessness, would be very unwise. The hon. Gentleman proposed, first, that there should be no further extension of the system—what that obstruction and extension meant he did not know; second, that it should be assimilated to that of Assam, which, he himself admitted, he did not understand; and thirdly, that the Indian Government should be allowed to impose checks on the emigration. The result of that, considering their anxiety to retain this surplus labour, would be to put a stop to coolie emigration altogether. He hoped, therefore, the House would not adopt the views of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. CARDWELL said, he wished to bear his general testimony to the correctness of the views which had been expressed by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Adderley). He believed the system to be beneficial alike to the coolies, who in the colonies earned wages which they could not earn in their own country, to the West Indies and Mauritius, and to the negroes themselves. From its very inception to its close, the system was surrounded by every possible safeguard. The Indian Government required that persons enlisting coolies should be licensed; that the coolies should be recruited in the presence of a magistrate; that a full explanation should be given them; and that, up to the last moment, before going on board, they should have the power of withdrawing, so that none might be taken without their full consent. The ships were carefully surveyed, the greatest precautions being taken to insure sufficient accommodation, medical aid, and every reasonable comfort; while, on arriving at the colony, under a system superintended by local inspectors, the observance of the conditions of the engagement was enforced. The coolies, moreover, had the right of returning to their country, which they frequently did with sums of money, which, to them, were considerable. This system was superintended by some of the ablest public servants which this country possessed—namely, the Emigration Commissioners. Of course, abuses must sometimes occur in this, as in every other system, and the hon. Gentleman had referred to the case of the Eaglespeed, in which, undoubtedly, great fault existed. A full inquiry, however, was made, and the delinquents received punishment. His hon. Friend would do a service to humanity, and to the Commissioners, by bringing forward any abuses which came to his knowledge; but the occasional occurrence of abuses was no reason for destroying or discrediting a system which had been productive of most beneficial results.

LAW OF MASTER AND SERVANT.

QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he had given notice that he would ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What are the intentions of Government with reference to the Law of Master and Servant; but instead of putting a direct question to the right hon. Gentleman, he would venture to make a request. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman publicly, as he had already done privately, to undertake to bring in a Bill to legislate on this question. He had a faint hope that such an expression of opinion would be made by hon. Members that the right hon. Gentleman would be encouraged to legislate upon it. This question of the law of master and servant was one which required to be dealt with by Parliament early in the present Session. The law, as it at present stood, was this—that a servant, if he broke a civil contract, was liable to a criminal prosecution, and might be imprisoned with hard labour. Such a state of law as this was harsh, unjust, and un-called for—and required remedy at the hands of Parliament. The position in which the question stood was this:—Last Session a Committee sat to inquire into the law regulating contracts between master and servant, and the Committee unanimously came to the decision that the present state of the law was objectionable, and they passed certain Resolutions recommending some changes in the law. A Committee, representing the united trades of the United Kingdom, had expressed their approval in general terms of the Resolutions arrived at by the Committee. It being admitted that a change was necessary, the question arose by whom was that change to be made. He felt very strongly that the question was one of such importance that it ought not to be dealt with by a private Member of this House. It ought to be taken up and dealt with upon the responsibility of the Government. The Secretary of State had gained just credit to himself for the way in which he had dealt with the trades unions; but he (Lord Elcho) thought this question of the law of master and servant was not less important. It was the wish of the master as well as the workman that Government should take it in hand, and with such a general concurrence of opinion upon the subject the Government ought not to hesitate to speedily act in the matter. He was also supported in this view by the opinion of the Committee, who thought the question should be dealt with by a Bill introduced by the Home Secretary. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would be induced to take up the matter in the present Parliament, and introduce a Bill to regulate the law with regard to it.

MR. E. POTTER said, he thought the question was so much mixed up with that of trades unions, that it would be better to await the result of that inquiry than to institute hasty legislation. The delay of a year or two could do no harm, for the evidence taken by the Committee disclosed very few cases of harshness or oppression, and he believed that the law was not often enforced except in cases which came under the Combination Act. The Committee did not discover a single instance of the law having operated unfairly in the district where textile manufactures were carried on, which branch of industry employed the largest number of hands in the kingdom; and his own experience, both as an employer and a magistrate, was to the same effect. If, however, a Bill were introduced, it ought to be under the charge of the Home Secretary.

MR. CANDLISH said, the hon. Member who had just sat down had stated that questions between masters and servants coming for adjudication before a magistrate arose frequently out of trades unions under the Combination Act. He (Mr. Candlish) had had great experience both as a magistrate and an employer of labour, and he could not remember a single instance of the kind. His experience went to show that the prosecutions under the present law were cases simply of breach of contract, and had nothing to do with the Combination Act. They occurred especially in seaports, sailors being proceeded against for refusing to go to sea. A general feeling prevailed that the law which imposed only a penalty on the employer for the breach of a civil contract while it sent the workman to prison was unequal, and ought to be amended. He hoped the Home Secretary would introduce a Bill on the subject at an early day. He was quite sure that such a Bill would receive the cordial support of both sides of the House, and of masters as well as men.

MR. POWELL said, he concurred in the request that this subject should be taken in hand by the Government, without any loss of time, and that the summary and humiliating process of arrest should be put an end to by statute. He believed that the cases were rare in which a workman, who was supposed to have been guilty of some breach of duty, was manacled and brought before the magistrate as a felon; but he thought that there was a wide-spread opinion among the masters, and an almost universal opinion among the workmen, that the law was one which tended to dishonour and degrade the workman, and which, in a case of a breach of contract, placed him in a state of inferiority, mischievous to him and injurious to the master. There was one proposal of the Select Committee which ought not to be overlooked—namely, that in cases of aggravated breaches of contract, which might have caused injury to persons or property, the magistrates should have power to award punishment by imprisonment, instead of by fine. He alluded to such a case as that of an engineer who, carelessly or wilfully, left his engine, which was attached to a colliery, whereby a man ascending or descending the shaft might have lost his life, but some one providentially discovered his absence, and averted the calamity. The arrest of wages in Scotland for the payment of fines ought to be abolished. He hoped the House would very shortly deal with that question, and sweep the arrest away, as a relic of a past age, and unworthy the time in which they lived.

MR. WALPOLE: This is, Sir, one of the most important questions that can engage our attention. The Committee of last year arrived at certain conclusions by way of Resolutions, which I thought my noble Friend (Lord Elcho) would have embodied in a Bill and submitted to the consideration of the House. That Committee, my noble Friend reported, were unanimous in the Resolutions they adopted. But this very night has shown that very great precautions are necessary in adopting these Resolutions, because one Member of the Committee has expressed doubts as to these Resolutions, and has given his reason for so doing. My noble Friend has recommended to Her Majesty's Government the propriety of bringing in a Bill on this subject. I will not put him off by the observation which I might make, that, owing to the great pressure of the Government business, I do not see the probability of bringing in such a measure at an early opportunity. I admit that this subject ought to be taken into consideration at an early period, and I think that both the House and the Government equally desire to entertain it. At the same time, the subject is one which it is not easy to grapple with. I am engaged in communications with the Attorney General on this matter, and, without any positive pledge as to the time when we can introduce a Bill, I will give my best attention to the subject, and will if possible bring in a measure.

REPRESENTATION OF SCOTLAND.

QUESTION.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING-MAXWELL said, that a few days ago he had warned the Government that when it was known in Scotland that no addition would be made to the representation great dissatisfaction and disappointment would be felt in that country. He had reason to believe that he had by no means exaggerated that feeling. He begged to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to a Return laid on the table last year. That Return showed the proportional number of Members which ought to be given to each of the three kingdoms. First, proportionally, as to population; secondly, proportionally, as to contributions to the revenue; and thirdly, the mean between the two. According to population the Return would give to Scotland sixty-nine Members. According to taxation it would give eighty-six Members. And the mean between the two was seventy-eight. The present number of representatives was fifty-three. He did not expect that a claim of that kind would be paid in full; but in the Bill of last year the claim was acknowledged, and it was proposed to add seven Members to Scotland. In 1859, although no specific increase was promised, he remembered that the Lord Advocate, at the close of the debate on the second reading of the Reform Bill, pointed out, in reply to a question, that there were still seats not allotted to other parts of the Empire, and that hon. Gentlemen were not to suppose that no increase was to be made to Scotland. It was generally understood at the time that they were to have three new Members. He wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer merely to apply the same rules to Scotland which he had laid down for England. His right hon. Friend had enlarged with great force and clearness on the necessity for enlarging the county representation in England. Yet the greatest and wealthiest county in Scotland sent no more representatives to that House than half the number sent by the county of Rutland. His right hon. Friend proposed to add to the representation of Staffordshire a new Member, who was to represent what he called the "Black Country." He begged to remind his right hon. Friend that in one of the largest counties in Scotland—Lanark—they had also a "Black Country," which was growing daily in wealth, importance, and population. Yet that county was only represented by a single Member, unless they added to its representation one-third of the Member for the Falkirk district of boroughs. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had now introduced the sixth of the Reform Bills which had been introduced during the last fifteen or sixteen years. The right hon. Gentleman was taking a step, in the name of the Conservative party, in the direction of Reform greater and more solemn than he had taken before. A large majority of the Members from Scotland had always declared themselves in favour of Reform, and if the question had been left to them it would have been settled long ago. Now, it appeared to him that the Conservative Members who assisted the right hon. Gentleman in taking this question out of the hands of the right hon. Gentleman opposite were bound to see that the interests of Scotland were as much considered and as carefully weighed by their leader and his Cabinet as they would have been by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. They were making a concession to the opinions of their hon. Friends opposite, and if that concession were to do any good, it must be fairly and handsomely made. Would it be fair, or handsome, or wise, that a suspicion should be allowed to arise in Scotland that that country was not treated upon that side of the House as it would have been treated on the other; and that, in fact, it was to be deprived of its fair share of the new representation because the timepiece which regulated the opinion of the Treasury Bench went a little slower than that which regulated political opinions on the Opposition? As regards the second part of the question, respecting the source from which the increase might be derived, there were several seats which might be now said to be vacant. That part of the speech the other night, in which the right hon. Gentleman announced the proposed disfranchisement of the four seats which had recently been reported for bribery, was received with especial favour. If these boroughs were to be deprived of the right of sending Members to the House of Commons, would it not be wise to consider the claims of that portion of the kingdom which contained no boroughs that could be disfranchised for a similar cause? If these seats were to be taken away for the purpose not only of punishing the peccant boroughs, but also in order to give a solemn warning to the boroughs which had not yet been found out—though their bad electoral habits were, to say the least, strongly suspected—if such were the case, would it not add force and meaning to that warning if some of the seats were transferred to a country which, whatever might be its shortcomings, had during the last thirty years conducted its elections with almost unsullied purity? He asked this question with great reluctance, not with any desire to embarrass the Government, but because the subject excited the greatest possible interest in Scotland. So far from wishing to place any additional obstacle in the way of the right hon. Gentleman, he desired to bring the subject under his notice in order that he might take timely means to remove a difficulty which might otherwise prove serious. He begged to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in his proposed scheme of Reform, it was proposed to give any additional representatives to Scotland; and, if so, from what source the increase was to be derived?

SIR JOHN OGILVY said, he hoped that the Government, before producing their Bill, would re-consider their proposals as they affected Scotland. The hon. Baronet who had brought this question forward had not exaggerated the dissatisfaction which existed in Scotland on this subject. He should not be doing his duty if he did not state that many places in Scotland, including the borough he represented, were, from their increase in population and wealth, fairly entitled to additional representation.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, the feeling in Scotland upon this subject was very strong indeed, and he found himself in a position of some difficulty; for, though he desired to lend his support to

Her Majesty's Government in bringing to a settlement the most difficult question which they had taken in hand, he was considerably embarrassed in consequence of the marked silence maintained by the Government in reference to a subject which excited very great interest, not only in his own county, but throughout the whole of Scotland. That was not exactly the time to enter upon the question; but he might state that he represented one of the largest counties in Scotland (Lanark), in which there were five towns of many inhabitants wholly unrepresented. There was not a case in the United Kingdom with stronger claims to be considered, although its claim was not peculiar, for Ayrshire, Perth, Aberdeen, and a number of Scotch burghs were imperfectly represented, and had also strong claims on the Government. He submitted the claims of Scotland in the interest, not only of the country itself, but in the interest of the Government and of Parliament. He desired to ask English Members whether it was fair that the position of Scotland, which was now in the enjoyment of so much wealth and prosperity, and which contributed so largely to the national resources, should remain, with regard to representation, even below the position occupied by it on its union with England. At that time, when only forty-five Members were given to Scotland, the proportion was one in twelve, and it was less than that at the present day. The union between the two countries was a close and hearty one, and English Members should not object to the claim now made for additional Members for Scotland.

Mr. M'LAREN said, he begged to join with those hon. Members who had preceded him in raising his voice in support of the claims of Scotland to be fairly considered in this matter. He wished to enlarge the question, and to suggest an extension of it to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The discussion which had taken place had turned chiefly on the question of giving more Members to counties; but that point could be much better considered when the discussion on the Reform Bill took place, and he did not intend, therefore, to offer any observations upon that matter now. But his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton had made an inquiry of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that evening respecting the sum of £3,600, paid out of the public Treasury for the procuring of statistics upon which to found a Reform Bill in 1859. The right hon. Gentleman very properly justified that expenditure on the ground that the information then obtained was of a most valuable nature, and that some of the first statisticians of the day, and some of the most scientific men, were employed to procure that information. He (Mr. M'Laren) had an opportunity of reading these private papers, which had never been published, and one of which was specially directed to the claims of Scotland. It was, as appears from the heading, prepared at the request of the noble Lord, now First Commissioner of Works; and it placed those claims on such fair grounds that he should be prepared at once to accept those grounds, and ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he was prepared to give effect to the opinions expressed by the scientific gentlemen and the eminent statisticians whom he employed for the purpose? The summing up of the argument, in which the claims of Scotland were rested, was as follows:—

"In order, therefore, to ascertain whether the Scotch Members for counties and boroughs ought in fairness to be increased or diminished, he ought first to ascertain to what number of Members Scotland is entitled by virtue of her population, and then to what deduction from that number she ought to be subjected in consequence of the smaller amount of her real property."

That principle he held to be undeniable. The result arrived at by the writer of that able paper was, that Scotch counties have too many Members, as compared with England and Ireland; and that Scotch boroughs should have twenty-eight additional Members according to population, and twelve according to population and wealth combined. The Union had been referred to. It would be seen from a Return which he had the honour of moving for last Session, and which was laid on the table, but had not yet been printed, that while the revenue derived from England had increased tenfold since the union, the revenue derived from Scotland had increased sixtyfold within the same period. But it had been stated that at the time of the passing of the Reform Bill, Scotland got eight additional Members. That, so far, put matters right. But assuming that everything was then made right as between England and Scotland, still the progress of Scotland since the Reform Bill, as indicated by its taxation, was so much greater than England as to be almost incredible. He would just mention two figures to show how the case stood, and to found upon it the supplemental question with which he should conclude. The revenue derived from England, on an average of three years before the passing of the Reform Act, was £44,059,256, while the revenue derived from Scotland during the same period was £4,656,306. The revenue derived from England, on an average of three years ending in 1866, was £51,303,346, while that derived from Scotland for the same period was £7,740,494. Therefore, while the revenue derived from England had increased 16 per cent since the passing of the Reform Bill, the revenue from Scotland had increased 66 per cent during the same period. Justice to Scotland demanded that her proportion of representation should be re-adjusted at the present time; and he joined with other hon. Members who had spoken in the course of the debate, in entreating the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give effect to the calculations and statistics, which, as the right hon. Gentleman himself said, were obtained from the most eminent authorities in 1859. He begged that the right hon. Gentleman would look into the Returns which had been laid on the table last night, and that he would do justice to Scotland in the proposals which he would lay before the House. He should state that the Return laid upon the table last night excluded from the revenue collected within Scotland the duties upon spirits which had been sent to England and consumed in that country. The supplemental question which he wished to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer was, whether he was prepared to give effect to the recommendation made to him in 1859, and give twelve additional Members to the boroughs of Scotland?

MR. CUMMING-BRUCE said, he wished to urge the claims of the Scotch Universities. The English Universities and the University of Dublin were represented in that House by six Members, and yet the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of giving a Member to the University of London, while the Scotch Universities were altogether unrepresented. He was informed that the constituency of the University of London would not amount to 2,000. The Universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh would give a constituency of 4,000. They were entitled to one Member, and the Universities of St. Andrew's and Aberdeen ought to have one also.

MR. HADFIELD said, he hoped that, in dealing with the question of Reform, the Government and the House would consider what was for the substantial benefit of the country. It was said that the Act of 1832 was a settlement of the question. He denied it. That Act had only unlocked the mind of the country.

MR. SPEAKER said, he would remind the hon. Member that the general subject of Reform was not under discussion. The discussion was confined to certain matters referred to in a Question put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. HADFIELD: I was wandering. Every interest has been attended to but the claim of 5,000,000 of our fellow-subjects. ["Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: Ample occasion will be given to enter into that.

MR. HADFIELD: The people of Scotland are the friends of liberty and enlightened policy, as is shown by the Members they send to this House. Scotland is an example to the United Kingdom. I join in the request made by the hon. Gentleman. It is a glorious opportunity, such as is seldom given to any mortal man, that is now given to my right hon. Friend (the Chancellor of the Exchequer)—an opportunity of elevating the character of the United Kingdom.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was disposed to augur favourably of the result of this discussion from the expression of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's countenance while he listened to the figures which were cited by the hon. Baronet who had introduced it, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would state what his intentions were.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it appears to me that the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Perthshire is framed on a misconception of the precise state of affairs. I have promised the House that, with their permission, I would introduce a Bill that will improve the representation of the people in Parliament. Her Majesty's Government have not arrived at the conclusion that there is too much representative power in England. The conclusion at which we have arrived is, that the representative power in England might be more efficiently distributed. As to that we have a clear opinion; but there is a great difficulty in extending the representative power in some places and curtailing it in others, so as to distribute it in a more efficient manner. In the Bill which I shall shortly ask for leave to introduce, we make proposals which we believe will render the representation of England more efficient.

We call into the representation a number of towns which have risen into importance since the passing of the Bill of 1832. We also propose to give more representation to large districts, which, I believe, every one of candid mind admits to be insufficiently represented. We see no reason to believe that the representative power of England is greater than its population, its property, and those mixed considerations, which ought to be admitted in an adjustment of such important details, entitle it to. Therefore, I cannot admit that, in attempting to improve the representation of England and Wales, we are bound to consider the claims of any other part of the United Kingdom. I think it a course much to be deprecated that the justice of any claim, which may be urged on behalf of one part of the United Kingdom, should be made to depend on what can be subtracted from another part of the kingdom. Having said that, I must beg the Representatives for Scotland to understand that Her Majesty's Government, when dealing with the case of Scotland, will consider it without any foregone conclusion, and solely with reference to the claims which it may fairly put forth to perfect its representation in this House. The claims to representation of the Scotch Universities are, no doubt, claims that may fairly be urged. My hon. Friend has spoken of the superiority, in point of numbers, of the Scotch Universities as compared with the University of London, to which I said a few nights ago it was the intention of the Government to recommend that a Member should be assigned. But my hon. Friend cannot accuse the present Ministers of the Crown of any neglect of Scotch Universities. These Universities may now appeal with pride and confidence to the character of their constituencies and to the interests which they represent. But to whom are they indebted for that character and for those constituencies? It was the Bill introduced under our auspices in 1859 which gave, I may say, a corporate character to those Universities, and laid the foundation of the claim which they could not before then have with any propriety urged. It cannot be supposed, therefore, that we, as a Ministry, are insensible to the claims of the great seats of learning in Scotland. I have always been favourable to constituencies which, mixed with those based on the great material interests that must always form the bulk of a representative assembly, should be founded on intellect and education. I can only repeat to the House, and especially to the Representatives for Scotland, that they are under a very great error, if they suppose that the Government are insensible to their claims, or unwilling to consider them; but they cannot consider them on the condition, that the improved representation of Scotland is to be satisfied by the sacrifice of English interests.

MR. OLIPHANT said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Scotch Reform Bill was likely to be introduced? The character of that Bill might make a great difference in the support the English Bill might receive from Scotland.

MR. SCHREIBER said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he could inform the House of the number of male occupiers resident in the boroughs and cities of England and Wales who would be placed upon the register for the election of Members of Parliament, by a household suffrage, accompanied by a three years' residence and the personal payment of rates? He had no wish to provoke a premature discussion on Reform; but the need of information on this point was sorely felt by many representatives of boroughs in England, and by none more than by some hon. Friends who sat on the Benches near him. If the right hon. Gentleman had it in his power to grant the information, or could suggest any other form in which the question might more acceptably be framed, he felt certain that, with his invariable courtesy to the younger Members of the House, he would not object to do so. From the information already in possession of the House it would appear that the borough occupiers in England and Wales, resident in houses of £10 and upwards, amounted to 639,000. Including the metropolitan constituency, these 639,000 were divided into equal halves at the £20 point; but, deducting the metropolitan occupiers whose house-rent was exceptionally high, there would remain 400,000 equally divided at the £18 point. So much for the houses above £10. Now, what was in the abyss below that limit? Looking down into it, he could not say, with Sir Charles Coldstream, that "there was nothing in it," but he believed there was much less in it than was generally supposed. The number of occupiers below the £10 level he took to be 650,000 or 700,000, not greatly exceeding therefore the number of those above the £10 level. What he wished to ascertain was the number of those who would come upon the electoral register in case the conditions of a three years' residence, with personal payment of rates, were insisted upon. In putting this question he was actuated by an earnest desire for the satisfactory solution of the question of Reform upon some basis that should satisfy the conditions of an equitable, a comprehensive, and a conclusive settlement?

FACTORY ACTS EXTENSION BILL.

HOURS OF LABOUR REGULATION BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, in asking the leave of the House to introduce two Bills upon subjects closely allied, I propose to make a statement of their provisions, so that the details may be fully considered before the measures again come on for debate. The success which has attended on factory legislation has been so great, the beneficial results that have flowed from these Acts have been so marked and are now so universally admitted, and the evils still existing in some trades not subject to these Acts are so flagrant, that I believe the time has come when, with the valuable Report of the Commissioners on the employment of children in our hands, we may extend the principle of these Acts more largely than it has ever been extended before. We may even act, I will not say upon a new principle, but upon one that before the present occasion has never received full recognition. These factory laws were originally applied simply to two great branches of the trade and enterprise of this country—namely, to the cotton and woollen factories. The operation of the Acts was then confined to trades where steam or water or mechanical power was applied in working the machinery. These Acts have since undergone gradual development—first, by the Bleaching and Dyeing Acts in 1850, then by the Lace Factories Acts, and in 1864 the same principle was extended with some modifications to six other kinds of trade. Among those trades were the manufacture of hardware, of percussion caps, of cartridges, of lucifer matches, and of fustian. Those Acts proceeded upon the main principles contained in the Factory Acts, but they carried the Factory Acts much further—namely, to employments in which steam, or water, or mechanical power was not used, and in one instance even to trades carried on in private houses. The main principles of the Factory Acts are these:—First, to provide on sanitary grounds for the health of those employed in factories; secondly, where dangerous machinery is used to take care that it is properly guarded; thirdly, to adopt what is commonly called the half-time system in regard to children under thirteen years of age, that they might attend, compulsorily, at some school for the purpose of having their education carried on at the same time that they are earning wages by their labour; and lastly, with regard to young persons and all women employed in these factories, that the hours of work should be limited to ten and a half in the course of the day, and those hours should ordinarily be between six in the morning and six in the evening. I say ordinarily, for in some respects that rule has been deviated from by subsequent Acts of Parliament, and, I am sorry to add, it has also, in some respects, been deviated from with regard to the number of hours during which both children and women are to be employed. In extending these Acts, the main difficulty which arises is not so much with regard to the extension of their principles, as to the exceptions and modifications which the special and peculiar circumstances of special and peculiar trades may require. Bearing this in mind, allow me to call the attention of the House to the valuable Report of the Commissioners who were appointed to inquire into the employment of children, and let us see what in their Report they have recommended to the consideration of Parliament. Their first Report was presented in 1863; and it was in consequence of that Report that the six new trades which I have mentioned as having been made subject to the provisions of the Factory Acts in 1864 were brought under their operation. In 1864, in 1865, and in 1866, four other Reports have been presented and laid on the table of this House. Those Reports contain a mass of matter, the value and importance of which cannot be over-estimated. In grappling with this subject a single statement will show the large field over which we have to travel, and the immense variety of interests with which we have to deal. These four Reports embrace 150 separate trades, and they affect, more or less, the growth, the health, the physical, the moral, and the intellectual condition of not fewer than 1,400,000 women and children. It will probably interest the House to know how these 1,400,000 women and children are classified according to their respective trades. I find from the Reports of the Commissioners that the proportion of them employed in the lace, the hosiery, and the straw-plait manufactures, and one or two trades of a similar kind, is 320,000. In the manufacture of wearing apparel, &c., where women are principally employed, the number is 858,000. In the metal trades of Staffordshire, Warwickshire, and Worcestershire the number was 91,129. In the paper, glass, tobacco, and other manufactures, it was 72,000. In the printing, book-binding, and stationery trades it was 18,250. In certain miscellaneous trades, including brickfields, it was 38,720;—making an aggregate of 1,398,199. You may, therefore, say that the Bills which I ask leave to introduce affect the well-being of, in round numbers, 1,400,000 women and children. With these facts before us, the question arises how are we to deal with trades so varied, and interests so diverse. The subject may be divided into two branches, which I have endeavoured to incorporate in two Bills, and for the sake of clearness I shall call those two branches, the trades which are carried on in the larger establishments, and the trades which are carried on in the smaller establishments. The dividing line between the larger and the smaller establishments cannot be made with reference to the nature of the work done in them, for it is more or less the same in both. The dividing line, therefore, adopted in these Bills, pursuant to the suggestion of the Commissioners themselves, is to measure the larger establishments and the smaller with reference to the number of persons who are ordinarily employed in them. Accordingly, one of the Bills relates to the larger establishments and the other to the smaller. The larger establishments, speaking generally, will be made subject to the regulations of the Factory Acts. The smaller establishments, also speaking generally, will be subject, not to the inspection of the Factory Inspector, and not to the provisions of the Factory Acts, which can hardly be made applicable in all their particulars to these smaller establishments, but they will, as we propose, be placed under local supervision. I cannot do better than now briefly explain each of the Bills in their order. The first enumerates six different heads of trade which will be included in it. Then that is followed up by a seventh head, which applies to any building or premises whatever in the same occupation, in or upon which 100 or more persons are employed in any manufacturing process—that means any manual labour exercised by way of trade, or for the purposes of gain in the making, adapting, altering, or repairing of any article. The dividing line between the two Bills will take in on the one side of the line all those establishments where 100 persons or more are employed, and the other side will comprise the smaller establishments, many of which are carried on in private houses. With reference, then, to manufactories included in the first Bill, I propose to make them subject to all the provisions of the Factory Acts as to ventilation, cleanliness, security, health, the length of time during which women and children are to be employed, and as to compulsory attendance at schools for purposes of education. These will be the provisions of the first Bill; and, inasmuch as you are attempting to apply the provisions of the Factory Acts to a vast number of trades which have peculiar circumstances affecting them, and also to a vast number of trades which will require time to adapt themselves to the new requirements which the law will impose on them, there will be found at the end of the Bill certain temporary and certain permanent modifications which will relate to the trades included in them. Among the temporary modifications will be the allowance of intervals of time, beginning with twelve months and going on to a year and a half, for adapting those trades to the new requirements to which they will be subjected. The permanent modifications refer mainly to those special trades which require work-people to be employed during the night. What we propose to do by the Bill is this—we will not allow children or women to be employed on night work at all but with the sanction of the Secretary of State; and where, in certain specified trades, young persons are required to be employed during the night, it is provided that they shall not be employed on the day preceding or succeeding, and that they shall not be employed above a certain number of nights in the fortnight. It will also be found that the Bill refers to certain particular evils specially referred to by the Commissioners. I allude to the grinding process and to the use of the grinding stone. When the grinding stone is used, it is found that the dust which comes from steel and stone is so deleterious to the workman that in those places where a fan is not used for the purpose of driving the dust from the mouth the grinders, inhaling the particles into their lungs, live on an average only forty years; it is therefore insisted in this Bill that fans, which in some cases are now provided at the workman's expense, shall be fixed to all grinding machines. The accidents arising from the use of the grinding stone are so numerous, and the injuries caused by these accidents so great, not merely to the workmen actually employed, but to those in his neighbourhood, that it is required in this Bill that the stone shall be permanently fixed in such a manner as to prevent these accidents. This is the first Bill which I shall have the honour to introduce. The second is somewhat novel in principle, though not so much so as at first sight might appear. This Bill, if passed, will, I believe, do more for the benefit and protection of those who cannot protect themselves than any other measure that has yet been devised. I have already stated to the House that those engaged in the lace and hosiery trades amount to 320,000, while those employed in making wearing apparel amount to 858,000—in all, 1,178,000 out of the 1,400,000 women and children so employed. These two trades will be chiefly affected by the second

Bill. With respect to these trades the Report of the Commissioners convinces me that the evils incident to the employment of women and children in them are unfortunately greater than the evils which have been found to exist in many of the factories already under inspection. I am sorry to add that we find these evils are aggravated to a tenfold degree in the small workshops where children are found at work. The early age at which they are forced to work, the length of time during which they are employed, the incessant labour which they are compelled to go through, the bad ventilation, the deficiency of air and exercise, the miserable want of education, and all the mischiefs that necessarily flow from these causes, make their appeal to us—they make their appeal to our better feelings—they make their appeal to our benevolence and humanity—they make their appeal to our sense of justice and right; and I am sure that appeal will not be cast aside by the House of Commons without an endeavour to ascertain the source of the mischief, and if possible to apply a remedy. There are three objections—objections which appear to be very formidable at first sight—that are urged against the application of this principle. It is said that the number of people in those workshops is so small, and it will be so difficult to exercise a supervision over them, that it will be better to leave them unprotected. In the second place, it is said that the rights of private houses ought to be respected, and that we ought not to interfere with them. In the third place, it is said that we ought not to interfere with the rights of a parent over his child. Now, my answer to the first of these objections is, that it is the duty of the State to protect those who are not able to protect themselves, and that class is composed of those who are employed in the small manufactories, the women and children. Independent of that, I could show that wherever the principle of this Act has been put in operation it has always been found to be beneficial. The very first Factory Act passed in 1802, and introduced, I believe, by the first Sir Robert Peel, was applicable to places where only three persons were employed. The Factory Acts of 1833 and 1844 were silent as to the numbers employed. When you take the subsequent Acts—the Printworks Act, the Bleaching and Dyeing Works Act, the Bakers' Regulation Act, and the Acts with reference to chimney sweepers—you will find that they all apply to places where very few persons are employed, so that the Legislature has sanctioned the principle in all of those cases to which I have referred. As to private dwelling-houses, I could quote passage after passage from the Commissioners' Reports to show that those private dwelling-houses ought not to be allowed to remain without supervision. But the principle has been already adopted by the Legislature. The treatment of lodging-houses, the Public Health Acts, the Nuisances Removal Act, and Local Government Acts, are all precedents for our guidance in this respect. As regards parental rights, I must be permitted to observe that there is a parental duty as well as a parental right. The first duty of a parent is to see that his child is physically, mentally, and morally educated, in order properly to fulfil the various duties of life. If that duty is neglected, we must come to the State, the parent of the country, to fill the place of the natural protector of the child. The main objects of the Bill are, in the first place, to secure that no children under eight years of age shall be employed in workshops; secondly, to regulate the hours of labour for children between eight and thirteen years of age; and lastly, the working hours of all young persons, not absolutely, but very nearly, in conformity with the principles applied in the Factory Acts. The question arises how those regulations are to be enforced. If we appoint Inspectors to supervise the whole of the trades to which the measure relates, they would find it a matter of impossibility, so numerous are the workshops scattered over all parts of the kingdom, to discharge that duty with anything like efficiency. What, therefore, we propose to do is to impose a penalty both on the employer and upon the person who, whether parent or not, directly profits by the labour of the children, for acting in contravention of the law. We propose further, that the local authorities shall have the power to see that the provisions of the Act are properly complied with, and, if not, to subject the transgressors to the penalty to which I have adverted. The Bill, like the other, will require to have inserted in it special clauses with respect to the grinding stones used and the grinding process which may be carried on in some of the mills. It will also contain certain modifications of the Factory Acts, in order that it may be rendered workable without interfering unduly with particular trades, which are not conducted in the same manner as the works in factories. I believe I have now stated the chief provisions of these two Bills, and it will be seen that they apply to every case except that of agricultural labour, and of labour in mines, and in ordinary shops. The labour in mines is already more or less regulated by Acts relating to them specially, and ordinary shops can hardly be subjected to the provisions of these Bills. As the Commission appointed to inquire into the Employment of Children in the Work of Agriculture have not yet issued their Report, I think it is better to postpone legislation on that particular part of the question—as I took occasion to say the other night, during the discussion which took place on the Motion of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett)—until we have before us those full details which would enable us to deal with it satisfactorily. I forbear on this occasion from doing more than making such a statement as will place hon. Members in a position to form an opinion on these Bills, which will, I hope, be in their hands on Monday morning, and what is to my mind still more important, will call the attention of the country generally, and of those interested in the trades to be affected, to the proposals which we recommend for adoption. Two remarks I would make before I conclude. The first is that inasmuch as we are dealing with a subject so vast, so varied, and so complicated, I am anxious that every suggestion that can be made with a view to improve these measures should be brought under the consideration of the Government and the House before they are read a second time, or at any rate, before they go into Committee. With that view I earnestly invite all those hon. Members who take an interest in the question to consult their constituents as to what amendments, if any, they would desire to see introduced into these Bills. To facilitate the attainment of that object, I would postpone the second reading for a considerable period, say, three weeks or a month. After the second reading we might put off the Committee for some time; but while, on the one hand, I should deprecate undue haste in dealing with the subject, I should, upon the other hand, equally deprecate unnecessary delay. The other remark I would make is that, fortunate as we may consider ourselves as a Government in having the honour of recommending such measures as these to the consideration of Parliament, the merit of them does not rest so much with us as with those who have been the originators of the Commission, and those who, as members of that Commission, have brought the matter so ably under our notice. In alluding to those to whom I think merit is due, I cannot pass without mention the benevolent exertions of the Earl of Shaftesbury, who, from the beginning to the end of all these factory measures, has been the prime mover at every step, through a period of trial and of difficulty, and who now has the satisfaction of seeing his labours rewarded by the prospect which presents itself of having those labours brought to a triumphant conclusion. I must also bear my testimony to the unwearied industry, the careful investigation, the discriminating judgment, and the great ability which Mr. Tremenheere and his fellow Commissioners have brought to bear upon the subject, and I cannot better conclude my remarks than by adopting the language which they use at the end of their Report—language which I think will find an echo in every part of this House, as well as in every part of the country—

“We heartily trust that we may have thus in some degree contributed to bring the time nearer when so many hundreds of thousands of your Majesty’s poorer subjects of the working classes—especially the very young and those of the tenderer sex—will be relieved from the totally unnecessary burden and oppression of overtime and night work; will be confined to the reasonable and natural limits of the factory hours, with the established periods for meals and for rest and recreation; will perform their daily labour under more favourable sanitary conditions, breathing purer air, amid greater cleanliness, and protected against causes especially injurious to health, and tending to depress their vigour and shorten their lives; and finally, will be under the obligation, between the years of eight and thirteen, of combining a certain and very useful amount of school instruction with wages, yielding employment, and thus benefiting themselves and their country by reaching, as may be hoped, when they grow up, a higher standard of morals and intelligence. Should it be found practicable to extend the principles of the Factory Acts so as to embrace the large numbers which have come under review in these Reports, the blessings which follow—if at all equal to those which have attended that series of Acts since their commencement in 1802—will largely add to the store that has been accumulated by the beneficent legislation of your Majesty’s reign.”

With these words I conclude. I believe that future generations will look back with pleasure upon that reign—that beneficent reign—in which many good things have been done, but none more gracious and just than throwing the protection of wise and considerate legislation over the women and children of this country.

Mr. Walpole

Mr. BRUCE thanked his right hon. Friend for the large and comprehensive measure he had introduced. The nature of those difficulties he could easily understand, having himself had to deal with the same subject, though on a smaller scale, referring only to five or six trades. With respect to the first Bill, he understood the right hon. Gentleman drew a line of distinction between establishments employing at least 100 persons and those employing a less number. He asked whether there were not certain specific trades which, whether more or less than 100 children were employed, might not properly come under the first Bill. He did not understand whether with regard to trades employing less than 100 the provisions of the Factory Acts as to the protection of machinery would apply. [Mr. WALPOLE: They will.] He also wished to know, with reference to the second or Workshop Regulation Bill, whether it contained any provision for the education of children; because, if it did not, much disappointment would be felt. He heartily concurred in the provision prohibiting the employment of children under eight years of age in the trades to which the right hon. Gentleman’s Bills referred. It would, he believed, put an end to many grievances not only in the manufacturing but also in the agricultural districts, as he supposed the Act would apply to straw-plaiting. His right hon. Friend would, he had no doubt, find little difficulty in defending the course he had adopted with regard to children working under the paternal roof. When the Act of 1864 was framed the Government had to consider one of the worst cases, that of fustian cutting, which was mostly carried on in private houses, and it was deemed advisable then that no children under eleven years of age should be employed at a trade which could be shown to be injurious to the human frame. No doubt there would be the same objections offered to these Bills which were urged against preceding Factory legislation—namely, that there was an improper and prejudicial interference with the labour market, and that the effect would be to deprive a number of children of employment. Such a cry was in fact raised at the time of passing the great Factory Acts, and it was partly verified. In 1835, when the subject was legislated upon, 47,000 children were employed in factories; in 1838, only three years afterwards, they had dwindled to 24,000; and in 1856, in spite of the great increase in trade and manufactures, the number employed was only 44,000. Yet such was the beneficial effect of a just and true principle that, in spite of this diminution of employment, all classes, employers and employed, were unanimous in their approval of this restrictive legislation. The limitation of labour had led to increased wages; and the improved health and intelligence of the working population were a direct advantage to the employer, more than counterbalancing the loss involved in the increase of wages. To prevent a child of four or five years old from working was not only just to the child, but ultimately advantageous to those parents who eked out their own miserable wages by the premature labour of their infant children. The Legislature, by its interference, would contribute to that even distribution of labour throughout the country, which was the most effectual remedy to existing evils. Some branches of the tree of evil had been lopped off by the previous Acts, but the right hon. Gentleman, by this large measure, had struck at its root. If the right hon. Gentleman would give one more blow by extending the operation of the Act to the agricultural districts, he would complete a work of which this generation might well be proud.

MR. E. POTTER said, he could only express the extreme gratification he had experienced in listening to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole). He knew not which most to admire—the right hon. Gentleman's talents or his industry. It was a pity, however, that the Bill did not contain a provision for the compulsory education of the children employed in the various trades affected by the proposed alteration in the law. He believed that the compulsory education conferred upon the masses by means of the Factory Acts had been one of the greatest benefits derived from those measures. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman before the second reading of the Bill, would take the matter into consideration, and would see if he could not introduce a clause to make education compulsory among the children employed in the manufactures referred to in the measure. According to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, the Bills introduced to-night would embrace 1,400,000 persons, which was double the number of those at present under the operation of the Factory Acts. If the right hon. Gentleman could make education compulsory upon the agricultural population, he believed it would be better than the application of the Factory Acts.

MR. WALPOLE said, he felt much gratified with the reception the Bill had met with. With reference to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bruce), he might say that he had purposely avoided going into the details of the separate heads into which the various trades to be affected by the Bill were divided. The list was as follows:—

"1. Any blast furnace or other furnace or premises in or on which the process of smelting or otherwise obtaining any metal from the ore is carried on. 2. Any copper mill. 3. Any iron mill, forge, or other premises in or on which any process is carried on for converting pig-iron into malleable iron. 4. Iron foundries, copper foundries, brass foundries, or other premises or places in which the process of founding or casting any metal is carried on. 5. Any premises in which steam, water, or other mechanical power is used for moving machinery employed in the manufacture of any kind of metal in the manufacture of india-rubber or gutta-percha, or articles made wholly or partly of india-rubber or gutta-percha. 6. Any premises in which any of the following manufactures are carried on—namely, paper manufactory, glass manufactory, tobacco manufactory. 7. Any building, or premises whatsoever, in the same occupation, in, on, or within the precincts of which 100 or more persons are employed in any manufacturing process; and every part of a factory shall be deemed to be a factory except such part, if any, as is used exclusively as a dwelling."

The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Potter) had pointed out that the Bill contained no clause to make education compulsory upon the children employed in the various manufactures dealt with. That omission was certainly a grave defect in the Bill. The matter had not escaped his attention; but he had not been able to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the means by which the desired end should be arrived at. Not yet seeing the best mode of doing that, he thought it well to introduce the Bill merely with the points in it about which he saw his way, instead of introducing, without further consideration, matters on which he had not yet made up his mind. His notion was, before the Bill went into Committee, to insert a clause to the effect that, before a child should be admitted to any of these employments some certificate should be required for its having made a certain progress in education, and that after it had been admitted another certificate should be required of its attending school a certain number of hours each day. He would also see if some such clause could not be inserted in the Workshop Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the Extension of the Factory Acts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Lord JOHN MANNERS, and Sir JOHN PAKINGTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 62.]

Bill for regulating the Hours of Labour for children, young persons, and women employed in workshops; and for other purposes relating thereto, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Lord JOHN MANNERS, and Sir JOHN PAKINGTON.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 63.]

RELIGIOUS, &c., BUILDINGS (SITES) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. HADFIELD said, that this measure was not intended to interfere with the Mortmain Acts further than to permit the founders of certain institutions to purchase or give land upon which the necessary buildings might be erected. He did not wish to enable parties to take large estates; and therefore the Bill limited the quantity to be taken, at full value, to two acres. He proposed no alteration in the laws of Mortmain, which Blackstone said were intended to prevent a dying man from endeavouring to atone for a bad life by giving to God the wealth which he could no longer retain.

MR. HEADLAM said, that the Bill of his hon. Friend had been very carefully and judiciously guarded, being limited to sites for buildings and bonâ fide purchases. He thought it would be a great improvement in the law, and he would be prepared to go further in the same direction. Its principle should be exempted from the strict rules of the Mortmain Act. He was prepared to give the measure his cordial support.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the question was one of some importance, and he should therefore reserve his opinion upon it until the Bill was before them. The Mortmain Act had been a very useful one in preventing languishing and dying persons leaving gifts to religious and charitable uses. The present measure was intended to strike a blow at that Act, although it only referred to the purchase of sites, because a languishing or dying person might on his death bed, under its provisions, ask another to buy two acres of land in the City of London, saying he would give full value for it, and make it a site for a church or chapel, or school, or anything else which came within the category of a charitable purpose. He would not, however, oppose the introduction of the Bill.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the proposal now made was in strict accordance with the recommendations of two Select Committees of the House, one of which was presided over by himself, and the other by the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield).

Motion agreed to.

Bill for facilitating the acquisition and enjoyment of Sites for Buildings for religious, educational, literary, scientific, and other charitable purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. HADFIELD, Mr. BASLEY, Mr. AKROYD, and Mr. LEEHAN.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 64.]

On Motion of Mr. STEPHEN CAVE, Bill for the preservation and further protection of Oyster and Mussel Fisheries, ordered to be brought in by Mr. STEPHEN CAVE and Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATION.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, before your Lordships proceed to the business of the evening, I think it is due to your Lordships, in the present state of affairs, that I should state to you, without the slightest reserve, the position of the Government, and the circumstances by which that position has been brought about. I trust you will forgive me if, in laying before you, quite openly and without any reserve, both the course which has been pursued and the present state of affairs, I refer back to a single fact connected with the period at which my Colleagues and I took office. At that time Her Majesty's Government, having failed in carrying the Reform Bill which they had introduced in the House of Commons, felt it to be their duty—and I question not whether they did so rightly or wrongly—to resign office, and the Queen was therefore left without a Government. Under those circumstances, I felt myself unable to resist the appeal made to me by Her Majesty that I would accept the responsibility of forming a Ministry; but in doing so I undertook the responsibilities of office perfectly unpledged with regard to the subject of Reform. At the same time, I must say, my Lords, that almost immediately after the formation of the Government my Colleagues and I came to an unanimous agreement that it was absolutely impossible that we could altogether ignore that great and pressing question. The question which then naturally pressed on us was—considering the failure of our predecessors although they had the support of a majority of the House of Commons—in what manner we might bring to a successful issue a question which for more than eleven years had baffled the efforts of every preceding Government. My Lords, I felt, as I have had the honour of saying to you already in the course of the present Session, that it was a question which could not be settled by the mere authority or influence of any Government whatever; and that if the Government of last year was unable to settle the question, still less was the present Government likely to be able to command such a majority as would carry its measure against all opposition. We felt, therefore, that the only mode open to us—that the only prospect which was held out to us of a successful issue to our undertaking—was to proceed by what I may call a sort of tentative process, and to invite Members of different political opinions in the House of Commons to consider whether by an arrangement which might be more or less acceptable to various parties in the House a conclusion upon this great question might be arrived at. My Lords, it was with this view that we determined in the first instance not to proceed by a Bill, but by introducing a series of Resolutions, through which we had hoped to elicit from the House of Commons the views they took upon the main questions which would be necessarily involved in any Reform Bill. I admit that the Resolutions were somewhat vaguely and indistinctly drawn;—our desire was not to pledge the Government to a specific point upon any one of those Resolutions, but to endeavour to obtain the general opinion of the House of Commons as to what measures would be likely to meet with a general assent. My Lords, the House Commons has not thought fit to entertain the mode of proceeding we proposed, and consequently we were deprived of the great advantage of being able to collect what was the general feeling and desire of the House of Commons on the main points which we desire to ascertain. I do not, of course, say that we were prepared to adopt any mode of proceeding which the House of Commons might think fit; but what we desired to know was what arrangements might be made, what compromise was likely to be accepted, and in what manner we might, without any sacrifice of our own convictions, bring this measure to a satisfactory conclusion. The House of Commons, however, having evidently shown their disinclination to proceed by way of Resolutions, and having expressed a wish that a Bill should be introduced with the least possible delay, Her Majesty's Government did not hesitate, notwithstanding the great disadvantage under which they now laboured, to undertake to bring forward a measure; and it then became the duty of the Cabinet to consider immediately, without a minute's delay, the provisions of such a Bill as they thought they could lay upon the table of the House. Of course, the main provisions of a Bill had been the subject of anxious inquiry in the Cabinet for some time past; but we had not, up to that period, actually framed a Bill, and it therefore became necessary to consider what the provisions of the Bill should be. Two schemes were under the consideration of the Cabinet, varying from each other in that very essential particular—the amount of the extension of the franchise. One of these schemes was more extensive than the other. The more extensive one, I may say, was that to which our Resolutions originally pointed, and more especially the fifth Resolution, which, though it has not been formally communicated to your Lordships' House, was, I may mention, to the effect that the introduction of a system of plurality of votes might allow us to reduce the franchise lower than could be done under other circumstances, and to establish it on a firm and durable basis. The other was a scheme of less extent. Both of these schemes were anxiously considered by my Colleagues and myself; and, though one very distinguished Member of the Cabinet entertained strong objections to the course we were endeavouring to pursue, yet he felt that, in order to secure the great object of perfect unanimity in the Cabinet, it was his duty to waive any objections he might personally entertain, as he shared in our earnest desire that this question might be settled. I had then hoped that with that exception the larger and more extensive scheme would have received the unanimous consent of my Colleagues; and we were prepared to submit that scheme to the other House of Parliament, when to my regret—and I may add somewhat to my surprise—I ascertained that two of my most valuable and most distinguished Colleagues, occupying most important posts in the Government, had, upon a re-consideration of the figures which had been presented to them, come to the conclusion that our proposed arrangements, especially in regard to the small boroughs, would produce such an extensive and injurious effect, that they were compelled to withdraw the adhesion which they had given to the proposal. I need hardly say that withdrawal relieved the other Colleague of whom I have spoken, from any obligation under which he might have felt himself placed. I and my other Colleagues were now placed in the painful position of having to consider whether we should present to Parliament that which we believe to be the more desirable and the more extensive measure of Reform, when such a proceeding would lead to our ranks being diminished by the loss of no fewer than three Secretaries of State, all of them men of mark and character in the Cabinet, and all of them men who, in their several positions, have displayed more than ordinary ability. We may or we may not have come to the right conclusion; but I confess that I could not make up my own mind to so painful a sacrifice as long as there was a prospect, even by the introduction of a Bill less satisfactory to myself, of a compromise being effected. Under these feelings I and the majority of the Cabinet consented to submit to the House of Commons a measure which, I admit, we felt was not perfectly satisfactory, but which we hoped might, at all events, for a time settle this important question. My Lords, it became very shortly obvious that on either side of the House did that proposition meet with a satisfactory reception. It was not accepted by the Members of the late Government, and it was felt by the supporters of the present Government to be such a measure as could not be regarded as a final and satisfactory settlement of this vexed question. We had therefore, during the course of the past week, to consider—and to consider most anxiously—whether we should adhere to our second proposition, or recur to that which commanded the support of the great majority of the Cabinet, and at the cost of a sacrifice of three most esteemed and valuable Colleagues, to present to Parliament that measure which, in the first instance, the majority of the Cabinet considered the most desirable one. I need not say with what pain we came to the conclusion that it was our duty, placed in the position in which we are, charged with the awful responsibility of endeavouring to settle this great question, seeing no alternative, seeing it was proved last Session that our predecessors could not frame a successful measure on this subject, and seeing also the infinite importance of not allowing this question to stand Session after Session in the way of public business, to keep alive perpetual agitation and excitement in the country—to struggle with the difficulty. I felt it my duty to struggle with the difficulty, and my Colleagues supported me in that determination. I, for my part, whatever regret I might experience in separating from those of my esteemed Colleagues, who could not bring their convictions into unison with those of the remainder of the Cabinet, felt it my duty neither to throw up the post which I hold nor to abandon the hope of carrying a Reform Bill. I have determined to bring forward and to submit to Parliament, with such assistance as I can obtain, the measure which it was at first intended to introduce, but which the circumstances that I have explained to your Lordships led us for the moment to abandon. That measure will be in a very short time laid before the other House of Parliament. I trust that by the expiration of the present week we shall be able to replace—I will not say whether we shall be able to replace adequately or not—the Colleagues whom we have had the misfortune to lose. I believe that at the expiration of this week we shall be able to present a complete and united Cabinet; and I trust that, at no distant period, we shall be prepared to lay before Parliament the measure which we originally determined to introduce; and we hope, and hope most earnestly, that we shall be able to bring it to a satisfactory conclusion during the present Session. I cannot express the regret I feel at parting with three of the most important and most valued of my Colleagues, to whom I am united by feelings of political and personal friendship; but I felt that if I had not endeavoured to go on I should have failed in my duty to the public and to my Sovereign. And, whatever pain I may feel on account of this separation, I trust that the remainder of my Colleagues will be equal to every duty they may have to perform; and that, in the course of the present Session, we may bring to a successful conclusion this great and paramount question, which has so long baffled all Administrations.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: My Lords, after what has fallen from my noble Friend at the head of the Government I feel it necessary to trouble the House with a few words. There are two reasons why I should abstain from entering at any length into this question at the present time. First of all, it is to me a matter of infinite pain even to seem to enter into any kind of controversy with my noble Friend; and secondly, the provisions of the measure which Her Majesty's Government are prepared shortly to lay before Parliament are not yet known to the public generally, and it is impossible for me to justify the course I have taken, without reference to the measure itself. But I am anxious to state one thing, which is this:—In separating myself from my Colleagues I have not been influenced by any indisposition to deal with this question. I have felt from the very commencement that there was no alternative but to undertake the task of dealing with it, after the pledges which had been given by individuals, by successive Governments, and by the words which Her Majesty herself had spoken. More than that—I felt it right that this question should be now finally settled. Ever since the Reform Act of 1832 the number of the working classes has, perhaps, had a tendency to diminish rather than to increase in the representation, and certainly it has decreased in comparison with the representation of other classes. I felt that this question ought to be dealt with, and that considerable classes of our fellow-subjects might safely and with advantage be enfranchised. I admit the necessity and the justice of such a measure. I thought, moreover, such a measure might well be a bold and a new one, not too closely linked in character to former measures relating to this subject. And, at the same time, I have all along felt—and my Colleagues will confirm me as to this point—that an ample measure should be brought forward in an ungrudging and free spirit, because I believed that unless that were done there would be no chance of settling this vexed question upon an enduring basis. But I also entertained a strong opinion that the measure ought not to be a one-sided one, and that, while we admitted a full proportion of the working classes, we should not admit them in such proportions, and under such conditions, as would place them in absolute pre-eminence and control over all other constituents. I shrink from a class government of whatever kind; I shrink from the dead uniformity of any one class or interest or opinion; I shrink from sweeping away all intervening barriers and reducing the complicated system of English constituencies to two clearly defined, and, perhaps, ultimately hostile classes—a rich upper class on the one hand, and a poor artizan class on the other. Those are the views which have constantly weighed on my mind; and if I agreed in many of the principles of the measure to be introduced, I felt at the same time that principles by themselves, as mere principles, are almost worthless, and that the only test you can have in this case is the common test of arithmetic. Now, that was the test I ventured to apply to the measure of which my noble Friend has spoken; and I could not hide from myself that, no matter how satisfactory its general principles might appear, the change proposed would bring about results very different from those which were expected. I do not want to go into details; but I saw great reason to fear that the results of the measure would effect an enormous transfer of political power, and alter the character of five-sixths of the boroughs of this country—that the principles might be good in theory, but the compensation in practice was illusory. I felt that I could not be a party to a change of so very great and extensive a character; though, as I have already assured your Lordships, I quite recognised the importance of admitting so many of the unenfranchised classes. In proof of my readiness to accept a large measure of enfranchisement, I may mention that, personally, I should not be afraid to go down to that point which is sometimes said to be the only resting-place—namely, household suffrage—in all those boroughs which exceed a certain limit of population, and to establish a £6 rating franchise in other minor boroughs. I mention this to show that, individually,

I had no objection to deal with the question, but, on the contrary, was prepared to accept a large measure, providing only that the conditions on which it was granted were, in my opinion, satisfactory and safe. I have one other thing to say regarding the statement of my noble Friend. My noble Friend alluded to the compromise of a £6 rating introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons. Now, with reference to that proposal, I have only to observe that, if it was a measure distasteful to my noble Friend and, as I think he said, to the majority of the House of Commons, it was equally distasteful to me. It was not what I desired, but I accepted it—as I believe my noble Friend accepted it—simply with a view to prevent the consequences which unfortunately have since occurred. In conclusion, my Lords, I can assure you that the pain with which I adopted the step I have felt it right to take is scarcely to be expressed by me. My noble Friend, I know, undertook the Government of the country from a feeling of loyalty to the Crown, and a sense of public duty to the country. He undertook it under great difficulties and great discouragements; and therefore it has been to me, I think, the most painful act of my life to sever my official connection with him at, perhaps, the very moment of his greatest difficulty and embarrassment. But I have felt it my duty to do so. I have not been able to see how, consistently with my conscientious convictions on the subject, and with that self-respect which every man owes it to himself to maintain, I could adopt any other course. Under these circumstances, I have felt it my duty to place my resignation in the hands of my noble Friend. That resignation has been accepted, and I now hold office only awaiting the appointment of my successor.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I hope it will not be considered presumptuous on my part if, in the absence of my noble Friend Earl Russell, from indisposition, I say a few words with reference to the speeches which we have just heard. On the part, not only of my own friends in the House, but of the whole House, I venture to tender our acknowledgments and thanks to the noble Earl at the head of the Government, for the very much longer and fuller statement than what I am given to understand has been communicated to the other House of Parliament, regarding the proceedings of the Cabinet during the last week, and, indeed, of the whole period during which Her Majesty's Government have been in office. In the first instance, I hope your Lordships will at once give me credit for my desire, on grounds of taste as well as discretion, to refrain from saying one word—whatever the opinion I may have formed—on the differences between the Prime Minister and the noble Earl who has just sat down. It would, indeed, be almost impossible to do so, because there would be very great difficulty in following the statements of the two noble Earls, because we are still very much in the dark as to the circumstances which led to the painful alternative which the retiring Members of the Cabinet thought it their duty to adopt. But what I rise for is to say, that I can entirely confirm the statement of the noble Earl at the head of the Government as to the position he took when assuming office. My recollection is exactly the same as his—that he then stated, in this House, fairly and frankly, that, in respect of the question of Reform, he considered himself free to act according to the circumstances of the time, and to what appeared to him the public exigencies required when the time came. It is true that in a few days after a statement was made by the Leader of the House of Commons which gave rise to a very different impression in the country; but until to-day we were not aware of what the noble Earl has stated, and which is no doubt correct, that almost immediately after they came into office the present Cabinet did arrive at the conclusion (which, no doubt, was the right one) that it was desirable they should deal with the question of Reform. The noble Earl has told us what course they took in order to give effect to that conclusion. They thought it desirable, by very vague and very indefinite Resolutions, to try what the temper of the House of Commons was with regard to this great question. With regard to that I raise no question; but what I do complain of is that, from the statement of the noble Earl at the head of the Government and the noble Earl who has just spoken, it appears that during the eight or nine months which elapsed from the time when they made up their minds that it was right to deal with the question to the period when they placed those Resolutions before the House of Commons, the Ministers not only did not make up their minds on any practical measure, but did not even come to a decision among themselves as to the principles on which it was advisable to deal with the subject. I do think the noble Earl who has just spoken has shown a very proper feeling in not dealing with that part of the Prime Minister's speech in which he intimated he was surprised at the course which three of his Colleagues deemed it their duty to take. It is quite clear that no real decision of the Cabinet had been come to as to what the meaning of the Resolutions solemnly laid before the House of Commons was in their minds and wishes destined to bear. There is only one other subject on which I will make a remark. The fact is, on an occasion like this I should have preferred to say nothing; but I think I ought to observe that the Resolutions were withdrawn in favour of a Bill which, according to the statements of the two noble Earls, was approved neither by the majority nor by the minority of the Cabinet. It appears to me, I must confess, a most extraordinary way of settling differences to have taken a third course, which was equally disagreeable to both the majority and the minority. And, with reference to one observation made by the noble Earl the First Lord of the Treasury, I must deny that any Parliamentary action was taken on the proposals of the Government. There may have been individual speeches made on the subject. In those cases the speakers stated that they spoke for themselves; but as for the acknowledged Leader of the Opposition, no one can say that he did not show a perfect readiness to adopt the mode which the Government thought the best for dealing with the question. On the contrary, speaking of the proposal to proceed by Resolutions, he said that, though he thought it a bad mode of dealing with the question, and though many of his friends were of the same opinion, yet as that mode had been adopted by the Government, he was ready to consider their Resolutions. I am entitled to say, therefore, that though doubts were expressed, and suggestions thrown out, by various speakers, there was no Parliamentary action with respect to the Resolutions produced by the Government, or the very full sketch of a Bill given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on a subsequent occasion. We have heard from the noble Earl who has felt it necessary to retire from the Government (the Earl of Carnarvon), though he was prepared to go as low as household suffrage, something about the other Bill which is to be produced; but we do not know how much lower the majority of the Cabinet are prepared to go. The noble Earl the First Lord of the Treasury spoke of the difficulty of passing a Reform Bill. Every one is aware of that difficulty; but this I will say—that during the last fifteen years there has not been so favourable an opportunity as exists now of passing a measure of Reform which will be satisfactory to the country and settle the question. This opportunity can be frustrated only by the fault of one side or the other. It can be frustrated either by factious opposition on our part, which I hope and believe will not be offered; or, on the other hand, by the inadequacy of the measure to be brought in by the Government. I therefore hope the Government will take advantage of the time which will elapse between this and the bringing in of the Bill—a fortnight or three weeks, I believe [The EARL of DERBY: A fortnight]—I hope they will take advantage of this time in considering what sort of Bill the country really requires, and in endeavouring to frame it in a simple and direct manner, and with as little tendency as possible to puzzle and mystify Parliament and the country. I am not authorized to go further than to express my own conviction, but it is one founded on conversations which I have had indiscriminately with many Members of both Houses—it is, that if the Government approach the question in that way, the party with which I have the honour to be connected will meet them in a cordial and hearty spirit.

EARL GREY: My Lords, I cannot adequately express the regret and concern with which I listened to the statement of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby). I heard that statement with great regret—in the first place, because of the occurrence itself which has taken place; I heard it also with regret because I felt that, after what has been stated to us, there is little chance of this great question of Parliamentary Reform receiving that amount of careful consideration which it ought to obtain in the present Session of Parliament. I regret it most of all because it seems to me that the speech of the noble Earl introduces a novelty into Parliamentary practice, and announces a new system of carrying on the Government of the country, which I believe to be as disastrous to the public welfare as it is certainly unprecedented. If I correctly understood the noble Earl, it seems to me that the view of Her Majesty's Government was that they should come down to the House of Commons without any regular plan of Reform prepared on their own responsibility, and should endeavour to ascertain what were the views of the House of Commons, and act accordingly. My Lords, I thought such a course had been disclaimed. I thought that we had been told upon very high authority that Her Majesty's Government did not come down to the House of Commons to fish for a policy. I do not understand how those two statements can be reconciled. I have always believed, and believe still, that previous inquiry into this great question would have been better before any attempt was made to legislate on the subject. But did that imply that Her Majesty's Government was not ultimately to be responsible for the measure introduced? Far from it. In my opinion there were two courses, and only two courses, open to Her Majesty's Government. They might have either determined to attempt legislation in the present Session, or they might have determined—and I do not conceal my own opinion that it might have been the wisest course—that before legislating certain preparations were necessary. Had they adopted the second of these views, there was then an obvious course for them to have taken. They might, when Parliament met, have proposed Resolutions laying down the main principles on which Reform ought to take place, and then proceeding to pray Her Majesty by Address to institute in some mode or other an inquiry as to the best mode of carrying those Resolutions into effect. I believe that such an inquiry would have been attended with very great advantage, would have thrown much light upon the subject, and would have satisfied the country as to the soundness of the proceeding about to be adopted, and thus have done very much to bring all parties to an agreement. Whenever that inquiry was completed a measure founded upon its results might have been framed by Her Majesty's Government on their own responsibility, and submitted to Parliament in the ordinary manner. There was another very great and difficult subject urgently requiring to be dealt with more than thirty years ago, regarding which at the time there was the greatest conflict of opinion, no two persons agreeing how it ought to be settled. I advert to the question of the reform of the Poor Law. On this most difficult subject the Government of the day appointed a Royal Commission, which was presided over by a very able Prelate, the late Bishop of London, and by the Report of that Commission the Government were enabled to frame and pass a Bill with general assent, which they would in vain have endeavoured to obtain without previous investigation. Something of the same sort might have been done here when once the main principles of Reform had been decided on by Parliament; and this would have tended to an earlier and more satisfactory solution of the question than is now likely to be attained. This, I say, is one course that they might have adopted. If, on the other hand, they determined to legislate without such a Royal Commission, then there was only one course they could have taken with propriety—they should have appointed last autumn the ablest men whom, under the circumstances, they could command, to collect all the information which was necessary to enable them to come to a sound judgment. And the information so collected ought to have been submitted to a Committee of the Government charged with the preparation of the Bill, following the precedent of 1830-1. Such a Committee might have prepared a scheme which, after being considered and adopted by the Government, might have been submitted to Parliament. With a view to the adoption of either of these courses, it would have been a very proper mode of proceeding to submit suitable Resolutions to Parliament. But if the Government intended to legislate this Session, it is quite obvious that Resolutions could lead to no useful result whatever, unless they were founded on a clear and definite view of the subject already adopted by the Government, and contained a distinct explanation of the main provisions of the Bill they intended to propose. The Resolutions actually submitted to the House of Commons were of a totally different character. They could not have been more vague if they had been intended as the preliminary to inquiry, and not to legislation; they decided nothing, and any man at all favourable to any kind of Reform might, with some slight reservations, have adopted them. To bring forward such Resolutions by way of founding a Bill upon them appears to me to have been really a mockery of Parliament. Now, we stand in this position—we shall have had no less than six weeks of the Session wasted before any step whatever is taken. At the expiration of that time, we are then, as appears from the statement made by the noble Earl to-night, with the views of the Government most fluctuating and undecided, to hope that in the course of a few days a Bill worthy of the acceptance of Parliament may be prepared. I would ask any man of ordinary understanding, whether he believes that a subject of this extreme difficulty can be satisfactorily dealt with in this way? For, remember what we have to accomplish. We have not merely to decide to what extent the franchise shall be lowered; but we have to consider with the enlarging of the franchise what other changes may become necessary, in order that the House of Commons may be so constituted as properly to discharge its high functions. Think of what enormous importance it is that the House of Commons should be so constituted. Our desire is that the country should be well and wisely governed. We want to have the House of Commons, both by its legislation, and by its advice and control, directing the Executive Government in a wise course of administration. Now, for that purpose it is necessary that the House of Commons should not merely consult the passing wishes of the majority of the population, it is necessary that the House should be so constituted that the highest intelligence to be found in the nation should be there adequately represented, and should exercise its due influence. A mistake once made in altering the constitution of the most powerful body in the government of this country is irretrievable. It is one of those things in which, if error is committed, you cannot retrace your steps; a mistake once committed may prove fatal. It is therefore most necessary that whatever is done should be done with due consideration and with the greatest possible care. I, for one, can hardly anticipate that when the question now to be dealt with is submitted to our consideration, the Bill drawn up by Government can exhibit that statesmanlike foresight of future difficulties which I believe to be essential in dealing with the constitution of this country, and with our most artificial and complicated social relations. I cannot bring myself to believe that the matter is either so simple or so easy as some suppose. There are considerations of the deepest importance to be taken into account before you decide on the propositions which ought to be adopted. Not anticipating that a discussion of this magnitude could have occurred to-night, I have been compelled to express very inadequately my sentiments with regard to it; but, after hearing the statement of the noble Earl, I felt bound, at however short notice, to express the strong feelings which I entertain. I could not allow this occasion to pass without protesting against the manner in which this question is proposed to be dealt with.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I have no desire to complain of the manner in which the noble Earl opposite (Earl Granville) has discussed the statement which it was my duty to bring before the House, or yet of the good-humoured criticism in which he has indulged upon the course taken by the Government. There was only one point on which, I think, the noble Earl was guilty of a slight amount of exaggeration. He stated that eight or nine months after the formation of the Government the Government themselves had not in the slightest degree arrived at an understanding concerning the foundations of the Bill they were about to introduce. The time may have seemed long to the noble Earl opposite; but I venture to inform him that, up to the present moment, Her Majesty's Government have not been eight months in office. If the noble Earl will calculate the lapse of time from July 11, when the new Ministry was formed, to March 4, he will find that Her Majesty's Government have not been, as I have said, eight months in office, so that the noble Earl can hardly say that eight or nine months were wasted over the preparation of a Reform Bill. The noble Earl has said, then, that it was not until after eight or nine months from the time the Government came into office that its Members agreed among themselves upon the principles of the Bill which they would introduce. My reply is that, with regard to the principles of the Bill and its main provisions, Her Majesty's Government were perfectly agreed in the month of November last; and the only question then remaining for discussion among them was as to the extent to which the franchise should be extended. That was a very important question, upon which, I admit, we desired to ascertain the opinion of Parliament and the country generally. With regard to the criticism of the noble Earl who has last spoken (Earl Grey), I understood him to say that the Government should have taken one of two courses—either to have introduced a measure on their own responsibility, and have declared they would stand or fall by it ; or else to have referred the whole matter to a Commission for the purpose of settling what should be the principles of the Bill afterwards to be introduced. With reference to the first course, I have to say that we profited by the experience of our predecessors ; if we had followed their example—that is, if the Government had determined to stand or fall by their Reform Bill—the probability is that one Government after another would have come forward, none of them would have stood, but each would have fallen, to the perpetual interruption of public business, to the continued absence of all agreement, and to the certain destruction of any measure of Reform, no matter by what party it was proposed. And what if we had taken the other course which he says we should have followed ? Does the noble Earl for a moment think that the country, excited as it was, would have allowed us to delegate the whole of our authority to a Commission, sending it over the country to inquire upon what principles the Reform Bill should be framed ? The late Government thought they had ample information to legislate upon, and we had all the information they had obtained, together with such further information as we had been able to collect ourselves. What would be the object of a Commission ? To frame a Reform Bill ? But what would have been the language of the House of Commons if we had pursued this second course which the noble Earl insists we should have followed ? The House of Commons would have told us our proposal was a makeshift, and have said, “ You are abdicating the functions of your office ; you are loosening the reins of Government ; you are proving yourselves utterly unworthy of confidence ; and, shirking your duty, you endeavour by plausible pretexts to retain office for another year, and seek to stifle the question of Reform.” Such, I think, would have been the result of adopting either of the two courses recommended by the noble Earl. I quite agree with the noble Earl’s description of what it is desirable the House should be ; but, I venture to think the noble Earl’s views in this respect are Utopian ; he looks for an amount of perfection in the House of Commons which no Reform Bill will ever produce ; I go further, and say that, whatever change you make in the Constitution, I doubt whether you will obtain as the result a

House of Commons more truly representing the feelings of the people of this country, or more judiciously, more wisely, and more impartially consulting the benefit of all classes of the community. But it is, nevertheless, true that under the present system a large number of persons are excluded from the suffrage, although they are fit to accept the responsibility attaching to electors, and I believe some of those excluded would exercise the privilege of voting intelligently, honestly, and wisely. These, then, if they had fair play, should be admitted. But the question is to what extent the class to which they belong should be admitted, and what arrangement could be made so as to prevent the electoral body being swamped by its largest and least able portion. This is not a question of principle—it is a matter of detail requiring very close and careful consideration, and I say it is not unworthy of a Government, before they commit themselves to any measure, to ascertain the general feeling of Parliament and the country—to take the House of Commons, as it were, into council—and to be guided by it—not as a matter of principle, as to which they are bound to exercise their own judgment—but as a matter of detail, so as to produce a measure that will be likely to meet the general wish and give general satisfaction. That, my Lords, is the vindication of the course Her Majesty’s Government thought, and still think, it most consistent with their duty to take, and that duty to the best of their belief they have endeavoured to perform.

EARL GREY : I have no right to address your Lordships again, and will not, therefore, trespass upon your time further than to say that I trust your Lordships who have listened to me will recognise how entirely the noble Earl who has just sat down has misunderstood the whole scope of my argument.

BISHOPRIC IN CORNWALL.

PETITION.

THE EARL OF DEVON presented a Petition of Inhabitants of Cornwall, praying for the establishment of a Bishopric in that county. The noble Earl said, that the large population and great area of the county, and the distance of the petitioners from the residence of the Bishop, who at present presided over their clergy, justified their prayer, in his opinion, and he trusted the petition would meet with the favourable consideration of their Lordships.

THE BISHOP OF ELY said, there were several arguments besides those employed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Devon) in favour of the division of the diocese. The difficulty of managing a diocese like that of Exeter did not arise solely from its size and population, but was also to be found in the number of its clergy and the extent of its area. The population was nearly 1,000,000, and was, in fact, by far the largest contained in any agricultural diocese. It was more than one-sixth of the whole population of Ireland, and yet Ireland had ten Bishops; it was more than one-third that of Scotland, and as large as that of the whole of Wales, which, with a nearly equal population, had four Bishops. The population of the diocese of Exeter is as nearly as possible equal to that of the four dioceses of Carlisle, Hereford, Bangor, and St. Asaph put together. Therefore, comparing the population of the diocese of Exeter with other populations, their Lordships must arrive at the conclusion that it was most inadequately represented by one Bishop. The diocese of Exeter, too, contained nearly 1,000 clergy, more than were to be found in any diocese except London and, possibly, Norwich. The acreage was far larger than that of any other See, Durham, the next largest, containing less by 500,000 acres. Its acreage was about equal to that of South Wales, which possessed two Bishops, and he felt certain that those Bishops had as much work as they could manage. Another consideration was to be found in the difficulty of access to many of the Cornish parishes, the nature of the two counties being exceedingly unfavourable to locomotion. Devon and Cornwall were particularly rugged, and, though not so mountainous as Wales, travelling was more difficult, because in a mountainous country the roads were generally formed in such a manner as to avoid or go round any difficulty that might be in the way—whereas in Devonshire and Cornwall the roads were cut straight through the country. But, in fact, railways afforded very little facility to Bishops in visiting the parishes in their dioceses, for Bishops on such occasions were obliged to go to villages long distances out of the way of railroads. The populations of the two counties were, too, entirely different in character and race. The population of Cornwall was Celtic, self-reliant, and much inclined to the Wesleyan form of worship; and, having himself been a Cornish clergyman, he could, from experience, bear testimony to the fact that clergymen in Cornwall felt that a Bishop residing at Exeter, 150 miles from many parishes in his diocese, could enter but little into the feelings and wants of the population of Cornwall. He might add, that the division of the diocese, as proposed by the petitioners, would amount merely to the restoration of the ancient order of things, for there used formerly to be a See at St. Germans. Objection had been made, and probably would still be made, to any increase of the Bishops, on the ground that they possessed no power. He was, unfortunately, compelled to acknowledge that their coercive power was very small—so small, indeed, that a Bishop was frequently not only unable to remove a clergyman guilty of gross immorality, but was compelled to suffer heavy pecuniary loss, simply because he endeavoured to perform his duty. Still, however, Bishops possessed very large powers. The correspondence of a Bishop formed a very large part of his duties—he received on an average, he believed he might say, little short of 5,000 letters a year from the clergymen and laity in his diocese, asking for advice and assistance; and when these letters were responded to, it was very rarely that the advice of the Bishop failed to meet with a hearty and cordial concurrence. Another objection sometimes urged is, that the creation of a bishopric for Cornwall would be like an aggression on the Wesleyans, who now preponderate so much in that county. Although the Cornish people were so far alienated from the Church as to be to a great extent Wesleyan Methodists, he denied that they had any strong hostile feeling against the Church. The Wesleyanism of Cornwall was not the same as the Wesleyanism of many other parts of the kingdom; and he could testify from his own personal experience that, on the contrary, they had a strong feeling of attachment and adhesion to the Church, and that they frequently expressed a desire to see a Bishop in Cornwall. Wesleyanism had at one time exercised, with most beneficial effect, a great deal of influence over the poorer classes in Cornwall and in the north-western counties; and many of those who were alienated from the Church were saved from immorality and infidelity by the benign influence of the Wesleyan Methodists. He was sorry to say that, especially in the northern counties of England, that influence was gradually waning, and that in towns, like Leeds and Liverpool, it was giving place, not, he was sorry to say, to the influence of the Church, but to irreligion and open infidelity. He acknowledged with thankfulness that the Wesleyans had done a noble work; but as their influence was fading away, was there any reason why a Bishop should not be created, whose presence would add to the strength of the Church in Cornwall, and to the cause of morality and good order?

LORD VIVIAN anxiously hoped that their Lordships would not accede to the prayer of the petition. The petition purported to have been signed by 1,600 persons; but, in his opinion, a far greater number of signatures might easily have been obtained against its prayer. He could not see what advantage Cornwall was to obtain from the creation of this bishopric. Although the diocese, which included the county, was presided over by an aged and infirm Bishop, yet still, under ordinary circumstances, the railways and high roads afforded great facilities for the performance of the duties which that Prelate had to discharge. He trusted that if money was to be expended upon the spiritual welfare of the county it would be given to the poorer clergy of the diocese, many of whom wanted and deserved assistance, instead of it being expended upon the salary of a Bishop. He was not a Wesleyan, but a Churchman, and he thought that in Cornwall they were better without a Bishop than they would be with one.

THE BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL said, that last year he was in Cornwall and officiated at a confirmation in the remotest part of the county. On that occasion he had had an opportunity of conversing with very many of the clergy and of the laity of Cornwall on the subject now under discussion, and he must say simply and frankly that he found among them a warmth of feeling, a heartiness of expression, and a depth of desire that did them very great credit. He had, of course, alluded in those conversations to the present state of things, and had pointed out that the present venerable Bishop was in a great degree precluded from making those visitations which were necessary to the performance of the duties of the diocese; and he put the case whether, in the event of the Bishop being middle-aged, and in possession of his full powers, they would still desire a Bishop for Cornwall. The reply was, "We desire a Bishop for Cornwall above all things; we feel that we are separated in a great degree from the neighbouring county of Devon, and we desire to have a Bishop to dwell among us, to sympathize with us, and to guide us; one who will gather up the strong Church feeling which exists in Cornwall, and who will at the same time conciliate those who do not conform." He had seen none of the feeling of antagonism to the Church to which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Vivian) had alluded; and from the experience he had obtained elsewhere he believed that the Wesleyans, who were earnest and true-hearted men, desired that the Church should be efficiently managed. He had never seen any hostility on the part of the Wesleyans to the Church, but rather the Christian desire that all things should be built up and well ordered. He must still maintain the opinion that were a discreet, kind, and considerate man to be appointed Bishop of Cornwall, not only would there be no opposition on the part of the Non-conformist, but he would be welcomed with all heartiness. Having travelled to the most distant parts of that county, he found communication to be exceedingly difficult. He trusted that their Lordships' favourable attention would be given to the prayer of the petition; and in asking that, he might say that he had no ulterior views, thoughts, or projects for turning their decision in the present instance into a precedent for the creation of more bishoprics in other parts of the kingdom; but only desired to speak honestly and heartily in favour of this part of our country having the presence and guidance of a Bishop among them.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE said, that as he was a landed proprietor in Cornwall, and as he had never heard a word of such a petition as this being in contemplation, he inferred that no pressure had been used to obtain signatures to it. He thought that the Government were bound to take the matter in hand, and to determine whether or not there was such a necessity for the creation of the bishopric for Cornwall, severed from the bishopric of Exeter, as was set forth in the prayer of the petition. The presence of a Bishop, and his kindly intercourse, especially with the poor, in the county of Cornwall, would, he believed, produce a most decided re-action among the population favourable to the Church of England. He therefore did hope their Lordships would seriously entertain the prayer of the petition, and that the Government, if they saw their way to appoint another Bishop, would not hesitate to do so.

LORD HOUGHTON regretted that the right rev. Prelate who spoke first after the noble Earl who presented the petition (the Bishop of Ely) had thought it necessary to fortify his argument by reference to the alleged decline of Wesleyan Methodism. Living, as he did, in a large manufacturing district, and seeing the extensive prevalence of that body, he could not let pass the assertion of the right rev. Prelate that its influence had declined. He believed the Church had a great deal of real sympathy from the Wesleyan body. He remembered that it was the saying of Dr. Hook that Wesleyanism was the Establishment of the West Riding, and he believed he was very willing to accept their assistance in that character. With reference to this petition he would make one remark. He was very glad the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol) treated it as a special case. It was, indeed, a very special case; because from the unfortunate state of the present Diocesan's health the whole diocese of Exeter was actually without the administration of a Bishop. It was therefore a most unfortunate moment to bring forward the special case, when the venerable Prelate who presided over the diocese was weighed down with age and sickness; but who yet, even under these circumstances, showed great intelligence and activity of mind. He hoped the Government would pause before taking action on the petition. He saw great difficulty in increasing the number of the Episcopal Bench, and the Government would have to consider, not only the individual case, but also the great political question involved.

LORD LYTTTELTON was disposed to give the proposal his most hearty concurrence, though he might prefer some more general measure; and he ventured to say unless such a measure as his noble Friend advocated, if brought into the House, met with more formidable opposition than had been indicated to-night, he should have very little apprehension of the result.

Petition ordered to lie on the table.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Arthur Hugh Smith Barry, esquire, for Cork County. PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries [61]. Committee—British North America [52]. Report—British North America [52]. Considered as amended—Duty on Dogs [36].

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—BOROUGH FRANCHISE.—QUESTION.

MR. WARNER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will be willing to re-consider the expediency of adopting in the Reform Bill the principle of his abandoned Resolution No. 5, and to discuss, as a possible basis of Borough Representation, the following or some similar proposition:—Occupiers who for two years have been rated to the poor, and not excused on the ground of poverty, to have one vote for each Member to be elected; Residents in the Borough who for two years have been assessed to House Tax or to Property or Income Tax upon the full scale to have one vote for each Member to be elected; Persons entitled under both qualifications to vote under both?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Gentleman will, perhaps, allow me to answer that Question at another time.

CASE OF THE "TORNADO."—QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has any objection to lay upon the table of the House the following documents, which appear to have been omitted from the printed Correspondence presented to the House respecting the seizure of the Tornado:—First, the enclosures in the owners' letter to the Foreign Secretary, dated the 26th of November last—namely, the copy of the Ship's Register and Bill of Sale; the copy of the Shipping Articles, or agreement with the crew; and the copy of the Customs clearance from the port of Leith. Second, a letter from Mr. Saul Isaac, to the Foreign Secretary, dated Cadiz, November, 1866. Third, a letter addressed to the Foreign Secretary by the owners of the Tornado on the 15th ultimo?

LORD STANLEY : The first set of papers, Sir, to which the Question of the hon. Gentleman refers were omitted from the blue book merely because they were very voluminous, and the whole purport of them was to be found in other parts of the Correspondence. As, however, the hon. Gentleman has called for them, and as there is no reason against their production, they can be printed in the appendix. With regard to the letter from Mr. Saul Isaac, under date of November, 1866, I cannot find any such letter. There is one, however, written in October, 1866, and perhaps the hon. Gentleman will communicate with the writer and let me know whether that is the letter to which he refers. With regard to the letter of the 15th ultimo, that will also be produced. It was received since the publication of the blue book.

SANITARY CONDITION OF LIVERPOOL. QUESTION.

MR. SAMUELSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will lay upon the table the recent Report of Mr. Taylor on the sanitary state of certain parts of Liverpool, and on the condition of the dwellings of the poor in that town; and whether he has received from the local authorities of that place any satisfactory assurance that the recommendations of Mr. Taylor will be promptly carried into effect?

MR. WALPOLE : Sir, the Report of Mr. Taylor is a very long and a very valuable one. It has been only recently delivered at the Home Office, and I have not yet had time to go through it, but when I have done so I will inform the hon. Gentleman whether it can be laid on the table.

SPIRITS, BEER, AND WINE LICENCES. QUESTION.

MR. PEASE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been drawn to the evils arising from the fact that a separate jurisdiction exists for granting Licences for the retail sale of Spirits, Beer, and Wine; and, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to bring in a Bill to place the granting of these Licences under one jurisdiction?

MR. WALPOLE : The matter, Sir, referred to by the hon. Gentleman has been brought under the notice of Her Majesty's Government in a vast variety of forms, in the several different applications made to the Home Office on the subject. Some particular applications are at this moment under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but until they have all been thoroughly examined, I am not prepared to state to the House what course the Government will take.

ARMY ESTIMATES.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, Whether he proposes to make his statement on the Army Estimates to-night, the Supplementary Estimates having been laid upon the table only that evening?

GENERAL PEEL : I do not propose to take any Vote with regard to the Supplementary Estimates. If the House will permit me I propose to go on with the ordinary Estimates.

MR. OTWAY said, he wished to know, whether the number of men to be voted for the year's service was not settled by the first Vote? But as certain rumours were afloat, it was open for the House to surmise that the successor of the right hon. Gentleman might not agree with him as to the proper number to be voted for the year's service. ["Order!"]

GENERAL PEEL : The first Vote will be that for the number of men. It would be of the greatest possible convenience to the House that I should explain the grounds upon which these Estimates have been framed. I propose to bring them forward to-night, and there would be no use in my doing so unless we were to take the Vote for the number of men, of which, I trust, I shall be able to give a very good explanation. I am sure the House will acquit me of any wish to deceive them. I wish to give the House the opportunity of separating the two Estimates, in order that it may have the opportunity of agreeing or disagreeing with the proposals I shall make with regard to the Supplementary Estimates. The Supplementary Estimates have nothing to do with the ordinary Estimates; but if there is the slightest wish I will postpone my statement.

MR. GLADSTONE : There is no Gentleman in this House who would think of imputing to my right hon. and gallant Friend a wish to deceive anybody in the House or out of it; but I am bound to say that the question as to the number of men is one directly and essentially connected with the strength of the reserve which you propose to establish. If the public service requires that there should be a Vote of money taken in Supply, of course there is an easy expedient—to take a Vote on Account. The statement can be made without taking the Vote, and I hope my right hon. and gallant Friend will give us an assurance, which I am convinced is required by the facts of the case, that he will not propose to take the Vote for the number of men to-night.

GENERAL PEEL: I will postpone my statement until Thursday, and the House will have then an opportunity of seeing what I propose to do. I have no desire to bind the House to anything until I have made my explanation.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whom I understood to intimate just now that he would answer to-night the Question put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich (Mr. Warner), Whether it is his intention to give that answer, perhaps in combination with some other matters with which of course I have nothing to do, upon the Motion for the House going into a Committee of Supply?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER. It is.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, since I last had the honour of addressing the House, the majority of the Cabinet having resolved to recur to their original policy with respect to the borough franchise and to establish it, in their belief, upon a sure, extensive, and permanent basis, I deeply regret to say that three of our Colleagues have felt under the necessity of tendering their resignations, which have been accepted, and they hold their seats only until their successors are appointed. I still more regret to say that among them is one whose name I am sure will ever be mentioned in this House with honour and regard—my right hon. and gallant Friend the Secretary of State for War (General Peel). I need not refer to his readiness and personal wish to have the opportunity of explaining to the House those Estimates and that policy which he has recommended to his Colleagues, and which they have adopted and sanctioned. I am sure that neither myself nor any of his late Colleagues for a moment wish to stand in the way or to take objections to his doing so, and I hope that my right hon. Friend, as still Secretary for War, may have the opportunity which he desires. But I have to tell the House that arrangements have been suggested which, when they have been submitted for Her Majesty's pleasure and have been sanctioned by her approbation, will allow me to state that the Government of Lord Derby is complete, and I believe it will be in my power to make that announcement on Friday. Perhaps the House will also allow me to indicate the course which Her Majesty's Government propose to pursue with respect to the Reform Bill. They propose to introduce it on the 18th of this month. They propose likewise to ask the House to take the second reading, if convenient, on the Monday following. There will then remain ample time for complete discussion of the measure. If the measure be accepted, as soon as consistent with the public business we can go into Committee, and I shall make a proposition on the part of the Government that the House shall sit in Committee on the Bill de die in diem.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(Lords.) [BILL 52.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. OSBORNE: I cannot help thinking, Sir, that the time has arrived when, after having been kept for three weeks in the dark as to the policy or intentions of the Government, some further explanation is due to the House. ["Order!"] I am speaking, Sir, on the Motion that you leave the Chair.

MR. SPEAKER: The House is now proceeding on the Motion for going into Committee on the British North America Bill.

MR. OSBORNE: I was about to move, Sir, on the Motion that you leave the Chair, that the House do now adjourn. I cannot think that I am taking any liberty with the House in moving the adjournment. This is no common period in the history of Parliament. Sir, what has happened? For three weeks this House has been kept in the dark as to the proceedings of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer came down, not on the first night of the Session, but on the Monday following, and, like Cagliostro expounding the secret of the philosopher's stone, he left us as much in the dark as we were before. And what has now happened? We are told that the Government is about to recur to its original policy. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman, or, at any rate, some of his Colleagues that are left, or possibly those that have gone, what the original policy of the Government was? This House has a right to demand what it was. Whether it was to land us in an £8 rating or in household suffrage no man in this House or the country knows. It is but decent to this House—it is, at any rate, what the country demands, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman—whether he is the late or the present Secretary for War I am not able to say—whom we all admire and respect for his consistency and also for his noble abnegation of self, that he, or at least the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne), should tell us what that original policy was, or why they have left Her Majesty's Government? I will not press the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary for War on this occasion, because he is still sitting on the Treasury Bench, and possibly some other policy may be initiated which may keep him there; but I ask the noble Lord, who I am sure will not scruple to tell us, the reason why he has left the Cabinet. I ask the question out of no vulgar curiosity, but because it is an explanation to which not only this House, but the constituencies which sent us here are entitled. I am surprised that such a duty should have devolved on so humble a Member as myself; but I am sure that I only reflect the common sense of the country in asking why the noble Lord has left the Government, and what is the original policy to which the Government have recurred after three weeks' consideration. I beg, Sir, to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Osborne.)

COLONEL SYKES said, that some nights ago, in Committee of the House, a sum of £6,000 was voted for excess of expenditure, and he wanted to ask the Secretary of the Treasury what this was for? ["Order!"]

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: I regret to say, Sir, that my reply to the hon. Gentleman must necessarily be brief. He must be aware that it is not in the power of those who have had the honour of forming part of Her Majesty's Government to speak as to what has taken place without the permission of Her Majesty. That permission I have not received, and I therefore regret to say that I cannot satisfy the hon. Gentleman.

MR. OSBORNE: I give notice that I shall renew the Question at the first opportunity.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think, Sir, the answer which has just been given by the noble Lord is one which is perfectly sufficient and conclusive. At the same time, I am bound to say that I do not think any blame attaches to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) for referring to the terms in which another disclosure or revelation has to-night been made to the House. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not confine himself in the brief statement that he made within necessary bounds. He did not merely state that alterations had occurred which would call for time in order that Her Majesty's Government might well consider their course; but, as has been observed by my hon. Friend, he also told the House that the Government had "recurred" to their original policy. Now, Sir, that is an explanation which imports more difficulty than it removes, and I own I am sorry that such a declaration was made; because the mind of every man who heard the right hon. Gentleman must have immediately conceived—indeed, it was involved in the very words—that the original policy which has now been revived was, at the time when it formerly existed, the policy of the entire Cabinet, including, therefore, of necessity, the three distinguished persons of whose services the Government have now been deprived. At this critical moment, therefore, when I am sure the House would gladly have consented, with that delicacy and justness of feeling for which it is so remarkable, to abstain from all inquisition, the expressions of the right hon. Gentleman most unfortunately have had the effect of casting upon his Colleagues who have retired the responsibility of some change of policy, which has been ostensibly the cause of the present embarrassment. I am sure the noble Lord and my right hon. and gallant Friend will forgive me if I point out that which appears to me to lie upon the very surface of the case, and that they will not for a moment presume that I am giving an opinion on the matter. I think, however, that there are a few words which it is necessary at this juncture to say on the part of the House. Four weeks have now elapsed since the House met, and those four weeks have not been, as they were last year, weeks of silence on the part of the Government, justified, or, at any rate, believed by us to be justified, for stated and substantive causes; but they have been weeks in which we have seen more than once an attempt to make a fitful and uncertain advance, to be followed by a speedy and unequivocal retreat. When Parliament met, a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne announced the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring before us the question of the representation of the people, and great satisfaction was felt by us all when the right hon. Gentleman made the engagement, which he afterwards fulfilled, that on a very early day he would open to the House the views of Her Majesty's Government. When, however, those views were opened—I will not say anything either in praise or in blame of them—it certainly appeared to the House, and I think to the country, that instead of advancing with the question, we stood at a point somewhat behind that which we had occupied on the first night of the Session. There were, consequently, general demands for a further elucidation of the matter, and on Monday last the right hon. Gentleman brought down a plan and laid it before the House. We then for a second time—the first being the opening night of the Session—thought that progress was to be made. No debate took place upon that plan. A few remarks were made by myself—I am not sure whether any were made by any other Member—and those remarks certainly did not convey any intention to oppose that plan upon the second reading of the Bill that was to be introduced. No sooner, however, had that plan appeared than it also seemed to be smitten with paralysis, and there went forth rumours in London and throughout the country that that plan was itself to be withdrawn. Without Parliamentary opposition, almost without Parliamentary comment, that scheme has ceased to exist. At this moment we find ourselves at the point at which we originally stood. I have seen in a distant country an ancient Greek dance, in which the women, from moment to moment, commence by advancing three steps, and immediately afterwards continue the dance by retreating two steps. But our case is not quite so favourable, for, in the political dance of the present Session, if the advance has been three steps, the retreat has been of three steps also. Now, I advert to this matter not as a question between party and party, but because there are others besides ourselves who are interested in it; and it is essential, in my opinion, to the well working of the Constitution that the country should not lose, and that we should do nothing to diminish, the confidence which the country places in the House of Commons as a body capable and competent to deal with public emergencies when they arise. Therefore, I hope that at the point at which we have arrived we shall henceforward have one definite, consistent movement in the same direction. I am bound to say—and I do not fix the charge on the Government alone, I speak of the House of Commons without distinction of party—that unless we can convey to the mind of the country more distinct and definite convictions of our capacity to treat this great occasion with the force and decision it demands, not the Government alone, not those who sit behind them, but all classes of this great assembly of the Parliament of England will stand materially discredited in public opinion. I have said so much on the subject of procedure. With regard to the substance of the Bill, I do not intend to go into any further criticism, which I assure hon. Gentlemen opposite circumstances alone have extorted from me, and my deep conviction as to the somewhat critical position of the House itself before the country. I do not intend by that criticism to qualify anything that I may have previously presumed to say, on behalf of myself and others, with respect to the reception which we shall give to a definite proposal from the Government. I may venture to express, however, a hope that that proposal when it appears will be of a simple, straightforward, and intelligible character. I will not ask that it shall not contain what is new. It must contain what is new. But I will ask and I will express a hope that it will not contain what is new-fangled. The people of this country are eminently attached to simplicity of procedure, and I think there never was a moment when they were in mood less favourable for dealing with plans and schemes which might seem to them to deviate from the character of simplicity. I trust, above all, that the Bill of the Government may not be a measure containing two sets of provisions, one of them framed to have the semblance of giving, and the other constructed to have the reality and effect of taking away. I may perhaps be uncharitable in allowing my mind to be influenced, even in the slightest degree, by those rumours with which the air is thick and full; but it is not possible wholly to resist their effect. And I say, in conclusion, that if the Government, avoiding those dangers—serious, I think, for all public men, and more serious when the question has reached that state of complication and entanglement at which this question has unhappily arrived—if the Government, escaping those dangers, shall submit a plan, good, simple, ample, straightforward, constitutional, and intelligible in its character, I venture to promise that it will be received on this side of the House in no grudging spirit—with no recollections of the past, with no revival of those mutual suspicions and complaints which I grant may be bandied from either side of the House to the other, but with an earnest desire to bring the endeavours of the Administration to a speedy and prosperous issue. I wish to make an appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Fife (Mr. Aytoun), with respect to the Bill for the Confederation of the North American Provinces, which is now proposed to be committed. My hon. Friend had given notice of his intention to raise a debate upon the 145th section, which relates to the construction of a railway which will unite the Provinces of British North America. I cannot help thinking, and I am sure I express the feelings of the Under Secretary for the Colonies, that it will be much better to wait for the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman with respect to the guarantee, than to raise the discussion of a question so important upon this clause in the Bill. Having read the clause with care, and having consulted upon it with others, I venture to give the most confident opinion that it has no bearing upon the obligations of Parliament, and that the discretion of Parliament must remain entire, subject only to the announcement of the Government with respect to the proposed guarantee. Upon an early day there will be ample opportunity given for full discussion on the question; and therefore it will be better to allow the Bill to go through Committee, it being a matter which appertains—I will not say to the security, but to the dignity of the Empire, and which should proceed from stage to stage without unnecessary delay.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 41 (Continuance of existing Election Laws.)

MR. E. W. T. HAMILTON said, he wished to ask whether it was intended to give the franchise to females, or to confine it to males? The clause as it stood said that "every British subject" of the prescribed age should have a vote.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he presumed it was not intended that females should vote.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 42 to 52, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 53 (Increase of number of House of Commons.)

MR. E. W. T. HAMILTON said, that in the clause a power was reserved of increasing the number of Members, and he thought it might be desirable to give the power of also diminishing it. The total number of Members who would be required for the general and provincial Legislatures would be 550, which might be found too many to be conveniently furnished from a population of 4,000,000. 550 Members would be equivalent to a population of 15,000,000. He was aware that the number had been settled by the delegates of the Canadian Provinces; but he wished them to have the power of diminishing the number if it should be found too large.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the population of the Provinces was rapidly increasing. The Bill had been drawn for a representation based on the existing electoral districts in the several Provinces, and such an alteration as the hon. Member suggested would involve a subversion of the entire arrangements of the measure.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the greatest possible importance was attached in Canada to the maintenance of the electoral districts as they stood, inasmuch as any re-arrangement of them by a dominant majority might tend to interfere materially with the interests of the minority.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that the proposed Amendment would destroy the symmetry of the measure.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 54 and 55 agreed to.

Clause 56 (Disallowance by Order in Council of Act assented to by Governor General.)

MR. E. W. T. HAMILTON said, he thought some greater limit should be put to the time during which Her Majesty had power to disallow any Acts that might be passed. Two years was too long a period for Her Majesty or Her Majesty's Government to consider whether they would allow or disallow a Bill. He also suggested that a provision should be inserted by which a Bill reserved for Her Majesty's approval should become law unless Her Majesty disallowed it within a certain specified time.

MR. ADDERLEY said, the clause before the Committee only provided for the disallowance of a Bill within two years. He would not discuss whether the time were too long or not; but he did not think that was the best opportunity to alter a rule with regard to the disallowance of Bills, which applied to all the colonies. He was satisfied, too, the hon. Member could entertain but little apprehension that Her Majesty would exercise her power in that respect in a manner injurious to the Confederation.

Clause 58 (Lieutenant Governors of Provinces.)

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that in his opinion, the appointment should be made by the Crown and not by the Governor General. The Lieutenant Governor should come from England, and should be independent of and not hold office merely during the pleasure of the Governor General. With regard to the two Lieutenant Governors, who would be superseded by this Bill at Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, he wished to ask if any compensation would have to be made to them?

MR. CARDWELL said, that upon the score of pensions there was no difficulty in the case. The late Lieutenant Governors of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia had been provided for, the one having been made Governor of Hong Kong, and the other of Trinidad. The present Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia had been informed that he received his appointment only until the Bill before the House was passed, and he had accepted the office on that understanding. In New Brunswick the duties of Lieutenant Governor were being discharged by the officer in command of the forces; so that no claim for compensation would in either instance arise. On the general question that the Lieutenant Governor ought to be nominated by the Crown, he must say that he thought to adopt that course would be to act contrary to the whole spirit of the Act, which was to render the North American Provinces as far as possible one community, the Governor General representing the Crown, and being in communication with, and responsible to, the Colonial Office.

MR. GRENFELL said, great inconvenience might result in time of war if the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia were not placed in direct communication with the Colonial Office.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he could very easily communicate with that office through the Governor General. He also considered that it was better the appointments of Lieutenant Governors should be made by the Governor General, entirely on his own responsibility, than that they should be vested in the Crown. Supposing the Crown retained the appointment, reference would have to be made to the Governor General to ascertain the qualifications of persons suitable for office. It was one of the objects of the Bill to strengthen the hands of the Governor General as much as possible.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 69 (Legislature for Ontario.)

MR. ROEBUCK said, that according to the Bill there was to be one Legislature for Upper Canada or Ontario, consisting of the Lieutenant Governor and one House, while the Legislature for Lower Canada or Quebec was to consist of the Lieutenant Governor and two Houses. He wished to know the reason of this difference.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the Representatives of Upper Canada preferred a single Chamber, and those who represented Quebec desired to retain their present two Chambers. The fact was that Lower Canada was a little more Conservative than Upper Canada, and preferred its existing local Legislature; which Upper Canada was ready at once to reduce to a municipality.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he rather agreed with Upper Canada in this matter, because he fancied he saw some element of difficulty, with respect to the nominated Upper Chamber, which certainly could not arise where a Province only had one Legislative assembly. There was no aristocracy in Lower Canada, out of which a suitable Upper Chamber could be formed. Many years ago, representing the interests of Lower Canada, he had endeavoured to do away with the nominative Legislative Council. They now avoided that evil in Upper Canada, but they were perpetuating the evil in Lower Canada.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 91 (Legislative Authority of Parliament of Canada.)

MR. E. W. T. HAMILTON said, he wished to know how a conflict of jurisdiction between the Parliament of Canada and the Provincial Legislatures was to be settled?

MR. ADDERLEY said, he did not think that any serious conflict of the kind anticipated by the hon. Member could take place so long as a supreme power was vested in the Governor General to veto Acts.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the framers of the American Constitution foresaw this difficulty, and provided a Supreme Court, whose province it was to decide whether even the laws passed by Congress were illegal. This Bill, however, seemed a lop-sided one, and contained no provision to prevent the passing hereafter of laws which might be unconstitutional. In other words, the Canadian Parliament would be supreme. Supposing the Governor General and the Parliament of Canada were to pass a law that the Municipal Constitution of Nova Scotia was in contravention of this very Act, who was to decide whether they were right or wrong?

MR. CARDWELL said, he was afraid that the defect pointed out by the hon. and learned Member was not one which, in the present state of feeling in the North American Provinces, it was possible to remedy. As matters now stood if the Legislature of Canada acted ultra vires, the question would first be raised in the Colonial Law Courts, and would ultimately be settled by the Privy Council at home. No doubt it was a defect, but the point had undergone consideration by the delegates, who thought it would be better to leave things in this state.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 145 (Duty of Government of Canada to make Railway.)

MR. AYTOUN said, that he had placed on the paper an Amendment to the effect that this clause should be omitted; but after the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, whom he understood to say that the clause could in no respect fetter their freedom of action when the Bill guaranteeing the loan came on for discussion, he would not press his Amendment. He wished, however, to ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies to state, whether in the negotiations anything had occurred to render it possible for the colonies to consider that this clause, if passed, would bind the House in the discussion which would afterwards take place on the Bill for granting a guarantee.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that there was no doubt that the present Government had come to an understanding with the Canadian delegates that they would propose a guarantee to Parliament, but there was nothing whatever in the clause under consideration that would bind the House to that proposal when made. The history of the clause was simply this—the completion of the Intercolonial Railway was regarded by the various Provinces who were parties to the Bill as a sine qua non, and they wished to have the clause inserted in this measure with the view to record the agreement among themselves, thus giving it a sanction. What would be proposed to Parliament was to guarantee the interest at 4 per cent upon a loan of £3,000,000. The Confederation would be completed by the Bill. There was nothing in the Bill that could pledge Parliament, which would be left entirely unfettered, to discuss the guarantee when proposed.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that in 1859 he went with the delegates, who were then here from America, to Lord Derby upon the subject of this Intercolonial Railway. He stated to Lord Derby at the time that it was an Imperial, and not merely a colonial question, because it might happen that we might have a quarrel with the United States in the month of December; and, if so, Canada would be a sealed land to us because the St. Lawrence would be frozen. It would, therefore, be of great importance to us to have means of transporting troops to Canada. The very case which he contemplated occurred in the affair of the Trent. The noble Earl saw the force of that statement, and the deputation left him with the impression that the railway would be made. Soon afterwards there was a change of Government, and the right hon. Gentlemen who entered office—thinking it their duty to undo everything that Lord Derby had done, good, bad, or indifferent—stopped the guarantee. As time went on, however, they—much to their credit, and very unlike the rest of mankind—learned by experience; they took the matter up, and the right hon. Gentleman who was then Secretary for the Colonies consented to do the very thing that his leaders had, some two or three years before, prevented.

MR. LOWE said, there was some difficulty about this matter. The clause was peculiarly worded. We proposed to enact that these States should make arrangements for the construction of the railway in question within six months after the union. But we had no power to do anything of the sort. We could not issue a mandamus to compel them, and yet we pledged ourselves as strongly as words could do to make this railway. We commanded that which we had no right to command. His right hon. Friend had declared that this railway was considered by the colonists a sine quâ non. And then the House was asked to go another step. They were informed that a Bill was to be laid before them for the purpose of giving a guarantee, and that this clause would not in any way hamper their discussion when the Bill on the guarantee came before them. If the Government gave such an assurance, he supposed they must take it. But for that assurance he should have thought the clause would commit Parliament to the loan. But if it should be the pleasure of the House to refuse this guarantee, as he hoped it would, he trusted they would not have the gentlemen who represented the North American Colonies turning round by-and-by and saying that they had enacted this clause about a guarantee and then refused to carry it out.

MR. E. W. T. HAMILTON said if they were to pass this clause in its present shape they would have no option but to assent to the guarantee when the Bill on the subject was presented to them. He understood that if the Committee passed this clause and made the House a party to the agreement, which was a sine quâ non with the Maritime Provinces, they would be obliged to give a guarantee for the loan which was now stated to be £3,000,000, but which he had always heard would amount to £4,000,000. If the question rested on the grounds stated by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, he would not give his assent. It was not because it was a matter of Imperial concern, and that otherwise we might not be able to get our troops into Canada, that he was willing to entertain the question of a guarantee. He would do so simply on the ground that it might be for the interest and well-being of the Provinces.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished hon. Members to read the clause and see what it really meant. It said that inasmuch as the Provinces had determined that such a railway was essential to the connection between them, be it enacted that it shall be the duty of the Government and Parliament of Canada to make it. That was all that was in the clause, and when hon. Gentlemen talked of its being a guarantee they should try and see what the words meant. If the clause provided anything else let somebody get up and say what.

New Clauses added.

Clause A. Salaries of Lieutenant Governors shall be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

Clause B. Salaries, &c., of Judges, &c., to be fixed and provided by the Parliament of Canada.

Also a new Section VIII. Revenues; Debts; Assets; Taxation.

Clauses C. to A.A. added.

Also a Third Schedule List of Provincial Public Works—Property to be the Property of Canada.

House resumed.

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered upon Thursday.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.
QUESTION.

MR. OSBORNE: In order, Sir, to put myself in order, I am about to move the adjournment of the House, and I take this unusual course in consequence of a transaction which had occurred in "another place." I did not think that I was putting myself unnecessarily before the notice of the House at the beginning of the evening when I demanded some explanation from the Treasury Bench as to the unusual position in which this House has been placed. The right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), however, maintaining that system of silence which has characterized the Government from the commencement of the Session, refused to give any answer, and the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) intimated that he had not received Her Most Gracious Majesty's permission to make any statement to the House. The House assented, and was left in that ignorance in which, if it depends on the right hon. Gentleman, it will be kept until the 18th of March. But what has happened in "another place?" The secret with regard to the Bill which, we being the most interested party, ought to have communicated to us in the first place, that secret has been let out in "another place." Not only has the noble Lord the Leader of the Government (the Earl of Derby) communicated in "another place" the original policy of the Government, but a noble Lord (the Earl of Carnarvon), who has resigned office, has, it appears, received the permission of Her Majesty to state, and has actually stated, the reasons why he has left the Cabinet. I leave the matter to the consideration of the House. If the House is content to be treated as a mere Court of Registry, to assent in silence, and to abdicate its functions, I shall say no more; but there are people out of doors who will see, with astonishment, that while a communication has been made in "another place," the Leader of this House maintains a silence which is as extraordinary as it is obstinate. I beg, Sir, to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Osborne.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, I can give a satisfactory reason for the silence which I have observed. I had communicated with my noble Friend (Viscount Cranbourne), and was aware that it was not in his power to make any statement to the House, and I certainly think it would have been most unbecoming in me to enter into details which I myself had not received sufficient authority to disclose, and under particular circumstances, in which others were obliged to be silent. I have no doubt, however, that an opportunity will be properly taken for that frank communication to the House which always occurs when political changes of this kind happen. What has occurred in "another place" is unknown to me, and unless I receive some authentic account of it, I am not disposed to put upon it the interpretation which the hon. Gentleman has done. All I can say is, that in the course which I pursued I was influenced, not only by a sense of public duty, but by those private feelings of honour which, I hope, will always animate Members of this House.

MR. ROEBUCK: No interpretation is required in the matter. The fact is palpable that in this House information has been refused, which in "another place" has been granted. If the right hon. Gentleman has had no communication with his Leader it only shows that there are more divisions in the Cabinet than the House were aware of an hour ago.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

DUTY ON DOGS BILL—[BILL 36.]
(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration as amended read.

MR. HUNT moved the omission of that part of Clause 3 referring to packs of hounds. He said, that the intention was to give an advantage to masters of packs; but owing to a supposed ambiguity in the wording they entertained an impression that the clause would operate to their prejudice, and that they would not be able to take out licences at per head.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration as amended read.

MR. HUNT said, he had promised to state at the earliest opportunity the decision of Her Majesty's Government as to the day on which the change of duties should take place. They had received communications from the Governments at the Hague and at Paris. The conditions which the Dutch Government attached in case the new duties came into operation earlier than the 1st of May were such, that Her Majesty's Government found it would be inconvenient to accede to them. They were confirmed in that opinion by finding that the French Government took the same view. Her Majesty's Government therefore proposed that the 1st of May should be the day on which the new duties should take effect, and they were glad to learn that those interested in the trade entirely agreed with this decision. He should therefore propose to substitute the word "May" for "March" throughout the Bill, and to defer the third reading for some little time.

Bill re-committed for Wednesday.

(Mr. Stephen Cave, Sir Stafford Northcote.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, its object was to assimilate the law relating to private oyster-beds to the law as it was laid down by the Act of last Session in regard to beds formed under that Act. By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 75, oyster taking from private beds was made theft, and by the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, it was made felony. It was, however, held that the thief must be taken in the very act, and that oysters were not property in the sense that they could be followed. In this way the thief almost invariably escaped punishment, and the ends of justice were defeated. To meet this defect in the law provisions were inserted in the Act of last Session, making oysters the absolute property of the owners of beds, and thus converting the stealing from a statutory offence to an offence at common law, and capable, therefore, of more easy detection and punishment. These provisions existed in the case of companies having private Acts, such as the Herne Bay, Roach River, &c., Companies. By some oversight this part of the Act of last Session was confined to beds formed under the Act, which was a manifest injustice to owners of private beds lawfully formed previous to the Act. The owners of these beds had consequently been nearly ruined by thefts which it was impossible to prevent, and which were stimulated by the high price of oysters. The Bill simply extended the remedies under the Act of last Session to private oyster-beds. There were certain shadowy claims by individuals and corporations in the nature of manorial rights over certain oyster-beds, which were difficult to define or enforce, and were frequently disputed. It was not intended to cure defects in such titles, and therefore the operation of the Bill was limited to beds which had been exclusively worked by or under the owner for five years past. This was to be considered sufficient evidence of a perfect title. He had now explained the whole scope of the Bill, which simply carried out the principle already affirmed by Parliament in the Act of last Session and other Acts.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday.

COUNSEL TO THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA BILL—[BILL 51.]

(Mr. Selwyn, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Coleridge.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Selwyn.)

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he intended to move an Amendment in this, a fuller House than he had addressed on a former occasion. The object of the Bill was to enable the Counsel to the Secretary for India to sit in the House of Commons, and he moved an Amendment to the effect that the House should resolve itself into such Committee on that day six months. The present Counsel was Mr. Forsyth, who was returned for Cambridge, but unseated by a Committee of the House on the ground that his sitting in the House was contrary to the statute of Anne, which disqualified any one for a seat in the House who received emoluments from the Crown, imposing also a penalty of £500 for a breach of its provisions. He objected to the Bill because it was exceptional, and because, as Counsel to other Departments of the State might be equally required in the House, the Act of Anne should be dealt with as a whole. When he had questioned the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Friday night whether he intended to repeal the statute of Anne in favour of the gentleman whom it was proposed to appoint as Equity Counsel to the Treasury, the right hon. Gentleman declined to give an answer. If he were to take for truth the old adage that silence implied consent, then it was clear that the right hon. Gentleman was in favour of the hon. and learned Gentleman sitting in the House. There was no more reason for this official to sit in the House than for many other learned gentlemen who occupied analogous positions. The House should either admit all or admit none. He should not object to a Bill throwing over the statute of Anne altogether, and allowing the Counsel for all the Departments to sit in Parliament. There were altogether seven Standing Counsel for different offices, and he saw no reason why legislation should take place for a particular case.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee," — (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee,)

—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he approved the Bill, on the ground that constituencies ought to have the fullest freedom of choice in the selection of representatives, and that restriction by disqualification was opposed to the policy which ought to govern our legislation. The statute of Anne was obsolete, because it was passed under the influence of jealousy lest the Crown should obtain undue influence in that House. But the House now, indirectly, appointed the advisers of the Crown, without whose advice the Crown could do nothing. One objection to the restriction was that it was technical. An officer appointed by the Crown could not sit in the House, but one appointed by the Ministry could. The Secretaries to the Treasury and the Admiralty did not, on appointment, vacate their seats, because they were appointed by the Lords of the Treasury and the Admiralty. It would be easy, therefore, to secure an officer a seat in that House by providing that he should be appointed, not by the Crown, but by the Ministry. The restriction was therefore a delusion, because it was grounded on technicalities; and if Mr. Forsyth had been appointed, not by the Crown, but by the noble Lord at the head of the India Office, he might have sat in the House. The thing was absurd, and could not be justified. He was sorry the Bill did not extend to other cases; but that was no reason why they should not deal with this case. He accepted the Bill as an instalment towards a desirable consummation when every constituency should possess the fullest liberty in the choice of its representatives.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the Bill was directed against an absurdity. The statute of Anne was passed when there was a contest between the aristocracy and the Crown, and that contest had entirely passed away. The aristocracy fancied that the Crown might acquire power in the House of Commons; but we were now living under new circumstances, and the real qualification for a seat in that House was the vote of a constituency. Lord Macaulay made a remarkable speech in that House upon the question of the Master of the Rolls being entitled to sit there, while other Judges were excluded. Doubtless that was one of the anomalies that ran through our laws on the subject. A Lord of the Admiralty vacated his seat when he was appointed, but a Secretary of the Admiralty did not, because the former was appointed by the Crown and the latter by the Lords of the Admiralty. The slightest alteration of arrangements would enable the Ministry to bring in whom they pleased, provided the persons had constituencies; and if the counsel to the India Board were appointed by the Board instead of by the Crown, he could sit in the House. Why that course was not adopted he did not know. No man in his senses could imagine that the Crown could acquire undue influence in the House through inducing a constituency to send into the House a person appointed to an office by the Crown. The Bill would effect good to the extent of doing away with one anomaly, and it was an odd reason for opposing it that it did not abolish other anomalies. Our whole legislation had been piecemeal, and experience showed that it was advantageous in the long run to abolish grievances piecemeal, and not by wholesale.

MR. COLERIDGE said, he must explain why he stood in the somewhat anomalous position of supporting the Amendment while his name was on the back of the Bill. It was his own fault entirely, and not that of the hon. and learned Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Selwyn), that he wrongly understood the object of the Bill. He had supposed it was designed to appoint a sort of Attorney General for India, to advise the Government, and to go in and out like other officers of the Government. To such an officer he could not see any objection, as Indian law was a special subject with which the generality of English lawyers were not familiar, and if the statute of Anne stood in the way of the appointment of such an officer it would prevent the appointment of a useful one. But if the proposal was that the counsel was to be a permanent officer he saw considerable objection to it. It was undesirable to let the Government appoint an officer who was practically irremovable, and who, being fully acquainted with all the details of the policy of a Government, might not agree with it, and might from his place in the House oppose it. It appeared to him that there would be considerable practical inconvenience in the appointment of an officer who, he understood, would not go in and out with the Government, but would be irremovable. He should, therefore, vote in favour of the Amendment.

MR. SELWYN said, he regretted that any misapprehension on the subject should have existed in the mind of his hon. and learned Friend; and if the forms of the House would allow it he should be ready to move that the name of his hon. and learned Friend should be at once struck off the back of the Bill, especially as the speech just delivered had convinced him that even now the hon. and learned Member had not read the Bill, and did not understand its provisions. His anxiety had been to divest this Bill of anything like a party character, and he was therefore desirous to have two Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House to support the Bill. One of those Gentlemen, who, he understood, was favourable to the principle of the Bill, was the hon. Member for East Surrey, and the other his hon. and learned Friend who had just spoken, and whose only doubt, he then believed, was as to the two sections of the statute of Anne. He (Mr. Selwyn) had never thought of creating any new office, but the object of the Bill was merely to remove an exclusion which was not merely an accident, but also an anachronism. The hon. and learned Serjeant (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee), who had moved the rejection of the Bill, seemed to think that he (Mr. Selwyn) had advocated the Bill upon personal considerations, but that he altogether denied, and he would not, therefore, speak of the Gentleman who held the office at the present time. It was plain that this exclusion was merely the result of accident. If there had been any doubt on the subject before, it must have been removed by the statement of one of the Members of the Committee—Sir James Fergusson—who said they did not at all dispute the proposition laid down that if the office were an old one, the transfer of patronage to the Crown did not make it a new office; but that their decision was founded upon the circumstance that the Act required a scheme, and that this office was included in the scheme. When the Act of 1858 was passed the office in question was held by Mr. Loftus Wigram, who at that very time sat in that House as one of the representatives of Cambridge University. That being the case, it was impossible to doubt that the question as to the exclusion from Parliament of the holder of that office must have been present to the minds of the framers of that Act, and of the Legislature which passed it. The members of the Counsel were expressly excluded, but the Standing Counsel was not, and if it had been intended to exclude him the Act would doubtless have declared it. The hon. and learned Serjeant must be singularly ignorant of the position occupied by Mr. Wigram if he supposed that, for the sake of retaining this office, he would ever have resigned his seat for the University of Cambridge. But this exclusion, besides being an accident, was also an anachronism, and a proof of that was to be found in the speech of the hon. and learned Serjeant, who had said that the power of the Crown was increasing, had increased, and ought to be diminished. That statement might be left to answer itself. Lord Macaulay, in a memorable speech on the proposed exclusion from Parliament of the Master of the Rolls, said that nothing could be more unreasonable, or more inconvenient, than the rule which laid down that the holder of an office created since the 25th of October, 1705, should not be a Member. He added—

“A great jurist seated among us might, without taking any prominent part in the strife between the Ministry and the Opposition, render to his country most valuable service, and earn for himself an imperishable name. Nor was there ever a time when the assistance of such a jurist was more needed, or more likely to be justly appreciated, than at present.”

But it had been objected that it would be exceedingly inconvenient to take the opinion on matters of Indian policy of a person who might have been appointed by a Whig Government and who would consequently be in opposition to the Conservative Secretary of State. This objection, however, had been conclusively answered by Lord Macaulay in the speech which had been already referred to. The truth was that the House would not require from a legal officer an opinion on matters of policy, but simply information as to matters of fact. As an instance of this he might refer to the debate of Wednesday last on the sale of banking shares, when the Solicitor General was asked by an hon. Member opposite as to what were the limits of the liability of partners who had retired from associations of that kind. So as to the right of adoption question, the Standing Counsel to the Indian Secretary would be asked, not what was his opinion on the policy of adoption, but what was the fact respecting the terms in which treaties were usually drawn up in India. He could not help thinking it would be a very great convenience if there were an officer in the House who could answer questions of that nature, and that consequently the exclusion of the holder of the office was a great disadvantage to the House of Commons. There never was a time when such assistance was more requisite as would be evident if they regarded the increase of trade between this country and India, and the importance of our relations with the Native Princes of that country. On ordinary questions of law, if information were wanted by any Member of the House, an appeal might be made to the Law Advisers of the Crown; but the questions with which the Counsel for India would have to deal would be of a very difficult and of a special character. Then, as to the inconvenience of such an officer being permanent, and to his being called upon to serve alike under a Whig and a Tory Government, he would point, by way of analogy, to the Counsel to the Admiralty, in which case no such inconvenience had been felt, though the successive holders of that office had sat in the House for many years. It was true as the hon. and learned Serjeant had said, that there are many barristers who would be glad to accept this office, but the Secretary of State was bound to choose, not amongst the hundreds of briefless barristers, but amongst those who had deserved and obtained professional success; he was bound to look out for a man who could worthily fill the office; and men of that class usually aspired to a seat in the House of Commons, and would therefore decline an office which was subject to such a condition. The choice of the Secretary of State would thus be materially limited, and by insisting on this exclusion a great injury would be inflicted on the public service.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER said, he felt it is duty not to allow this Bill to go to a division without expressing his opinion of it, though, for personal reasons with reference to the Gentleman who now held the office, he should do so with regret. He thought that considerable advantage to the public might arise from a careful revision and consideration of the disqualifications introduced by the statute of Queen Anne. There would also be some advantage in the revision of those provisions of the statute of Anne, which made every acceptance of office, even though it involved only a change from one office to another, necessarily lead to a new election. If any hon. Member proposed that the whole of that subject should be referred to a Committee, or if the Government thought fit to refer it to a Commission, considerable public benefit might arise from that course. He certainly should not commit himself to the opinion that the present case, among others, might not be properly dealt with by a change of the law consequent on such an inquiry. But he had a strong impression that it was unfit and inconvenient that a change in the law on that subject should be introduced in the manner now proposed for one particular case. If there was one principle clearer than another it was that a Bill for one particular case should be founded on reasons especially applicable to that particular case, and not on reasons of a general character, tending to the subversion of a law which had been, and still was, acted upon in a great number of other cases. The hon. and learned Members for Dundalk and Sheffield (Sir George Bowyer and Mr. Roebuck) had avowedly based their support of that Bill on a general disapproval, as unsuited to the present time, of the statute of Anne, and all the disqualifications it contained. In their view the right principle was to give an unlimited choice to every constituency, and abolish altogether all such official disqualifications. But there was a multitude of those disqualifications; and the House would hardly allow itself to be drawn into the hasty affirmance of so broad a principle, by so narrow an application of it, as a Bill to except one particular office from the general rule. On that ground, he thought it would be unwise to pass that Bill. But his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Selwyn) did not rest his advocacy of it on any such general ground; but said that, without interfering with any general principle at all, it might be supported on its own merits. Before the decision of the Committee, he had himself doubted whether the particular appointment in question was an office within the statute at all; but a Committee of most competent persons having come to the conclusion that it was, it must be assumed in the present discussion that their conclusion was right. What, then, were the special reasons urged by his hon. and learned Friend for taking that disqualification out of the general category? His hon. and learned Friend said it was an accident and an anachronism, and that if the attention of Parliament had been called to the case, provision would have been made enabling the Standing Counsel to the Secretary of State for India to sit in that House. But how his hon. and learned Friend was able to divine what would have been the legislation of the House, if a question had been brought before it which never was brought before it, it was difficult to understand. His hon. and learned Friend said that in the very Act of 1858, a clause was introduced to prevent the Members of the Indian Council from sitting in that House; but if they were to adopt his line of reasoning it would lead them to the conclusion not only that the legal adviser of the Secretary of State for India should be eligible for seats in that House, but that the Members of the Indian Council should also be so; for who were more competent to enlighten the House on Indian questions than the members of the Indian Council? But the policy of the statute of Queen Anne was, as to those gentlemen, solemnly re-affirmed at the passing of the Act of 1858. Again, he did not think there would be that kind of advantage which his hon. and learned Friend expected from having the legal adviser of the Minister for India in the House, to be interrogated as to the law of India by all Members who might desire enlightenment on the subject. If the legal adviser of that Minister were to sit there, the one thing he ought not to do was to answer questions of that kind, affecting Indian affairs; for his special duty would be to advise the Government on such subjects; and as the legal adviser of the Government he was a confidential officer. Nothing could be more inconvenient than that he should be interrogated generally by hon. Members. As to the reference which had been made to a recent discussion connected with the succession to the Rajah of Mysore, those who had attended to that class of questions must be aware that there was a great difference of opinion among lawyers as well as statesmen as to the effect of Indian legal documents, especially as to those which might or might not contain words of inheritance; and much inconvenience might easily arise if the legal adviser of the Secretary of State were allowed to be interrogated upon such nice points in that House. The conclusion he came to, therefore, was, that although the presence of that Gentleman in the House, upon other general grounds, might possibly be of advantage, if they allowed the Counsel for the Home Office, and for all the other Departments to sit there also, yet there would be no special advantage in the legal adviser of the Secretary of State for India sitting there to enlighten the House on points of law, in respect to which he had confidentially to advise the Government. Therefore, all the special reasons urged in favour of the Bill failed. He expressed no opinion on the policy of sweeping away all these disqualifications, further than to say that the subject was one which well invited, and might well reward, general revision. But he protested against legislation which prejudiced the principle of a large and important public statute resting on public policy, by taking a particular case out of it without any sound reasons, applicable to that, more than to other cases.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, that as a Member of the Committee which sat last year and unseated Mr. Forsyth, he might state that the only ground on which that gentleman was unseated was the accidental circumstance that in the Act of 1858 there was a clause requiring the Secretary of State for India to submit a scheme constituting the establishment connected with his office, which fact alone tended to make Mr. Forsyth's office a new one under the Act of Anne. Moreover, the Committee were not unanimous in their decision. This might, therefore, fairly be viewed as a doubtful case which the Bill was introduced to meet. The case of the Members of the Indian Council was not parallel, for they were incapacitated to sit in Parliament by an express clause in the Act; whereas the learned counsel was accidentally disqualified merely because he formed part of the establishment of the Secretary of State. A salary of £500 a year was the sum paid to that gentleman, and if he was to be incapacitated on that account from sitting in the House, the only result would probably be that the Secretary of State would not have a Standing Counsel, but would refer to a person learned in the law for advice as occasion arose. It was absurd to suppose that an eminent counsel would be influenced in political matters in that House by a salary of £500. At the same time, that particular case could not perhaps be wholly dissevered from many others of a similar kind; and he would suggest that the Motion and the Amendment should be withdrawn, and that his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Selwyn) should consent to refer the subject to a Select Committee to be dealt with on broader and more general grounds.

MR. SELWYN said, if such was the feeling of the House, he was very willing to accede to it.

MR. AYRTON said, the policy of the law was entirely against the admission to that House of any persons who were appointed by the chiefs of the public Departments.

ABYSSINIA—IMPRISONMENT OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the British artisans who have been or are about to be taken out by Colonel Merewether to Masowah are to be exchanged for the captives now detained in Abyssinia, or are to be sent into that country after the latter are released; and, if so, whether it will not require great care and attention to prevent the transaction from simply resulting in the change of one set of prisoners for another?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, strict orders have been given to Colonel Merewether that these artisans are under no circumstances to go into the interior until all the prisoners now detained by the King of Abyssinia shall be released. They have gone by their own free choice and upon their own responsibility. I took care before they went out that the position and the whole circumstances of the case should be carefully explained to them. As to the last part of the Question, it is rather a matter of argument than of fact. All I can say is, that, as the House very well knows, the whole question of the release of these captives is surrounded by difficulties; and we believe that the course we have adopted, though it may be open to some objections, is still open to fewer than those which presented themselves to the adoption of any other course, and presents the best chance of success in the object we have in view.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. TOLLEMACHE said, he wished to ask the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been called to a Bill introduced by the Mersey Docks and

Harbour Board for raising a further sum of £1,100,000 for new works, the entire bonded debt of the Mersey Board already amounting to nearly £14,000,000, and the Birkenhead docks and works being still unfinished, and particularly to Clause 3, authorizing the raising of the sum of £334,000, to replace money expended on unauthorized works at Liverpool, in contravention of Clause 5 in the Mersey Dock Act of 1864, which provided that no part of the money to be raised under that Act should be expended on any works at Liverpool until the northern entrances of the Birkenhead Docks "shall have been completed, to the reasonable satisfaction of an officer to be appointed by the Board of Trade," and which certificate has not yet been obtained; whether his attention has been called to Clause 12 in the same Bill, authorizing the payment of local rates out of the sinking fund specially directed to be maintained by the Act of 1859, instead of paying such rates out of revenue; and whether any Report from the Board of Trade upon this Bill will be presented to the House?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that the Question was one which had excited a good deal of interest on account of the magnitude of the points at issue. The attention of the Board of Trade had been directed to this Bill, both by its promoters and by those who opposed it. But his hon. Friend would see that it would be very inconvenient to attempt answering the Question when there could be no discussion, or to give any intimation of an opinion upon the merits of the case. If it had been the will of the opponents of the measure to challenge its merits upon the second reading, there would have been an opportunity of discussion, and no doubt statements would have been made on both sides adequate to the occasion. But that course had not been taken, and he felt that it would be undesirable that he should now express any opinion upon matters which would be much better left to the Committee upon the Bill. The Board of Trade had now given up the practice of reporting, as a matter of course, upon Bills of this description, and there was no intention of making a Report upon this subject. He understood that at one time there was some hope of an arrangement between the parties on either side, and thus avoiding the necessity of sending this measure before a Committee. He would have been very glad if that course had been adopted, or if in any way the Board of Trade could have brought about a settlement between the parties. He did not see, however, any probability of such a course being taken.

LANCASTER, YARMOUTH, &c., COMMISSIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will lay upon the table of the House a Return showing the expense of the Royal Commissions appointed to inquire into Corrupt Practices at Elections for Lancaster, Yarmouth, Totnes, and Reigate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If the hon. Gentleman will move for that Return it will not be opposed.

CASE OF THE "TORNADO."

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If eight of the crew of the Tornado are still kept close prisoners by the Spanish authorities; and, seeing that it is admitted in a despatch to Sir John Crampton, dated Foreign Office, February 8, 1867, that all the crew of this ship have been "arbitrarily detained, on one pretext or another, for many months," and that "they have been subjected to hardships as unnecessary as they were cruel," whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any steps to obtain redress for these unfortunate and ill-used British subjects?

LORD STANLEY: I regret, Sir, to say it is true that eight of the crew of the Tornado are still detained by the Spanish authorities. I cannot say that they are detained as close prisoners, because the captain, and one other person, whom I believe to be an officer, have been allowed to go about on their parole. But, perhaps, a better idea of the present state of the case will be obtained if the House will allow me to read a telegram which I received yesterday from Sir John Crampton, in answer to one which I sent making inquiries on the matter. The telegram is as follows:—

"The present state of the case of the Tornado is this, there are two appeals pending against the Prize Court at Cadiz, on the ground of its being illegally constituted and incompetent to take cognizance of the case. Until this question is decided, the Prize Court takes no steps to continue the proceedings, nor the Spanish Government any to maintain or enforce the sentence which they do not consider to be definitive. The detention of part of the crew is grounded on the requirements of the captors for their evidence as witnesses, either in case the Prize Court is declared competent, and the proceedings already held by it carried to their termination, or else in case the Prize Court is declared incompetent, and the affair is entered upon de novo, and treated administratively, or tried by another tribunal."

As to the question of indemnity, that is a matter which cannot well be disposed of until the course finally taken by the Spanish authorities with respect to the prisoners shall be known. I shall, however, be ready in a very short time to lay the papers upon the subject on the table.

CANADA—EXTRADITION OF M. LAMIRANDE.—QUESTION.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, When he will lay upon the table the Correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Governor General of Canada, as also with other persons in the colony, regarding the extradition of M. Lamirande?

MR. ADDERLEY: Sir, the Papers containing the Colonial Correspondence on the subject have been ready for some time for presentation, and there is no wish whatever to delay their production; but it is thought desirable that they should appear at the same time as the Foreign Office Correspondence with the French Government on the same subject, as the two elucidate each other. We are waiting for an answer from the French Government, and when it is given the correspondence will appear.

LORD STANLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that we have received the communication which I said a few nights ago we were waiting for, and the papers will be prepared for presentation in a short time.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

Moved, "That the House at its rising do adjourn till To-morrow at Two o'clock."

MINISTERIAL EXPLANATIONS.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wish to take this opportunity of making some few remarks upon a subject which was treated yesterday, as some thought, too cursorily, but I think only from misapprehension. I believe my noble Friend the Member for Stamford is now present, and

Lord Stanley

I will now make some remarks upon the course which has been taken by the Government. It has been said that I was hardly justified, when I announced yesterday the secession of three of our Colleagues, in stating that secession to have taken place in consequence of the majority of the Cabinet having arrived at a decision in favour of our original policy, because no original policy had been intimated to the House. Now, I think that criticism is not accurate, and, because not accurate, not just. On the 25th of last month, in intimating to the House the measures which a united Cabinet were prepared to recommend to Parliament, I most distinctly adverted to other propositions which it had been our wish to bring forward, but which we had not felt authorized in making. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] I am glad the right hon. Gentleman opposite admits the accuracy of that observation. I distinctly stated on that occasion that there were other measures which would have enabled us to deal with the borough franchise on a more extensive scale, but which we had felt ourselves obliged to relinquish. Well, Sir, in bringing forward the measure which I introduced on the 25th of February, I hope to satisfy the House that we were not influenced by any thoughtless spirit, and that in the course which we took, we were impelled only by those principles which ought to influence public men, under the circumstances in which we were placed. And here I must remark, with reference to some expressions which have come to my notice—though they were used in "another place"—that there is no foundation for the charge which has been made against the present Government, that they neglected for a long period the consideration of the important subject which now so much engages the attention of Parliament, and that it has been taken up by us without sufficient thought, with indifference, and after a delay, characterized, probably, by negligence. Now, Sir, there is no foundation for that charge. Early in the autumn Lord Derby wrote to me, and told me that, after grave deliberation, he had arrived at the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary to deal with the question of Parliamentary Reform, and that it must be dealt with in no niggard spirit. That communication was made to me by Lord Derby early in the autumn, and he requested me to give my best attention to the subject. Sir, I do not say that Lord Derby, charged with the responsibility of State affairs, and anxious, if possible, to bring to a happy solution one of the most difficult problems of modern politics—I do not say that the feelings or even the conduct of Lord Derby, in the interval between the time when he made that communication to me and the first meeting of the Cabinet, were not modified, as the conduct of every public man must be modified, by the circumstances of the time, by the temper of the nation, by observation of general or particular opinions, by acquaintance with the obstacles which he should have to encounter, and the various combinations which it might be necessary to enter into to obtain the end which he desired. He must, indeed, be constituted differently from other statesmen if his course were not modified, even sometimes arrested, by such circumstances. But this I will say of Lord Derby, that what was his first opinion early in the autumn is his last opinion, and is one upon which he is prepared to act. Sir, we had more than the hope, we had the expectation, that we should have been able to propose to the House a measure conceived in the spirit which had influenced Lord Derby when he made that communication to me in the autumn, and sanctioned and supported by all his Colleagues. After having entertained, however, an expectation of that character, we were unhappily, and I must say unexpectedly, disappointed in that hope. Sir, I impugn no man's conduct under these circumstances. I am confident, for my own part, that every Member of the Cabinet of Lord Derby, whatever his opinion on the subject, or whatever the course he may have taken, acted only in duty and in honour. That, however, being the case, called upon somewhat unexpectedly to arrive at a decision, and feeling that he had entered into an engagement with his Sovereign and with his country to bring this question, if possible, to a solution, Lord Derby sanctioned the measure which on the 25th of last month I brought before the House. Upon that measure I shall make one remark. The House must not think, because we were unable to carry into effect the more considerable measure which we had planned, that we had recourse to a scheme which we had only suddenly adopted. The measure I proposed on the 25th of February was one which had engaged our attention, and especially the attention—the mature attention—of Lord Derby. We had always been of opinion that if, unfortunately, we should not be justified in introducing the measure which we wished, that was the one which ought to be brought forward, because it could be defended upon principle. I speak of it with impartiality, because it is not and need not now be concealed that it was not the one which I myself should have preferred; but it is one, in my opinion, which I could consistently and honourably recommend to the House, because it is founded upon a principle, and between that measure and the policy which Lord Derby would have preferred there is in our belief no other course possible. The principle upon which the measure which I described on the 25th of February is founded is this—it seeks to restore, and would restore the labouring classes to that place in our Parliamentary system which they forfeited by the Act of 1832. If, for example, it had been carried, the constituency of England would have consisted probably, allowing for double votes, of 1,400,000 persons, and the labouring classes would have possessed of that constituency exactly one quarter. Then, take the great landed proprietors and the various classes in connection with them, and give another quarter to them, and a moiety of the constituency between those two sections would have been left to the various sections of the middle class. That, therefore, was a policy which was founded on a principle, for it would have offered to the country a constituency which bore in its various classes a due and harmonious relation to each other, and which, adapted no doubt to different places and to different circumstances, would have placed the working class in the position from which they were expelled in 1832. ["Oh, oh!"] That was a measure, moreover, which we had reason to believe might have been accepted by Parliament. It was brought forward by a united Cabinet, and we entertained an expectation that there were many influential Gentlemen opposite who would have accepted it. But what was the fact? I must say this, though individually I was not surprised at the result, that it did not give satisfaction to the great Conservative party of the country. I am not speaking merely of those influential Gentlemen who have the honour of representing the Conservative party in this House, though I have reason to believe this they entirely represent the feeling of the country in this respect; but I may say this, that not a day lapsed after the measure was brought under the consideration of the House without persons of the highest authority in the country, men of the greatest stake and standing, who are distinguished by what are called Conservative opinions, expressing their regret that this measure had been adopted, and that the course which Lord Derby was supposed to uphold—and which, indeed, he had, without circumlocution, taken the opportunity of intimating to his followers his wish to support, had not been pursued. Sir, there was a general feeling throughout the country, or at least, through the most important Members and communities connected with the Conservative party, that the question of the introduction of the working classes into our Parliamentary system should not be dealt with in a contracted spirit. Then, Sir, how did that proposition fare with Gentlemen opposite, on whose support in some degree we had hoped we might have counted? Why, the very next day, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Lancashire called his friends together—very properly, for I do not condemn his conduct, or the decision at which they arrived—and after consultation they came to the conclusion that the proposition was unsatisfactory, and that no settlement could be satisfactory unless it were based on a £5 rating. [Cries of "No, no!" from the Opposition.] That, at all events, was the information which reached us. Probably it was not accurate, and much of the information that reaches you about us is equally unauthentic. I think, however, it will not be disputed that our proposal was not popular with the Liberal party, and that, in fact, some counter-proposition was to be made. It seemed to us, therefore, that we were fast sinking into that unsatisfactory state which distinguished last Session, when one proposition was met by another not materially differing from it, and that the attempt to bring this great question to a solution would have been fruitless in the present as it had been in preceding Sessions. But, Sir, we are conscious that there is some difference between this and the preceding Session, and we did believe and hold that if the question were not seriously and earnestly and vigorously grappled with, it would not be for the honour of Parliament or the advantage of the country. Well, Sir, under these circumstances, Lord Derby called his Colleagues together, and wished them to re-consider the course which had been pursued, and the course which he had formerly and originally wished to pursue.

And he expressed his strong opinion that the course which he originally wished to pursue was the only one that would lead to a solution which would be satisfactory to the country, and enable Parliament to agree to a measure, and would, on the whole, be most conducive to the interests of the country, present and future. I regret to say that under these circumstances, although a majority of the Cabinet supported Lord Derby, we had the great misfortune of losing three of our Colleagues. Sir, I know there may be some in this House who think that the circumstance of losing Colleagues, although it may be a disagreeable incident, is one which, like many of the casualties of life, must be encountered and endured. Some, indeed, think that the breaking up of a Cabinet is like the breaking up of a social meeting, and that these things are easily forgotten and passed over. But I see some right hon. Gentlemen opposite who have had the misfortune of parting with Colleagues, and I think they will agree with me that the disruption of that tie—that separation from men with whom you have long been bound by a tie of the most intense interest—that of attempting to manage the affairs of a great country in the hope that you may be contributing to the public welfare—is one of the most painful and saddest incidents that can occur. I rank it among the calamities of life. If my resignation of office could have prevented that unfortunate result, that resignation was at the command of my noble Friend. It was at his command then, as it has always been. And whether I have sat on that side of the House or on this, those who know me know that I have always said that no personal sacrifice on my part should I hesitate to make to maintain a united party or a united Cabinet. But the state of affairs would not have been bettered by my retiring from office. We lost Colleagues with whom it was a pride and pleasure to act; and my only consolation under the circumstances is that I feel certain the services of such men, whatever may become of myself, will not be lost to their country. And there is one among them whose commanding talents, whose clear intelligence, capacity for labour, and power of expression will always, I am sure, qualify him for taking a leading part in the affairs of this country. But, Sir, it is unnecessary, as I am sure it must be painful, to touch upon these personal questions. The spirit of honour and the sense of duty will maintain us, I hope, in the trial which we are now undergoing. Lord Derby, had he quitted office, would only have increased the embarrassment which public men now feel. He retains office with the most earnest determination to carry into effect the policy which he approves. I hope that, without entering into any unnecessary details, which might afford amusement to the curious, but which feeling this House has at all times repudiated, it will be thought that I have fairly placed before the House the position in which the Cabinet is placed. It is our business now to bring forward, as soon as we possibly can, the measure of Parliamentary Reform which, after such difficulties and such sacrifices, it will be my duty to introduce to the House. Sir, the House need not fear that there will be any evasion, any equivocation, any vacillation, or any hesitation in that measure. That measure will be brought forward as the definitive opinion of the Cabinet, and by that definitive opinion they will stand. The right hon. Gentleman last night uttered some prophetic deprecations of the character of that measure, which I thought somewhat gratuitous. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be painfully afraid that its character might be complex. I know well the singular plainness of mind of the right hon. Gentleman, and how he shrinks at all times from anything that is intricate. I do not think that the measure which I am about to bring in will perplex Parliament; but of this I feel quite sure, that it will be perfectly intelligible to the country.

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, I hold everybody responsible for the maintenance of his own honour, whether it be personal or political. I do not know whether he is at all times the best judge of what that honour may require, because there is a species of false honour which sometimes induces him not to apologize although he knows he is wrong, and which induces him to persist in a course although he has begun to doubt the propriety of that course. I hope I have not been influenced in the course I have pursued by this principle of false honour. On the contrary, when a person has changed his opinion I honour him, Sir, for acknowledging that change and acting on it. And I confess to having altered my opinion with regard to that great question which we discussed last year. It is perfectly true, as has been stated by my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby), that when his Government was formed no pledge was given to bring in a Reform Bill. If any such pledge had been required, I certainly should not have accepted office. Since that time I have changed my opinion. I have changed it, first as to the indifference of the great mass of the people upon it. I changed it because I then thought it was absolutely necessary for the Government to bring in a Reform Bill, and that the question should be settled as soon as possible. Having come to that conclusion, I was satisfied that it could only be carried out by every one of extreme opinions either on one side or the other being prepared to sacrifice his extreme opinions. I was therefore prepared to unite with my Colleagues, if possible, in framing a Reform Bill. When I came to that conclusion I was perfectly prepared for all the sacrifices I might be called upon to go through. I was prepared to hear passages of my speech of last year quoted against me constantly, and received with cheers from the Gentlemen opposite. I am extremely sorry that by the course I have taken I deprive hon. Gentlemen opposite of any portions of the speeches they may have been preparing. There were some expressions in that speech which I deeply regret. There was one especially about the Thames flowing with blood which I have never ceased to regret. I was also prepared for another punishment, which I think the hon. Member for Lambeth very good-naturedly said, was the only one he wished to see inflicted upon me—that of walking out in the lobby in support of a Reform Bill. I am fully prepared also to undergo that. It was not until the fifth Resolution was proposed—that fatal fifth Resolution—by which it was proposed to extend the franchise down to household suffrage—that I found myself unable to agree with my Colleagues, and I then and there tendered my resignation. I objected to it in the first place on the ground that it could not be carried out in conformity with the fourth Resolution, which said that no class should have a predominant influence in the representation. I also objected to it because I thought that in many instances it would entirely overwhelm and swamp the old constituency, especially in small boroughs; but when this matter was discussed in the Cabinet I must say that the opinion of my Colleagues was unanimous, that this was a mere matter of figures—a mere question of compensation, although I must say that with regard to the compensation derived from a plurality of votes I have no very great faith either in securities or pledges. My experience of forty years in this House has led me to the conclusion that a security as a security is of no use whatever. If it is right in itself it may be maintained, but as a security it is of no use. Therefore, on that ground I objected to the extension to household suffrage. But when I was assured that it was a mere question of figures and would prove a Conservative measure, I consented to become a party to bring in the Bill—not that I had changed my opinion, but, knowing that everyone must to some extent sacrifice his opinions to carry a great measure, I consented to sacrifice mine to what I believed to be the unanimous opinion of my Colleagues. It was not until Monday morning week, or very late on Sunday night, that I heard for the first time that two of my Colleagues, in whom I placed the greatest confidence, and with whom I had acted with the greatest cordiality, had, without any communication with me, or any reference to me, come to the same conclusion as I had done. On an analysis of the figures, they had come to the conclusion that the effect of the proposal would be what I had always feared it would be—namely, that in some of the small boroughs it would swamp the constituencies. I therefore refused to take any share in the responsibility of the measure. The ground upon which I had consented to it was entirely removed, and I could no longer take upon myself the responsibility of any share in bringing in that measure.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: Sir, since I gave my answer to the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) yesterday, I have received the permission, through Lord Derby, which enables me now to speak on this subject; and the details into which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has entered, and still more the details entered into by my right hon. and gallant Friend who has just sat down, impose upon me—although I dislike as much as any man the disagreeable egotism of these discussions—the necessity of briefly saying what my own course has been, and what the circumstances were under which I, on Monday last, tendered my resignation. At the time when the fifth Resolution—that fatal Resolution, as my right hon. and gallant Friend has called it—was laid upon the table, no detailed and definite agreement, as I understood it, had been come to. A general view was entertained; but the actual figures were not arranged, or the mode in which it should be applied. It was, as I then understood it, to be applied according to principles which I believed to be just, although I confess I did not at the time think the House would accept them. But that seemed to me a small matter. My only question in assenting to the proposal was to ask myself “Was it just? was it arranged upon a principle that seemed to be just, and which would at the same time afford an opportunity of admitting to the representation a very large class who do not now possess the franchise?” My right hon. Friend objected to that proposal, as he has told you; and it was in the hope that the figures might be so adjusted that the desire of the great majority of my Colleagues might be carried out with perfect safety to the Constitution, and in a manner that was likely to settle this much vexed and most difficult question, that I was one of those to urge him to remain. But after the speech of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 11th of February, it became evident—at least, it was the belief of many of my Colleagues—that the original view of the application of the fifth Resolution was untenable; and proposals which to me—I only say to me—were new, were then entertained by the Government. I desire particularly to be understood here. I do not for a moment wish to suggest that my Colleagues acted in a hasty or precipitate manner. But anybody who knows the working of Cabinets will know that with so large a body matters are matured and considered in the first instance by a small number of Members, and that many, especially of those who hold offices with heavy Departmental work, such as mine was, are not in the first instance consulted as to measures which are about to be proposed to the Cabinet. Well, it was on the 16th of February, I think, that I first heard of the proposition which I believe has now received the formal sanction of Her Majesty’s Government. I then stated at once that it was a proposition which to my mind was inadmissible. I believed at the time that it had been abandoned. But on the following Tuesday, the 19th, I think, the proposition was revived, and revived with the statement of certain statistics. Now, the House will perhaps allow me just to point out the special value of statistics in this particular matter. The idea of the fifth Resolution was to give an enfranchisement with a certain compensation or counterpoise. Of course, therefore, the whole value of any arrangement of which a counterpoise is to form a part must depend upon the accuracy of the calculations on which that counterpoise is framed. The figures on Tuesday, the 19th, were imperfect, and, after considerable discussion, it was, as I understood, agreed that the matter should be resumed with fuller information, to be obtained with aid from the Departments, on Saturday, the 23rd. The statement of the measure which was to be introduced to the House, it will be recollected, was to be made on Monday, the 25th. On Saturday, the 23rd, the figures were produced. I was asked whether I desired a further discussion of them. I said that they seemed to be favourable; but I am not aware that I gave any further assent to the proposition than was conveyed in those words. I say this on account of an expression that I can hardly acquiesce in which has been used elsewhere. But after we separated on Saturday, the 23rd, I naturally gave myself up to the investigation of those figures. The position was one of extreme difficulty. The materials which I had were, in my opinion, exceedingly scanty. The time which I had for decision was forty-eight hours. On the Sunday evening I came to the conclusion that although the figures, on the whole, had a fair seeming, and although it appeared, when stated in block, that upon them the proposed reduction of the franchise might be safely adopted, yet it appeared to me that, with respect to a very large number of boroughs, they would scarcely operate, practically, otherwise than as a household suffrage. As soon as I came to this conclusion, I consulted with one or two of my Colleagues, who happened to be near at hand, and then I wrote to Lord Derby to state that, with those figures before me, it was utterly impossible for me to concur in the measure which he proposed. As my right hon. Friend has said, on the Monday morning following we assembled somewhat hastily. I then naturally tendered my resignation, and implored my noble Friend to accept it; because, as I urged on him, a Government in which there were dissensions was not a likely Government to satisfy either the House or the country. But Lord Derby, actuated by a kindness of feeling for which certainly I ought not to be ungrateful, but which I still think was mistaken, rather preferred to put it to me and the others who were dissatisfied, whether we would consent to a compromise—whether we ought not to consent to a less extensive measure which had been under the consideration of the Cabinet, and which was brought forward by my right hon. Friend later in the day. In the course of last week Lord Derby again came to the conclusion that what I had suggested originally was correct—namely, that it was not expedient to go on with a divided Cabinet. He resumed the proposition which he had urged in the preceding week; and, of course, I again tendered my resignation. I am very glad to have the opportunity of making this explanation to the House; because, from some words which dropped inadvertently yesterday both in this and in the other House, I fear some impression might have been created that we had acted precipitately—that we had consented for a long time to a measure which had been prepared long beforehand, and that then, at the last moment, we had unfairly come forward with our objections. I hope the House will feel that, under the circumstances, it was impossible for me to act otherwise than I did with the conviction which I held. I need not say to all who have gone through it how painful it is to part from friends with whom one has acted, and to appear to stand in any position even of temporary antagonism towards those with whose convictions generally one thoroughly sympathizes. But I felt that I never could consent to a measure which appeared to me to introduce into the majority of boroughs what was in effect pure and simple household suffrage. In saying this, I do not wish to give the impression that I am insensible to those considerations which acted so deeply on the mind of my right hon. Friend. My noble friend Lord Carnarvon has expressed elsewhere the sentiments which he entertains on this question in language which I willingly would adopt for my own; and I should be very glad if it should be possible, in spite of all these unfortunate dissensions, during the present Session to pass a measure which shall give satisfaction to those who undoubtedly are dissatisfied, and which shall remove from the arena of politics a matter of such fierce and such dangerous controversy. But I am sure that this question never would be settled if any who entertained sincere convictions against the propositions that were made allowed the suspicion to fall upon them that for any party or personal considerations they were suppressing their own convictions, and acting against them. It is only by the most perfect sincerity, and by earnestly striving each in our own sphere as much as we can to take this subject out of the category of those questions which tend to give rise to party struggles, that we can get rid of a difficulty which has become serious, and remove what has also become in effect a disgrace to the efficiency of the House of Commons.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: The House may well believe that I would not for a moment presume to trespass upon it on an occasion of this kind merely for the purpose of continuing a discussion in which I have no desire to interfere. I only wish to clear up a particular transaction of which an account has appeared in the public press. On Wednesday last, the 27th of February, there appeared in The Morning Advertiser, a statement in these terms—

“After the withdrawal of the Resolutions last night Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli had a long interview in one of the retiring chambers of the House. On that occasion Mr. Gladstone intimated to Mr. Disraeli that at the meeting of the Liberal party, held at Carlton Gardens that afternoon, it was the general opinion that no effort should be made to turn the Government out upon the Reform Bill.”

That statement in itself was perhaps of little importance; because immediately afterwards it was contradicted, in a manner which, I think, it is not presuming too much to say, shows that the contradiction must have emanated from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone)—

“We are,” said the article of the following day, “authorized to contradict the report that a conference has taken place between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mr. Gladstone on the subject of Reform. There is no foundation whatever for such a rumour.”

That contradiction, according to the usual practice of public life, must have come from an authoritative source, and I should have made no remark upon it had it not been for the circumstance that this morning The Morning Advertiser has another article upon it; which, after reviving the first statement, and appending the contradiction, repeats that—

“After the discussion on the withdrawal of the Resolutions on the 25th of February, Mr. Disraeli had an interview with Mr. Gladstone in the Ministerial retiring-room behind the Speaker's Chair. The interview was adjourned to the following day, to the room of the hon. Member for the county of Dublin (Colonel Taylor) who holds a Ministerial office.”

I think that such a statement having appeared in the public papers it ought to be further elucidated, and I submit it to the attention of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GLADSTONE: Mr. Speaker—I shall have no difficulty, I think, in setting at rest the mind of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down with respect to the communications supposed to have taken place between the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and myself on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. There is no foundation whatever for the idea that has been promulgated from certain quarters of such communications having taken place. What did take place was this—and it affords a curious illustration of the manner in which what is great may occasionally grow out of what is small. On the evening to which the hon. Gentleman referred a question of a very different nature from Parliamentary Reform was upon the paper. That question I was anxious to support, provided Her Majesty's Government would adopt a certain course, to which they already seemed inclined, and which I believed would tend to the public advantage. I spoke with the right hon. Gentleman not for twenty minutes, but for about twenty seconds, behind the Speaker's Chair. In the course of that interview I inquired of the right hon. Gentleman if they intended to pursue that course. He said they did, and I believe I then used the words “Quite proper.” Probably those words were overheard, and the interpretation which was given to them by an over-heated imagination proves it to be still true that “a little knowledge is a dangerous thing.” Sir, having disposed of that matter, I may turn to the statements which have been submitted to the House this evening. I do not think it would tend to the public advantage were I, at the present juncture, to comment upon the state of things which has prevailed in the Cabinet with regard to the question of Parliamentary Reform. I shall not therefore attempt to comment upon the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, still less upon those made by my right hon. and gallant Friend the late Secretary for War, and by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, who have evidently been actuated by the desire to maintain that character for public honour in the recent proceedings from which I am quite certain no man could suppose for a moment that they would deviate. But, Sir, there is a particular portion of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman which, even without the direct appeal of the hon. Member for Devizes, it would be necessary for me to notice. The right hon. Gentleman has given to the House to-night a defence and justification of the plan of Parliamentary Reform which was so hastily submitted and so hastily withdrawn by Her Majesty's Government, and he has distinctly and intelligibly attempted to fasten upon those who sit upon this side of the House the responsibility of having brought that project to its untimely end. Sir, I must comment upon the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the plan of Her Majesty's Government was a plan founded upon a principle. When I heard those words fall from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman I confess I was curious to learn what interpretation they would receive from his following remarks. There are high authorities of recent date for the expression of surprise on Parliamentary occurrences, and I must confess that it was with surprise that I heard the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman. He stated that if that plan had been adopted the effect of it would have been to raise the constituency of this country to the number of 1,400,000. Of that number one-fourth, or 350,000, would have been members of the working classes, one-fourth would have been connected with the landed interest, and the remaining moiety would have belonged to the various sections of the middle classes. I do not intend to question the accuracy or propriety of that description, to which, perhaps, I should be inclined to demur. Nor will I at present canvass the figures of the right hon. Gentleman, which, however, I should find it impossible to admit. But I come to a point which is more material—the statement that the measure was founded upon a principle because it proposed to admit the working classes to the benefit of the franchise in the proportion of about one-fourth of the constituency of the country. It is the first time that I ever learnt in this House that to admit the labouring classes of this country to the numerical proportion of one-fourth of the constituency could be justly described as founding a measure upon a principle. During the whole of the last Session of Parliament there was a measure under discussion in the House of Commons with regard to which the objection most commonly and constantly raised was that it was not founded upon a principle. I believe, if the arithmetical proportions established by that measure were carefully examined, it would be found that as nearly as possible it invested the working classes with one-fourth of the votes to be given to the constituencies of the country. Therefore, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman be serious in the opinion he has expressed to-night, that the measure which was born and died on Monday evening, the 25th of February, was founded upon a principle, I can only regret that the discovery was not sooner made. Had it been made during the course of last Session, much of the trouble which besets us at present and possibly awaits us in the future might have been avoided. But what is more material is the description the right hon. Gentleman has given of the prospects and intentions with which Her Majesty's Government introduced that ill-fated measure, and also the cause which led to its withdrawal. At this point I must enter my most distinct and unequivocal protest against the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, which is, from beginning to end, full of errors, totally unintentional no doubt, but still of the gravest nature. It is necessary to point these out, because it is evident that they have been the foundation of a proceeding on the part of the Government which cannot but be regarded as of cardinal importance. The right hon. Gentleman says that if he has received inaccurate information, we also are subject to the like misfortune. That may be so, but the difference is this—we do not found our statements in Parliament upon it, nor do we, upon inaccurate information, base decisions of vital consequence in matters of public policy. The right hon. Gentleman says that the measure which he introduced upon a basis of a £6 rating franchise was introduced with either the knowledge or the apprehension that it would not be acceptable to the Members of the party who sit behind him, but that he had the greatest reason to expect that it would be favourably regarded by hon. Gentlemen sitting on these Benches.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will permit me to correct him on one point. What I said was that I believed such a measure would not be unfavourably received by hon. Gentlemen sitting on the opposite side of the House, and that it might at the same time be accepted by the House generally.

MR. GLADSTONE : After the correction of the right hon. Gentleman I withdraw the remarks I made upon that point. But the right hon. Gentleman thought the measure was fairly entitled to the support of hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House. I would ask, however, what reason the right hon. Gentleman could possibly have for forming such an anticipation, and founding upon it so important a proceeding as the submission of a plan of Reform to the House of Commons. In the month of June last, when I unworthily occupied the place now filled by the right hon. Gentleman, we had occasion to state our views upon the subject of a £6 rating franchise. In the name of the Government of that day, and at a time when our Ministerial existence and the settlement of the question depended upon the adoption of our views, I stated that it was impossible for us to accept a £6 rating franchise. How, then, could the right hon. Gentleman suppose when we had resigned the Government, subjected the country to the risk attending agitation, given up the conduct of the question, and indefinitely prolonged its discussion, rather than adopt it that we should submit to the same proposal when made upon his recommendation? I must say I think that was a groundless and an unreasonable expectation; and if it be true, as I infer from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that this expectation had a material influence in determining the course of Her Majesty's present Administration on Monday last week, I can only say it shows there was not due care and diligence exercised in ascertaining the solidity of the ground upon which they were to build. But more than this. It appears that this expectation was disappointed by some proceeding which was taken by the Liberal party; that they met together to discuss the plan of the Government; that at that meeting they determined upon supporting nothing short of a £5 rating franchise; and that in consequence of that condemnation of the plan by the party sitting on this side of the House, the Government felt that its withdrawal had become necessary. I have endeavoured to re-state with accuracy what fell from the right hon. Gentleman. He has in this respect been completely and grossly misinformed. The right hon. Gentleman has not only conceived an expectation without any warrant, but he has proceeded, with respect to the sentiments of the Liberal party on the occasion to which he refers, upon some

rumour and report as groundless as that to which the hon. Member for Devizes has just drawn attention. I had almost said that the £5 rating was not mentioned in the discussion upon that occasion, but that would not be literally, though it would be substantially, true. It was for a moment mentioned by a single Member, but only to draw forth from another Member, with the evident assent of those around, the observation that any mention of such a subject was altogether premature. So far from a determination being expressed to offer opposition to the proposal of the Government, what was stated, and what I may say was accepted, was that at that moment we were only in possession of the plan of the Government in the shape of a speech; that much might occur between the delivery of the speech and the introduction of the Bill—an observation applicable to all states and circumstances, and not the least to the condition in which we now find ourselves—and that until the Bill was produced it would be impossible to decide what course we should take with respect to the earlier stages of the measure. It was, however, an object of general desire among us that we should find ourselves in a position, when the Bill should be produced, to support it on the first and second reading, and on the Motion for the Speaker to leave the Chair, and then it would be for us to propose such Amendments in Committee as we might deem necessary. Under these circumstances, I put it to the House whether the right hon. Gentleman was justified in the account he has given, and in the attempt he has made this evening, the ungenerous attempt—to use an epithet I, for the first time this Session, most unwillingly employ—to fasten on those who sit on this side of the House the responsibility of the failure of the scheme he referred to. I have only one more word to say, because I feel there is before us all a paramount duty and purpose, well and forcibly described in the closing words of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, and the constant iteration of these collateral discussions, multiplied and prolonged as they are, create obstacles in the way of our attaining that object. I therefore refrain from further comment on what has fallen from the right hon. Gentleman. I certainly do not feel it necessary to take notice of the criticism which the right hon. Gentleman has made on the infirmity of my own mental constitution. Every man who makes observations of that character

—though it may be doubtful whether or not he does justice to himself, or to the House in which he makes them—confers a favour on the person who is the object of them, because to be made fully acquainted with our own infirmities is one of the most effectual means of attaining mental improvement. I have repeatedly received assistance in that respect from the right hon. Gentleman, and I sincerely return him my thanks. The right hon. Gentleman referred to expressions of mine used yesterday with respect to the nature of his forthcoming proposal, and he said that those expressions were gratuitous. I must at any rate say this—that they were deliberate, and, in my opinion, they were opportune. The vague and indefinite shape in which the Government plan, as outlined in recent discussions, has been brought before us does not lead me to repent, but rather leads me to be well satisfied, that I submitted to the House those observations, the object of which was to impress on the Government a full sense of the responsibility of their present situation in respect to the proposals they may make on the subject of Parliamentary Reform. We are told that the Government are the best judges of their own responsibility. I admit it. But it is often the duty of Members of this House, both to the public and to the Administration, at times when we think that serious issues are about to be raised without sufficient consideration of the means of meeting them to express, in terms becoming and respectful, the apprehensions we may entertain. I am supported in these observations by the pithy sentences of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the late Secretary for War, who told us that he had no faith in securities; that if securities were good in themselves they would stand, but, merely as securities, they would not. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer may have thought those expressions also gratuitous; but I thank my right hon. and gallant Friend, not only because he has sustained me in words I used yesterday, but because, in the observations he has made, he has done a public service. That is all I will say on this subject at the present moment. The time will come when we shall make another advance in our information on this question, and, as far as I am concerned, I have no disposition to prolong or multiply discussions of this nature, which have occurred before and may possibly occur again.

MR. LOWE: There is one cause, Sir, which no one seems to have any interest in defending, and with respect to which I ask permission to say a few words. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) naturally supports the £7 rental franchise of last year, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer as naturally supports one of the two franchises, between which he has divided his affections—a £6 rating or household suffrage. I want to point out to the House, as the Chancellor of the Exchequer states that there is a principle in his proposal of a £6 rating franchise, that this principle is only a translation of the £7 rental franchise of last year into a £6 rating franchise. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, by implication admits that there was a principle in the Government measure of last year. Such being the case, the right hon. Gentleman has the onus thrown on him of telling us on what principle he assisted those who laboured so hard and so successfully to destroy the measure of last year and the Government with it. I have no doubt that most of the supporters of the Government measure of last year supported it because they believed that the £7 rental franchise was a point at which they could rest, and that it carried with it a sufficient safeguard. I believed that it did not. I believed that it was only a stage on the road to that household suffrage which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has announced. I wish, therefore, Sir, on behalf of myself and of those who voted with me on such grounds, that we should not be confounded with those who suppose that a measure containing no principle at all in one form acquires it when stated in another, and that we should not be assumed to be turning round with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and, after opposing the £7 rental franchise of last year, acquiesce in his view to-night, when, for the first time, the Minister of the Crown pronounces the fatal and ominous words, "household suffrage." If we wanted this household suffrage our way to it was very plain. We might have got it much more easily than by placing the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues in office, with much more facility and much less expenditure of time. Of course, there is no "understanding" in such matters—no indenture drawn, no engagements interchanged, but I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite whether it was for the purpose of bringing forth household suffrage that we combined with the right hon. Gentleman last year to defeat the Government measure. And here I feel it my duty to pay a tribute to the hon. Member for Birmingham, who, at meetings called in favour of manhood suffrage, manfully resisted giving his adhesion to that principle, and always declared his opinion to be in favour of household suffrage. The hon. Member for Birmingham approached that point from below; the Chancellor of the Exchequer approached it from above: at last they have met. You might try in vain to draw any practical distinction between the policy of the right hon. Gentleman who leads the Conservative party and the policy of the hon. Member for Birmingham.

"So like they were, no mortal Might one from other know."

The one resisting pressure approached household suffrage from below, and the other dropped down from above upon it without any compulsion at all, but from a natural attraction and affinity which exist between the two. We have now an alliance of a new kind.

"These be the Great Twin Brethren
To whom the Dorians pray.
Home comes the Chief in triumph,
Who, in the hour of fight,
Has seen the Great Twin Brethren
In harness on his right.
Safe comes the ship to haven,
Through tempests and through gales,
If once the Great Twin Brethren
Sit shining on its sails."

I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite, with whom it rests whether this alliance shall take effect or not, what they have to say to it. Are they consenting parties to it? Do they agree that the victory attained last year for the principle that the ancient constitution of the country should be preserved in its integrity, shall give way to the alliance between the hon. Member for Birmingham and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer? The decision rests with them; the country and all of us pause to see what decision they will pronounce. I could not help saying this, because it appears that the majority of last year has now nobody to defend it. We cannot expect defence from those whom we defeated, while those whom we placed in office, those to whom in an evil hour we intrusted the destinies of the country, have underbid those whom they then opposed for going too far, and placed themselves in a position which differs from their opponents only in this—that it is infinitely more democratic. I have only one more word to say. We have heard a great deal about figures, and about the construction which noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen, who sat up all Sunday night to read them, put upon them. We are told we are to have a Reform Bill on the 18th, that then the matter is to be hurried on with the greatest possible speed, and that after the next stage the House is to sit de die in diem. Sir, we have had delays enough for want of information on this matter, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that if he really wishes the House to form a decision on his Bill, the best thing he can possibly do is to place on the table, without loss of time, those very figures which have been the subject of discussion. At present we have them not. We have the book of last year, in which we find a number of statements in regard to the municipal franchise; but, as is shown by an excellent letter in The Times the other day, written by the hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Schreiber), there are only seventy-three boroughs which have conterminously the municipal and Parliamentary franchise, and where we can make comparison between them. It would be a great service to the House, therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman would, without loss of time, furnish us with the opportunity of going through the process which three Secretaries of State have gone through in order to see the real effect of the measure proposed. If we are to have these figures after the Reform Bill is brought in we probably shall not be in a condition to go on with it as the right hon. Gentleman wishes. Therefore, I do hope that the right hon. Gentleman will give us some means of judging of the proposal he intends to submit, that we may not always be in the position of receiving communications, but unable to act upon them for want of information. I thank the House for allowing one evidently of a past generation—who represents that which was a power last year, but which has been taken over by the right hon. Gentleman to the other side—to say a few words on this subject. The truth is, what was a conflict last year has become a race this year, and two parties are trying not which shall attack or which shall stand up for existing institutions, but which shall pass the other in attempting to reach first the goal of a perfectly level democracy.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to offer a word of explanation with regard to a remark which has fallen from my right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe), an inaccuracy not at all intentional, but which was the result of a very natural misapprehension. He said at the commencement of his speech that I had supported to-night the £7 franchise proposed last year. I had no intention of entering into a defence of that franchise. The meaning of what I said was this—that as the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) appeared to me to found his claim for a principle in the measure of last Monday week upon a numerical relation, it appeared to me that it would have been just as applicable to the measure of last year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Perhaps, in explanation, I may just observe that there were two misapprehensions by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) on which, in fact, his speech was mainly founded. In the first place, when I referred to Gentlemen opposite, I did not refer to the front Opposition Bench, the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues, but I meant to speak generally of the party opposite. It was clearly my intention to refer to the Benches opposite. My Friends around me know that I had no intention to refer to the right hon. Gentleman. The second misapprehension was, that the right hon. Gentleman thought I withdrew the intended measure in consequence of the assumed want of support from the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends. On the contrary, I stated that the main reason why we withdrew it, was the general discontent of the Conservative party.

MR. HORSMAN: Sir, I was not aware that any discussion was to take place, or that any explanation was to be given this evening. The noble Lord's statement has rather taken us by surprise. If personal explanations only had taken place, I should have borne no part in the discussion; but I must say I agree with what has been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, that it is very difficult to sit still under the provocation given to us by the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. What we have heard to-day from the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, makes a great change in the situation. The Liberal party, I trust, will not withdraw from the resolution they expressed to give the Government every assistance to settle the question of Reform. But I must say that we give that assistance under different feelings every day, under greater difficulty and under greater responsibility. When a Ministry, in a confessed minority in the House of Commons, undertakes to carry a Reform Bill, such a state of things can only be tolerated because that Ministry make up, in character or ability, what they want in numbers, or because they are supported by an opinion which is in itself a force. Is that the case with the present Government? Sir, they are the weakest Government that ever in our time has sat upon those Benches dealing with the greatest question of the day. And how are they dealing with it? There has been a general determination on this side of the House to give effect to the very judicious counsel which was tendered to us by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire at the commencement of the Session, to combine for two objects—namely, to effect a settlement of Reform, and to effect it, if possible, without a displacement of the Government. But I must say that every speech which we hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer renders the reconciling of these two results more difficult. The Ministry have undertaken to deal with the question of Reform, and how are they dealing with it? The revelations which have been made to-day, following on all that has occurred this Session, show us that so far as official confusion and legislative weakness go, there has been everything on our part to complain of; and now, in addition to that, there is apparently an abandonment of principle and a breaking down in credit and in character unexampled, in the modern history of Parliament. What is the next step? We learn that a Conservative Government, existing upon sufferance, is about to launch what they themselves would last year have termed a democratic Reform Bill. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (General Peel) says that he has changed his opinion, and that he respects men for changing their opinions. But let us consider for one moment the value of a change in the circumstances in which this was made. In 1859 the present Cabinet changed their opinion and brought in a Reform Bill. They had been anti-Reformers up to 1859. They brought in, I say, a Reform Bill in 1859. But the moment they abandoned office they abandoned their conversion to Reform, and it was only after a lapse of nine years, when they returned to those Benches, that the convictions which they had left in th

red boxes were again found when they reopened them, and we then had a second conversion. Now, I do not hesitate to say, that I hold it as a rule, and an invariable rule, that any great party holding itself free, the moment it finds itself in office, to turn round upon the opinions it has consistently and persistently maintained in opposition, is politically wrong and morally indefensible. I do not know of any instance which history gives us which is not a confirmation of that opinion. Even those cases which are relied on of the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel rather confirm than shake this opinion. The Duke of Wellington, who was the most powerful and popular man of his time, having passed Emancipation was driven from office, which he never resumed; he lost his influence, and, for the time, broke up his party. A common danger, however, united the party once more in a common defence, and, nine years afterwards, Sir Robert Peel, by a rare union of sagacity and skill, re-seated them in power. But he brought forward free trade, and once more he was driven from office: his party was broken up, his influence was gone, and he never regained the position he had lost. But there was this great difference. Those Ministers commanded great Parliamentary majorities, and they were sincerely converted. If the Duke of Wellington had been driven from office before the passing of the Emancipation Act he would have voted for it in opposition. If Sir Robert Peel had been driven from office before the passing of the great free trade measure, he would still have been a free trader. But the present Government, driven from office in 1859, changed their opinions, and opposed the Bill of the Government of 1860. ["No, no!"] I repeat they opposed the Bill. After six years they return to office. I ask what proof have we that the second conversion is more sincere than the first, when we learn that their new conviction is that Reform is not a question which should decide the fate of Governments, and that they have given us a choice of measures, with perfect indifference as to which we take, acting not so much as Ministers as auctioneers, knocking down the Constitution to the loudest bidder. I will not refer to the £6 rating franchise Bill, which fell stillborn. Forty-eight hours after its appearance, we heard no more of it. But we hear immediately afterwards that the Government return to their original policy—a policy which, if there be any truth in language, there was not one Member in the Cabinet who did not, twelve months ago, loudly and earnestly declaim was, in his inmost conviction, a policy of revolution. This may be supposed to be the road to popularity. In my opinion, the road to popularity in England runs parallel with that of political morality. It should always be borne in mind that any Government to be popular in England must commend itself to the morality of England, and political power in this country must be based on personal and political respect. I do not think that the course which the present Government are taking is likely to secure for them that respect. We respect rather the right hon. and gallant Gentleman (General Peel) and the noble Lord (Viscount Cranbourne), who have abandoned their places for their principles, than those who retain their places by abandoning the principles for which they have so long contended.

LORD STANLEY: I will not, Sir, occupy the attention of the House for more than one or two minutes. The speeches of the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and of the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) have been founded upon the same idea, which is an utter misrepresentation of the intentions of the Government. The right hon. Gentlemen have spoken as if it were the intention of those who sit upon these Benches to go in a more democratic direction than even Gentlemen opposite would be inclined to take, and to bring in a Bill which would reduce the franchise to an almost unlimited extent. I say, plainly and frankly, that I can conceive no circumstances which would render the adoption of such a course by us in our position, and with our antecedents, either expedient or honourable, and certainly we shall not follow it. I say this distinctly, because I wish to save some hon. Members on that side of the House disappointment. If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, or any of those who sit near him, believe seriously that it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill which shall be in accordance with the views which have always been so ably and so consistently advocated by the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), they are greatly mistaken. I hope the House will recollect that they are discussing a measure which is not before them, of which they have heard no statement from those who are to introduce it, of the effect and purport of which it is impossible that they can know anything, or can accurately judge, even by the aid of any casual criticism which may have been applied to some portion of it by Gentlemen speaking in explanation of their own conduct. We are perfectly ready to stand or fall by the judgment of the House and of the public upon the measure we shall bring in ; but I do ask you for ordinary fair play, and to wait until the measure is before you, before you proceed to pass an opinion upon its merits.

MR. BRIGHT : I shall not prolong the discussion more than two or three minutes ; but I cannot help saying that I think we have had a very instructive evening. If hon. Gentlemen opposite, and, perhaps, some right hon. Gentlemen on this side, could have seen in vision a year ago what they see to-night, possibly the results of our deliberations in the last Session of Parliament might have been different. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) admits that he is pretty much out of court, and that he ought not to be here at all. But he was the great adviser last year to certain weak-minded Gentlemen, and to certain very passionate and fierce politicians who now sit in a very meek state opposite. Recollect his speeches: the violent, and I will say, notwithstanding their eloquence, the illogical things which he said, and which he much regrets to have said. [Mr. Lowe: No!] Then the things which I very much regret he said. The right hon. Gentleman fanned the flame of discontent among a number of right hon. Gentlemen, for, somehow or other, nearly all the leaders of the discontent were those who, in former times, had been in office, and these, combined with Conservative party spirit, threw out a Government which had offered to the country a measure which the country distinctly approved. When I say the country, understand me. I mean that if there were any who did not approve of that Bill, they did not signify their disapprobation ; but the multitudes at whose request or demand the Government now propose to act, did in some hundreds of public meetings signify their approbation of that Bill. I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to dismiss for ever from their councils the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. He once led you into a great difficulty, and if you take his advice now, he will greatly increase that difficulty. He is against extending the franchise by any reduction of it, to any portion of his countrymen. That is not the opinion held, as he himself admits, by any other individual in this House. If that be so, as this is clearly the question of the Session, he is out of court as adviser, and if he does not withhold his advice in the future, I recommend you at least not to follow it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) is very angry with the Government. But he has not so much reason to be so as I have. Nobody grieved more than I did at the conduct of hon. Gentlemen opposite last Session in contributing to the failure of a Bill which I greatly wished to see passed. But what did the right hon. Gentleman expect, when he coalesced with Gentlemen opposite to drive out Earl Russell, and to bring in the Government of Lord Derby. Had he so little knowledge of the state of public opinion as to believe that Lord Derby could hold office and refuse to deal with the question of Reform ? The Chancellor of the Exchequer knows, Lord Derby knows, and every man in this House knows perfectly well that, if the Premier had met Parliament and declared he had no measure of Reform to offer, and should resist any proposal for the extension of the franchise, the first week of the Session would have been to him and his Government a week of extermination. His Government would have been at an end now and for ever. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) is very angry because the word household suffrage was mentioned. Why the right hon. Gentleman has a household suffrage Bill in his pocket, and I came down to-night with the expectation that it would have been brought on. But we scarcely know, under the leadership of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, and the right hon. gentleman the Member for Stroud, where we are or where we shall be. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud has a Bill for household suffrage with certain limitations, and I am not sure that it has not been under—what shall I call it—under the examination of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lord Derby. The right hon. Gentleman has been taking it first to St. James' Square, then to Carlton House Terrace, and there being no market for the article—which I am not at all surprised at—he tries to damage the wares of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Now, let me say one or two words to Gentlemen opposite. You know that what the right hon. Member for Calne has said is true—that I have, so long as I have discussed this question, thought that household suf-

franchise was in boroughs the true basis of the franchise. I have been willing to support measures in that direction, and I am willing to support now, if the House could not agree to that, a measure short of that; but I believe that is the just foundation of the borough franchise of this country. You have been accustomed to have a dread of a large increase of the number of votes at elections. You have a constituency narrow and contracted, and you have some sort of idea that the things which are safe in the hands of 1,000,000 would be unsafe in the hands of 2,000,000—as if the second 1,000,000 of your countrymen would not be filled with the same ideas as the first 1,000,000, and would not have the same interest in the well-being of the country. There is no other country in the world in which the monarchy, or the aristocracy, where there is one, or the ruling classes of whatever grade, are afraid of numbers of votes at elections. Whether you go to America, or Australia, or to the kingdoms of Europe, you never find discussions in their legislative bodies such as we have here. The legislators in those countries have no dread of their countrymen, and they have no fear that giving votes would be destructive to the interests of any order of society, or of the constitution under which they live. I ask you whether last year the great body of the workpeople who met to express an opinion respecting Lord Russell's Bill were not moderate and judicious in the course which they took in regard to that Bill, and in the judgment they expressed upon it? I venture to say they took a part which was much more patriotic in its results than that which you were unfortunately advised to take by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe). I will undertake further to say that such is their moderation and such is their comprehension of this question, that they will judge with great fairness any measure which the present Government shall lay before the House, or if they should fall, any measure which shall be brought forward by the Government which will succeed them. You know I am not speaking in the interest of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, or of his friends who may hereafter occupy these Benches, or in the special interest of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with whom I have no political connection. I speak in the interest of a great cause, and of the millions of people who, from day to day, read every syllable uttered in this House on this question. And I ask you to deal with them as one class, party, or section of a people should deal with every other section of that people, with a generous and liberal estimate of their character and that which is due to them. Do not try by any tricks to hinder them from obtaining that which they have a right to expect from the declarations which you have made. If you cannot go so far as I want to go, let it be something less; but let us have it simple and distinct, so that the people shall know that what you profess to give they will really receive. If I understand aright, the measure which the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) intends to introduce is rather the product of the brain of Lord Derby than of his, and Lord Derby is not supposed to be rash in his conduct, or an innovator on the institutions of the country. Well, Lord Derby is in favour of that wide extension of the suffrage which it is hoped Gentlemen opposite may, by-and-bye, consent to. I recollect, in the demonstration which was held a short time ago—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne says the demonstrations left no echoes behind them (I think Lord Derby could tell a very different story)—well, in that demonstration there were flags carried along the street, and upon one of them, which was carried by the carpenters, there was a motto which, though it is not in the choicest English, will still be understood by many present, and I commend it to the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and of the House, as conveying in it all the wisdom which I could possibly hope to put into any number of words. It was—“Deal with us on the square; we have been chiselled long enough.”

MR. SMOLLETT: Sir, I simply rise to say that as many Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have endeavoured to extract the opinions of Gentlemen who have the misfortune to sit on the right hand of your Chair, I wish, as an independent Member, and as one on whom the ties of party sit very lightly, to put a question to hon. Gentlemen opposite, to which I hope I shall receive a distinct and explicit answer. The question I wish to put is, why does not the great Liberal party, seeing the very unsatisfactory manner in which they believe Reform has been dealt with by this side of the House since the commencement of the Session—why does not the great Liberal and united party opposite take serious action in the matter, bring forward a Vote of Want of Confidence in the Ministers of the Crown, assume the responsibility of office, and deal with Reform in the way which they think will rebound to their credit and to the satisfaction of the country? I am astonished to see the amount of forbearance shown by hon. Gentlemen sitting opposite, and I think their disinclination to assume office should be explained to the House and the country, and that it should be made clearly to appear why they do not take the responsibility of, and settle this question in a proper manner. But I have heard it said by hon. Gentlemen opposite, whom I do not now see in their places, that there is no unanimity in their party. They said they had a very satisfactory meeting in Carlton Gardens, but that in reality there is no unanimity amongst them. When asked why they do not take action in the matter, their answer is that they distrust their leaders—that they have no faith in them, and that they do not believe if they were transferred to the Government side of the House they would produce a satisfactory measure of Reform. If that be the answer I shall receive to-night, all I can say is that it will be most unsatisfactory. I shall be sorry to hear that the leaders of parties in this House are so sunk in the estimation of their followers that no faith can be placed in them. I therefore trust that I shall receive a clear and satisfactory reply to the question why hon. Gentlemen opposite, having a great numerical majority, do not transfer their leaders to this side of the House, and obtain from them a Bill which shall be satisfactory to the country?

MR. BANKS STANHOPE: I must, Sir, express my great regret and surprise at the position in which the Reform question is placed. We are met on a most solemn occasion, not for one party to taunt the other, but for both to endeavour to carry out, by mutual concession of opinion, a settlement of this difficult question. As one of those who opposed the Bill of last year—and I in no way regret the step I then took—I can tell you clearly the reason why I approach the question in a different spirit from hon. Gentlemen opposite. You have taken the ground from under us. I will not express an opinion on a measure which is not yet before the House. In common fairness we ought to wait until it is produced in its integrity; but I will say at once, as a follower of Lord Derby, that I see no reason to believe he would run any race towards democracy. I see no reason why a measure should not be introduced, founded on some permanent basis. At the same time, responsibility will be thrown upon each of us, individually and collectively, to provide, after due consideration, just and adequate protection to the property and capital of the country.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, that as a considerable interval would elapse before the 18th instant, when the Reform Bill would be proceeded with, he wished to know what business was to be proceeded with in the meantime. Would the Army and Navy Estimates be brought on? It was advisable that the ground should be cleared before the consideration of the subject of Parliamentary Reform.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to ask when the papers referring to the electoral statistics, submitted to the Members of the Cabinet, and alluded to by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) would be laid upon the table?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have given direction for the preparation of the papers, and I hope in a few days they will be in the hands of Members. With respect to the course of Public Business, I believe I may say that the Army Estimates will be moved on Thursday. If they are not moved, my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board will proceed with the Bill which stands in his name.

LIMITED LIABILITY ACTS.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. WATKIN moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Limited Liability Acts. He defined them as the "Companies Act, 1862," and the "Partnership Act, 1865." The Commission appointed in 1854, to inquire into the law of partnership, reported that in their opinion the reputation of the British merchant at home and abroad would not be raised, but, on the contrary, might be lowered by the operation of limited liability. The question was one which not only affected special interests but the whole business operations of the country, and also involved the high credit which had hitherto attached to the commercial honour of the merchants and traders of England. The Act of 1862 permitted, for the first time, the application of the principle of limited liability to every form of enterprise. The Act of 1865 merely dealt with the relations of partners, and permitted those persons who chose to take a share of the profits of a business instead of a fixed interest to enjoy all the advantages of partnership without making the whole of their fortunes liable in the event of failure. Limited liability had been objected to on the ground that it established competition between a trader whose liability continued unlimited, and another who was able to place his affairs under the Limited Liability Act; that it gave the creditor permission to evade his moral obligations; and that, as a noble Lord in another place said, "it encouraged the demon of speculation." The old law of partnership provided that any combination of men, who went into business, were all liable for the operations of each other; the losses, profits, and mistakes of each partner were shared or borne by the whole. The modern joint-stock principle began by granting limited liability in special cases by Royal charter, letters patent, or special Acts of Parliament. In time the Acts establishing limited liability were passed, and much difference of opinion existed among well-qualified persons at the time as to the probable consequences. The author of the Law and Practice of Joint-Stock Companies, presuming that he was addressing those who might take advantage of the Act, sarcastically said—

"You are permitted to incur debts without limit, but to prescribe your own limit for payment of them. You may invest £20, and trade to the amount of £250,000; if you succeed, your profits will be enormous; if you fail you can lose only £20; the rest of the loss will fall upon creditors. You are placed by this law in the advantageous position of a man who has everything to gain, and nothing to lose. . . . Again, you enjoy another privilege, greater even than that of speculating for unlimited profits with liability only for limited loss. As you are not liable for debts beyond your £20, so you are equally exempt from performance of inconvenient contracts. With limited liability you are enabled to refuse to perform your contract if the price has fallen, while the person with whom you deal, not being equally privileged with yourself, will be compelled to perform his contract, if it should be for your interest to enforce it."

But Mr. Baron Wilde, a great legal authority, has said—

"It seems to me that the Act of Parliament is framed on principles on which the Legislature now constantly acts—that of making every one take care of himself, and giving the greatest possible latitude to the forming of companies. That is a sound principle."

He (Mr. Watkin) presumed that meant that every man must take care of himself and act as he pleased, so long as he did no ill to his neighbour. He, however, was of opinion that Parliament should not lend its sanction to anything which permitted or facilitated deception or wrong-doing, and an enormous amount of wrong had been done under the provisions of the Act of 1862, if not in consequence of, at least coincident with limited liability. Another distinguished gentleman, Mr. Charles Wordsworth, Q.C., had said, in 1865, in his work on The Law of Joint Stock Companies as Altered by the Act of 1862—

"The commercial problem of the day was, I think, to find the form of partnership with limited liability, which should unite large capital with unity and promptitude of action, and it has been found by Mr. Lowe and the authors of the measures of 1855 and 1856."

He did not wish to question that; but he alleged that by some means the Act of 1862 had failed in the anticipations which were held out with regard to it, and that it had given rise to an amount of speculation unparalleled since the time of the South Sea bubble in 1720.

There were at present 2,200 joint-stock companies of all kinds in existence, having a nominal capital of perhaps £1,000,000,000, probably 750,000 shareholders, and 12,500 persons of another class which had grown up, and who were interested in them as trustees and directors; in fact, we were approaching the condition of things described by Dr. Channing, when writing many years ago of America. He said—

"One of the most remarkable circumstances of our age is the energy with which the principle of combination or of action by joint forces, by associated numbers, in manifesting itself. It may be said without exaggeration that everything is now done by societies."

The number of joint-stock companies which started in 1863 under the Companies Act of the year before was 807; in 1864, it was 933; in 1865, 995; and in 1866, 745; making a total of 3,480 companies, representing no less than £706,000,000 of nominal capital. Of this enormous number twenty-seven were finance companies, with a capital of £40,250,000, of which £9,500,000 was paid up; seventeen were insurance companies, having a nominal capital of £11,650,000 and a paid-up capital of £1,100,000; fifty-four were banks, with £90,000,000 of capital and £17,500,000 paid up; and six were discount companies, with a capital of £10,100,000 and with

£2,200,000 paid up. Thus these four classes of companies alone had a nominal capital of £151,900,000, and a paid-up capital of £30,300,000. Turning to the other side of the account, he found that out of this group no less than £42,000,000 of nominal capital was in process of liquidation, and that, he thought, was a very significant fact. But he found the matter wore a still more serious aspect. Overend, Gurney, and Co.'s nominal capital was £5,000,000, but when they stopped payment their liabilities were £24,000,000; so that the £42,000,000 of nominal capital now in course of liquidation must be small compared with the liabilities of those companies if represented on the day of their failure. Those liabilities might have been £100,000,000. He asked, therefore, whether it was not expedient to inquire into the operations of the Limited Liability Acts, with a view, if necessary, to improve their principle or machinery, or both. He had ventured last year to speak of the operation of those Acts as included in the large number of causes which produced the panic; he desired, however, to keep the two matters totally distinct for fear of confusion. Considering what had been said by the President of the Board of Trade last July, he thought the House had not been treated quite fairly. In reply to himself and those who supported his Motion for a Commission of Inquiry into the causes of the panic, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"If the Government were indifferent to the sufferings of the commerce of this country, no doubt they would be greatly to blame. If they were unwilling to investigate the possible application of remedies so far as these sufferings were occasioned or aggravated by legislation, no doubt they would be greatly to be blamed. In assuring the hon. Gentleman that the Government will look into this matter most carefully, and that it is their earnest desire, if possible, to legislate on the subject, or to invite the attention of the House to the subject at the first moment at which they can give practical effect to their views, which cannot be earlier than the commencement of the next Session, I would venture to press upon him the importance of allowing us time to legislate calmly; and, after due consideration, I would press upon him to withdraw the Motion he has now brought forward upon that assurance."—

That promise had not been fulfilled. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said the other night that the Government had no evidence to lay before the House, and did not intend to propose legislation, and all that he suggested was that it might be a convenient occasion for mixing up the question with an inquiry into the causes of the panic of 1866. He trusted, however, that if his present Motion were granted, the questions would be kept distinct. He could not allow the right hon. Gentleman to mislead him into mixing up this question with the larger and much more important one; but he hoped that an opportunity would be afforded to the House seriously to debate this most material question.

Of limited companies in liquidation, as it was called, there were at this moment no less than 266, representing a nominal capital of £100,000,000, and the shares of the rest of the limited companies were, for the most part, either at a discount, or their operations were so circumscribed as to show that they were almost in a state of collapse. After four years' experience of the operation of the limited liability principle which was widely extended in 1862, the time had arrived, he thought, when the House might carefully review a law containing so much that was novel and experimental. Great evils had certainly followed the recent operation of the Act, and it was important to inquire whether these had arisen necessarily from the provisions of the measure itself, or from other considerations outside legislation. It should also be seen whether its very complicated machinery was adapted to the circumstances of the time, or ought now to be altered. Another matter provoking much unfavourable comment was the enormous amount of litigation connected with the winding-up of these companies and the vast number of Chancery suits which had grown out of the system. Occurrences which had cast the deepest discredit on the commercial honour of the country, and which outraged all that men were accustomed to value in the conduct of business, had become notorious, and the House could not long refuse to investigate, and, if necessary, to expose them. It was not, perhaps, to be wondered at that the large business profits made in banking operations by the Bank of England, by several joint-stock, and by some private establishments between the years of 1844 and 1866, should have led many persons to think that, by engaging in similar pursuits, without the clog of unlimited liability attaching to private banks, they would be upon the high road to fortune. The course of legislation had afforded undue temptation to enter into speculations of the kind. He did not deny that some portion of this evil was to be placed to the account of the Act of 1844.

One of the things which this Act of 1862 permitted was extraordinary; the Act did not prescribe any minimum or maximum amount of shares, which might be issued at the nominal value of one farthing each, and the consequence was that any seven persons might subscribe a piece of paper, each taking a share merely to this nominal amount, and upon presenting a memorandum of incorporation to the Registrar who was bound to register it, the company might be constituted, and the statement might be made that the capital of the company was £500,000. Mr. Wordsworth gave an account of the law as existing upon this point, which would hardly be credited if asserted of any other country. The statute, he said, does not prescribe any minimum or maximum amount of a share, and it is a fact that shares may be issued of the nominal amount of a farthing each. The statute grants incorporation—that is, makes the members a body corporate in perpetuity, which there is no power to dissolve unless it gets into difficulties and is subjected to winding-up. The result is, that any seven persons may subscribe a piece of paper, each engaging to take one share only of the nominal amount of one farthing, and thus by presenting the paper (called “Memorandum of Association”) to the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies become entitled to a certificate which incorporates the company in perpetuity. There is no power in the Registrar to refuse a certificate. The same memorandum so signed and thus framed may at the very time contain a statement that the company’s capital is £500,000. This seems an absurdity, but the law is so. The amendment required would seem to be to fix a minimum sum which each share is to represent, and a minimum number of shares to be held by every person signing the memorandum of association. This is the more reasonably necessary, because the parties so signing and having so little interest in the concern may advertise to the world that it is a company with £500,000 of capital. The absurdity is still greater when it is considered that by the law, as it stands, the same seven persons, each having one share only of a farthing, are the directors of the concern, unless there are articles of association (in conjunction with the memorandum of association) providing otherwise, and may the very next day transfer their shares and yet remain directors. There is nothing in the Act to the contrary. They may also borrow as much money as they please. [An hon. MEMBER: If they can get it.] Difficulties at present would be experienced, no doubt; but till very recently, what with the system of deposits and the high interest allowed by finance companies, directors not only could but did borrow money very largely. But, further, the law required that the capital of a limited company should be stated in its memorandum of association, and allowed that capital to be increased, but prohibited any other alteration of the memorandum. There was consequently no power to diminish capital, or reduce the shares without winding up. There ought to be a provision to meet this difficulty. Take the case of a £50 share, upon which the holder had paid £5; although the necessities of business might require only a further payment of £20, yet he would have the remaining liability of £45 hanging over his head, and the result was that capital had to be kept in reserve which might have been employed for useful purposes; thus capital was kept locked up, and uncertainty was extended. All this showed the necessity of an inquiry into the operation of the Act, to see if protection could not be introduced, and alterations in the machinery made, which would prevent the recklessness, wrong, and abuse which resulted from the operation of a system founded on a principle essentially sound. It was a question whether the principle could not be so modified, as, for instance, by the adoption of some of the provisions contained in the French law, that its working might be rendered just and equable. A great defect in the principle now adopted in English operations was that the managing partner upon whom the great responsibility rested had no interest distinct from those of the sleeping partners. In France the combination of the principle of limited with unlimited liability was very effective. The person who was commandite was under no liability except to audit the accounts, whereas the commanditaire, a person who took the most active part, was under unlimited liability. But the moment the person under limited liability in France interfered actively in the concern, and took any part in the operations of buying and selling, his position changed, and with it the extent of his liability. The promoters of those companies did not ordinarily put all they had into the concerns, and therefore the breaking up did not involve the ruin of those parties; but persons who led others into such speculations were bound to do all in their power to save those who had invested on their advice. It was notorious that a great number of concerns, which had been rotten from the first, were floated in the market entirely on false representations. Such things could not happen if the directors and promoters of these companies were under unlimited instead of limited liability. He did not mean to argue that in many cases very good results had not followed from unlimited liability. He had recently received a letter giving details of the operation of a limited company whose works had been carried on with such success that, after large profits had been made, an adjoining property was purchased. In this case the purchasers would not have gone into the affair at all, except on the principle of limited liability. The letter stated—

"Some years ago, Mr. —, an eminent coal master in South Wales, died. He had with great care, and during many years, brought his collieries into such a state of working as to be capable of yielding large annual profits. He had previously been obliged to expend large sums and take great trouble to make the produce of his collieries known and appreciated in all parts of the world, and was about to reap the fruit of his arduous labours when he died. The business was left to his three sons, of whom one only took an active interest in the colliery. The difficulties of distribution of property and the unequal interest taken by the sons soon made it necessary to realize the estate, and I doubt very much whether that realization would have proved beneficial to the family. After some attempts to value and distribute among the parties, Mr. —, of —, the eminent colliery engineer, was called in, and he valued the colliery at £300,000, and found parties who were willing, on the principle of limited liability, to become purchasers of the concern. The purchase money was spread over a period of years, so as to make the payment easy for the new proprietors. The company has been eminently successful. They paid their first instalment out of their subscription, and I am informed that the whole of the other instalments, now amounting to nearly the whole sum, will be paid out of current profits. Besides this, they have purchased large adjacent properties—and given in one instance £125,000. You may take this, then, as an instance of the successful application of the principle of limited liability. I know the parties on both sides. It suited the vendors to find parties willing to buy, and the purchasers are perfectly satisfied with their purchase, but they would not have gone into it except on the principle of limited liability."

He was far from wishing to be understood as expressing a general condemnation of that principle; what he contended for was that in the interest of the public generally the law required amendment. The abuse of the articles of association was very serious. When the case of Barned's Bank came before the Master of the Rolls it appeared that, after a recital of the various objects for which the company was formed, the articles had a recital to this effect:—"And for such additional or extended objects as the directors may from time to time decide on." Lord Romilly remarked that this was almost equal to a bank taking to brewing. Something should be done to lessen the difficulty, the litigation, and the costs connected with compulsory winding up. The law should be made more explicit, and greater power should be placed in the hands of shareholders and creditors. He found it stated that Vice Chancellor Wood in a late case, when refusing to convert a voluntary winding-up into a compulsory one, commended the discretion of the shareholders in voting for a voluntary winding-up. He said—

"He could not see that any course could be so beneficial both to creditors as well as shareholders (unless there were strong reasons to the contrary on the circumstances of the case) as a winding-up under supervision. By that means they would command as much of the control of the Court as could be wanted; they were able to submit questions of law to the judgment of the Court, and they were able to interfere instantly with the official liquidator if they thought the assets were about to be wasted; and it had always appeared to him that those persons who were interested in the concern—shareholders on the one hand and creditors on the other—must best know their own interests, and must be much better capable of managing them than the Court could ever be. Considering the weight of the applications that had been made to him with reference to the management of mercantile concerns, where he was in one case asked to authorize the advance of £200,000 by telegraph to India, he felt himself wholly incompetent to deal with such interests."

Four courts were now engaged in the solution of questions connected with public companies, and their decisions had been by no means uniform. In some cases they had been conflicting. To the process of compulsory winding up there was attached an official called the chief clerk. His offices were crowded. His fees were very oppressive, but in that respect he was nothing to the official liquidator. Without mentioning names he might refer to the case of an important banking company, which, owing to misfortune rather than to imprudence, got into difficulties. After much struggling among the official liquidators, one of them succeeded in getting charge of the concern. After he had carried on operations for some time, the shareholders thought it advisable to re-construct the company. The official liquidator claimed a vested interest in it; but ultimately, on putting his demand in figures, his bill amounted to £38,000, the concern having been five months in his office, and twelve clerks having been employed by him. It was to be remembered, too, that in all probability this official liquidator was engaged in a host of other matters, besides those of the bank, at the same time that the bill of £38,000 was being run up. He was informed by a gentleman of high reputation in the City that the cost of winding-up all the different companies which came to an end in that way last year was not less than £1,000,000. Some liquidators thought it their duty to get as much as possible for the creditors, while others believed that it was to the interest of the shareholders they ought to look. He was told that the new arrangement of paying the liquidators so much a day was not working in a manner satisfactory for either the creditors or the shareholders. As long as the liquidators had so many guineas a day, it was probable they would continue to find matters constantly arising which required great deliberation and grave consideration. He wished the House to consider the enormous amount of money which was kept in people's pockets and tills, because of the overhanging weight of uncalled capital which might be called for by these concerns. He hoped the President of the Board of Trade would give his attention to some immediate legislation whereby a company which had an overhanging liability of £1,000,000 when £500,000 was amply sufficient to carry on all their operations, would be allowed to reduce their liabilities by a simple resolution of proprietors, instead of by the process of winding-up, care being of course taken to provide for the rights of present creditors. Hitherto, the corner-stone of British commerce has been a feeling of entire reliance upon the faith and honour of the British merchant. It was necessary that events which had seemed to cast a stigma upon that faith should be brought to light, so that we might see who was to blame. He believed it would then be shown that the area of irregularity was very small, and that the evil approached with boldness might with ease be removed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Limited Liability Acts."—(Mr. Watkin.)

Mr. Watkin

MR. MORRISON said, he thought this was a peculiarly opportune moment for an inquiry of this sort. Our new law of partnership had lasted a sufficient time to enable us to judge of its character and results, and, above all, we were last year affected by a monetary crisis that was distinguished from all other crises in this, that while the general trade of the country was hardly at all affected, the ruin had fallen upon these limited liability companies, and especially those of them which dealt in monetary transactions. The facts of the crisis were fresh in our memories; while, having passed through the panic, we were not now likely to form any other than a calm judgment upon the facts before us. Having passed the crisis, and weathered the storm, we might also fairly believe that the great body of the companies left were placed upon so firm a basis that they need not fear an inquiry. It must be admitted that in one great division this limited liability had been productive of an enormous amount of good; he alluded to those enterprizes that were more or less of a philanthropic character, and carried out for public purposes rather than individual profit. Such were the numerous associations for improving the dwellings of the working classes, and the companies which were formed for supplying gas and water to provincial towns. These were enterprizes upon which many would not enter if they were to risk their whole fortunes by so doing, although they might be perfectly willing to risk a certain fixed sum. No doubt the hon. Member's inquiry would be more particularly directed to those companies which were formed from private motives for the purpose of obtaining as large an interest as they could. One thing connected with the late panic was the extended scale of its effects, and indeed it affected classes which were wholly different from those which had suffered in prior crises. The ruin which last year brought down so many families to the ground, had affected classes which before had never been known to be much connected with joint-stock enterprizes; and, in fact, all classes were involved in it—farmers, tradesmen, domestic servants, peers, and peasants; and those who were least able to take care of themselves were most deeply involved, because they had in many cases invested their last penny. In addition to the limits of the inquiry which had been sketched out, he would suggest one or two other subjects of inquiry. The hon. Member (Mr. Watkin) had spoken a great deal about the evils of the present system of liquidation under the supervision of the Court; but it was to be hoped that he would also carry his inquiry into the evils of the system of voluntary liquidation, without the supervision of the Court, also. The practices which were said to have been adopted, the extortions said to have been attempted, should be brought to the test of truth, and if they proved to be true—though it was of no use crying over spilt milk—they would serve as a very useful warning to the companies that should come after them. He trusted also that the mode of getting up companies would also be inquired into. There were a race of men who were known as “promoters,” and whose business it was to get up companies. All business men were acquainted with the system, but that knowledge was not quite so widely extended as one could wish it to be. The stock-in-trade of a company promoter was very limited. A Directory by the help of which he might send out his circulars, and the countenance of some Finance Company, were pretty nearly all he wanted. But then he had to get together a board of directors. Now, to speak of this in the House of Commons was probably to tread upon delicate ground. He (Mr. Morrison) would only say that during the few years he had been in the House he could have turned the prestige of his position as Member of Parliament to very good account, and could have made thousands of pounds if he had consented to sell his name for the purposes of these company promoters. He repeated that this was a delicate matter, and he believed that the hon. Member (Mr. Watkin) could do no greater good than by going thoroughly into this question, and showing how the system worked; and possibly a remedy might be found for a good deal which was complained of. As to giving to companies power to reduce the amount of their shares, he did not altogether agree with the view which had been taken. They all knew that since the panic many companies had taken the step of reducing the amount of their liability, but this was a thing which might be carried too far. If too large a portion of the capital of a company were paid up, there would be no reserve to fall back upon in an emergency, and the credit of the company would be altogether gone. It was always a delicate matter to interfere in commercial enterprise in any way; but

Parliament had interfered by placing the word “limited” upon the names of these companies, and it might be a question whether some limit should not be placed to the amount of capital to be paid up. Another question was whether it would not be desirable to carry into limited companies generally the provisions as to publishing the names of the shareholders, the same as those provisions existed in reference to banks. It was known that one of the practices of promoters was to fill up the list with the names of men of straw, so as to induce those who had capital to follow the example thus set of taking shares, and there was at present no protection by law against practices of this sort. He most cordially supported the Motion for the Committee; but whilst doing so he must say that he firmly believed in the principle of limited liability, and that it had nothing to fear from investigation. Further, he believed that as time went on this principle would tend more and more to supersede private enterprise in carrying out commercial undertakings in the country. The change which had been made in the law of liability enabled the poor to invest their savings, and was the means of effecting that for which social philosophers so much longed—namely, uniting together the interests of all classes. Its operation was destined to grow to such an extent that no time should be lost in improving the law before the transactions in connection with it became so large that it would be almost beyond the power of Parliament to deal with it.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that the House was greatly indebted to his hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) for having brought this important and difficult subject under its consideration. The old law of unlimited partnership was such as to deter rich men from entering into trading companies, whilst the new law of limited liability had rendered such undertakings extremely popular. He was one of those who looked favourably on the system of limited liability, notwithstanding all that had occurred, provided that the business was conducted by capital and not by credit. But, instead of that, what did they see? There was only an inconsiderable amount of capital called up, and the conductors of those enterprises relied for the rest upon bills of exchange, and credit accommodation of a similar kind. When rash and immoral speculators saw that the law made it easy to set on foot companies with small paid up capitals and enjoying limited liability, they immediately rushed into the making of them, and the only wonder was, that more calamities had not taken place. It was believed that great mistakes had been committed in drawing up the Act by which limited liability companies were constituted. If they looked to France, where the principle of limited liability was well understood, everything there was made to depend on publicity. But here, while there were several documents connected with such associations which shareholders ought to see, one only, perhaps, was made public, and the rest were kept out of sight. In France, on the other hand, all the documents were obliged to be published, and everybody was made acquainted with the minuties of the concern. There was not such a separation of documents to be sought out by shareholders, as first a prospectus, next a memorandum of association, and third, articles of association, which had to be studied before a person could ascertain what were the objects and constitution of a company of which he proposed to become a member. He thought, however, that his hon. Friend (Mr. Watkin) was mistaken as to what he said in reference to the system of having gérants in France. He said that companies there were administered by means of persons who were wholly responsible and whose liability was unlimited; but if they were responsible, they had also all the control of the capital of the company; and he believed that they would be simply going from the frying pan into the fire if they altered the constitution of our joint-stock companies so as to give to one or two gérants the whole power over the capital of a company. He believed that a well-chosen Committee would investigate this matter much better than it could be investigated in any discussion in the House. Very great discredit had fallen upon the commercial character of this country in consequence of the ruin into which many of those companies had sunk, and of the difficulties which the law threw in the way of reaching the insolvent parties. As to liquidators they were reputed as nothing more nor less than a nuisance—not only from the extraordinary delays which they occasioned, but also from the fact that no information was to be obtained from them. Nothing more important could engage the attention of the House than an inquiry into the mode in which these companies were got up and conducted, and providing remedies for the defects of the law but without interfering with the principle of limited liability.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down, that this question can be more profitably discussed before a Select Committee than in this House. After hearing the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Watkin) as to the grounds on which he asks for this inquiry, and finding that it is not his intention to impugn the principle of the Limited Liability Acts, the Government make no objection to granting this Committee. They think, indeed, that good may arise from it. There is no doubt that there has been of late great uneasiness, and very naturally so, in the public mind in reference to the proceedings that have been referred to, and many of these unfortunate transactions have been, perhaps hastily and without sufficient consideration, attributed to the operation of the limited liability laws. I think that these laws have been made to bear a greater amount of the burden than is really due to them, and it is one of the advantages of having a Committee of Inquiry that we may learn to distinguish between that which is good and sound in the principle on which they rest, and those things which are only incidental accessories to the working of the principle, but which have perhaps conduced to results we all deplore. We may thus perhaps find safeguards that may prevent some of those effects I allude to. I am only anxious to have it understood distinctly that in assenting to inquiry we do not intend to impugn in any way the principle of limited liability, and to say that we are quite aware that there are many points upon which it is desirable that inquiry should take place, and that those points that have already been referred to are well worthy of consideration. As to the question how far it would be possible for companies to reduce the amount of their nominal capital, it is one that has been seriously pressed upon the consideration of the Government. I think that the attention of the House was directed to it last year; and it may become our duty to direct the attention of the House again to the subject. At the same time, it is obvious that it is a question of some difficulty, for it is very essential in giving such a privilege to companies that great care should be taken to prevent injury to the creditors, and that considerable precaution must be used as to the form of notice to be given, so as to prevent any fraudulent transaction in the shape of a reduction of a company's liability. I think that this is one of those points that might be very well considered before the Committee; and from the labours of that Committee perhaps some plan may be suggested to provide sufficient notice of a reduction of capital. As to the mode of liquidation of companies, the hon. Member has made out a good case. I think that it should be looked into, and that this inquiry also might with advantage take place before the Committee. As to the general ground of complaint—that the system gives rise to a great deal of speculation, and that a certain amount of fraud has taken place since the passing of the Limited Liability Acts, and that therefore we are to attribute that speculation and fraud to the operation of these Acts, I may say that I should be disposed to question the accuracy of that suggestion. If we carry our recollections a little farther back we shall remember that, at a time before this principle of limited liability was introduced, there were inquiries into the law connected with the establishment of joint-stock companies, and that similar complaints of fraud and undue speculation were then made. But I will not enter into that question. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman directs his attention rather to practical points of detail, and into those we are quite ready that an inquiry should take place. I think it is unnecessary that I should enter into a general discussion of the subject, especially as the general feeling is that inquiry is desirable; and therefore there is only one other remark that I wish to make. It is with reference to a matter that is, perhaps, not strictly connected with the Motion before us. The hon. Gentleman has reminded the House of some expressions that were used in a speech of mine made upon another Motion of his last year, and also to observations of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with regard to his present Motion. Towards the end of last Session, during that melancholy period of commercial and monetary pressure from which the country was then suffering, the hon. Gentleman brought forward a Motion for an Address to the Crown to issue a Commission to inquire into the causes of the commercial distress, and also into the operation of the currency and banking laws. At that time I was authorized, on the part of the Government, to say that, although we objected to the appointment of a Commission, we would undertake to inquire into the subject during the recess, and in the beginning of the present Session we should be prepared to state our views on the matter, whether we would propose legislation or assent to the appointment of a Committee of Inquiry. On the occasion of the hon. Gentleman's Motion, although the operation of the Limited Liability Act was mentioned as one of the causes of the distress that prevailed, great stress was laid by the hon. Gentleman, and other hon. Members who supported him, on the operation of the banking laws as that to which the distress was mainly attributable. The Government fulfilled their promises, and during the recess they carefully discussed the operation of the banking laws. They did not make any formal inquiry, or take any formal evidence; but they communicated with several gentlemen of high position, who were intimately acquainted with the subject, with a view of, as far as possible, ascertaining the operation of the banking laws and to consider whether it was desirable that legislation should be proceeded with this year, or an inquiry should take place. The inquiries which we made, and the consideration we gave to the subject, tended to strengthen our view of last Session, that the present monetary laws of the country were founded upon a sound principle, and that it would not be wise to propose any legislation to reverse them. At the same time, we felt that there were many points connected with those laws, on which an inquiry might take place with some advantage, and that there were many points of detail which deserved the consideration of the House with a view to legislation. If the circumstances of the present Session had been other than they are, it was our wish that there should be an inquiry into the banking and currency laws, and we were prepared to state to the House those particular points to which we thought it desirable to give attention. The matter, however, did not appear to Her Majesty's Government to be one of such urgency that it might not be postponed for a short time and considered at our leisure. On the very first day of this Session the hon. Member for Stockport gave notice of his intention to bring forward the question which he has opened to-night; and, shortly after such notice by the hon. Gentleman, he put a question to the Government as to their intentions respecting the banking laws. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he would himself take an opportunity of submitting a Motion on the subject, when he would state the views of the Government respecting it. Now, it was the intention of my right hon. Friend at that time to suggest that the two inquiries asked for, being to a great extent on kindred subjects, should be joined. My right hon. Friend thought it would be difficult, if not impossible, to have two Committees sitting at the same time which perhaps would require the presence of the same gentlemen. But the more we considered the matter the more we felt the difficulty of combining together the two inquiries. Looking, therefore, at the peculiar circumstances of the present Session, feeling the impossibility of my right hon. Friend being able to give that attention to the subject which he wishes, and the inability of many Members well qualified to do so to take part in the inquiry, we have abandoned that course and postponed the intended inquiry into the currency laws. In doing so, however, let it not be supposed that we ignore the importance of the subject. By no means; but considering that it is one upon which there is no immediate hurry to legislate, because we are agreed in the general soundness of the principle on which the currency system rests, we feel it is much better to legislate upon it cautiously and leisurely rather than hastily. In respect to the constitution of the Committee which the hon. Gentleman proposes to appoint, I have only now to express a hope that he will communicate with us in respect to the constitution of such Committee, in order that gentlemen the most experienced and best qualified to investigate the question shall be placed upon it. That object being obtained, I think the best results will follow, and that we shall obtain from this inquiry a large amount of useful information.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the operation of the Limited Liability Act."—(Mr. Watkin.)

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. M'LAGAN moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Laws relating to the preservation of Game in Scotland. He said, its object was to remove some of the causes of that discontent about game which, not unreasonably, in many instances prevailed among the tenantry of Scotland. Of late years several circumstances had tended to increase that dissatisfaction. The relationships between the different classes connected with land had been considerably modified. The modern system of farming rendered a farmer more subject to loss and annoyance from game. Rents had risen, and farming had been conducted on more strictly commercial principles. The palmy days of farming were past, and the tenant was obliged to calculate on every small return he might obtain from his outlay; this being the more necessary, when this annual outlay on manures and feeding stuffs often exceeded the rent paid to the landlord. Contemporaneously, however, with this increase of rent and expenditure, and diminution of profits, there had been an immense increase in game, caused by excessive preservation, and if to these causes of dissatisfaction were added the difference in the mode of conducting the sport from that in which it was formerly carried on, the discontent which prevailed could be no matter of surprise. Formerly the sportsman, content with a moderate amount of game, rejoicing in the healthful exercise which he was obliged to take in pursuit of it, and knowing that he had always the goodwill of the tenant on whose farm he shot, was always sure of a pleasant day's sport, and never forgot to give a kindly greeting at the farmhouse and deposit some of the spoils of the day. Now, however, in too many instances, the object of the sportsman appeared to be to have a large bag with as little trouble as possible. For months the game had been strictly preserved; and at the proper time he sallied forth accompanied by his keepers, his beaters, his dogs, and the game cart. A wholesale slaughter took place, and the game cart was filled and dispatched to the nearest poulterer or game dealer, without the slightest acknowledgment to the tenant on whose crops the game had been reared. Irritating as such conduct must be to a tenant of spirit, even when the sportsman was the proprietor of the lands, it was still more so when he was a stranger, who, paying a rent for the game, endeavoured to reimburse himself by selling most of what he shot. No wonder a tenant felt discontented when he saw the fruits of his great outlay, his anxieties, his skill, and his labours not merely eaten up, but destroyed by animals which he himself had not the power to keep within reasonable bounds, and which were a source of income and profit to another. It was said, however, that a tenant had no cause of complaint, since, when he took his farm, he agreed to conditions reserving the game to the landlord, and depriving himself of all claim to compensation on account of any injury done to his crops by that game. In some leases, indeed, the tenant was converted into a gamekeeper, and was bound to preserve game and to prevent poachers entering on his farm. The following is a specimen of the game clauses often inserted into leases in Scotland:—

"As also reserving the whole game, deer, fish, rabbits, and wild fowl, which now are, or may hereafter be, upon any part of the said lands with the exclusive right of hunting, &c.; and that, notwithstanding of any alterations or modifications that may take place in reference to the laws for the preservation of game; and the tenant is hereby taken bound to warn off said lands all unauthorized persons who may be hunting, fishing, shooting, or trespassing thereon. And the tenant and his servants and dependents are hereby prohibited from keeping any dog or dogs on the farm, except one collie or sheep-dog, which dog shall not be allowed to go at large or to go about the fields unless accompanied by the shepherd, and then only for the purpose of tending the sheep; and any dog found at large or following game, the keeper shall be entitled to shoot or otherwise destroy, and the tenant shall have no claim or recourse therefor against the proprietor or his keeper, and the tenant shall not be entitled to carry a gun on the farm, except for the purpose of scaring crows or wood pigeons, which gun shall not be loaded with shot, and the keepers shall be entitled to satisfy themselves on any occasion that said gun is not loaded in contravention of the stipulation. Moreover, the servant of the tenant shall not be entitled to carry a gun on any pretence whatever; but the tenant shall have power to furnish one of his servants with a short pistol for firing powder only, for the purpose of scaring crows, &c."

So that a tenant is not allowed to keep that most companionable of animals, a Scotch terrier. But before condemning them for signing clauses so derogatory to their position as independent yeomen and as men of intelligence and capital, it should be remembered that there was at present a very great competition for farms, owing to many who had made money in other occupations becoming competitors for farms. Moreover, these clauses were stereotyped and unalterable in the leases of many estates, and were till recently, and even now, in some instances regarded by competitors for farms as mere formal sentences which, owing to the great competition, they were inclined to overlook or consent to. They were induced the more readily to agree to them, because, on examining the farm with the view of giving an offer for it, they observed no unusual number of game, and trusted to the honour of the landlord that, at all events, there would be no increase of it so as materially to damage their crops. It had been argued that a tenant on looking over a farm should have satisfied himself as to the amount of game on it; but this was impossible, for, at particular hours of the day, the game retired to the covers, or might, for the occasion, be driven off the farm by the keepers. He knew a case where a tenant, himself a sportsman, having year after year had fields of turnips destroyed by the deer and hares, complained to the landlord of the superabundance of the game, and the landlord, who lived at a distance, resolved to have a day's shooting on the farm to reduce the numbers. An intimation was sent to the keepers, but when the landlord made his appearance very little game was seen. The tenant afterwards discovered that previous to the arrival of the landlord, the keepers had driven the game off the farm, so that their master might not have cause to complain of their excess of zeal in preserving it. In too many instances, indeed, the keeper was the sole or main cause of disagreement between landlord and tenant; and so great was the damage done to a tenant's crops, that he was under the necessity of giving up his farm if the evil were not soon remedied. It was alleged by some that the damage done to the crops by game, even on strictly preserved estates, was immaterial. Such, however, was not the opinion of gentlemen well qualified to judge. He knew a case in which the damage done to the crops and the expense of protecting them from the game on a farm of 560 acres amounted to upwards of £900 for the last two years. The late Mr. Pusey, once a Member of the House, and an eminent agriculturist, gave evidence before a Select Committee of the House on the Game Laws, about twenty years ago. He said that he was once a strict game preserver; but, seeing the evils that arose from the system, he discontinued it, and by so doing, he had more satisfaction in the farming of his estate, and his tenants were more contented. His principal reason for ceasing to preserve game was that he was convinced the farmers had grounds for complaining of the quantity of game that was kept, and of the injury which their crops suffered from hares and rabbits. He also stated that game had become a source of serious loss and annoyance to tenants in those parts where it was highly preserved, and that the landowners would find great advantages from relaxing the protection, or abandoning it altogether. This evidence of Mr. Pusey was corroborated by that of Lord Hatherton, given before the same Committee. His Lordship was at one time a strict game preserver, before he became an extensive improving farmer, when he had seldom less than 2,000 acres of land under improvement. He stated, in evidence, that a very extensive and strict preservation of hares and rabbits was most injurious to land in every way, and he found that to pursue the two occupations—a rigid preserver of hares and game generally, and an improver of his land by planting and farming—was perfectly incompatible. He soon found, as a farmer desirous of introducing among his tenantry and into the neighbourhood a better system of cultivation, that it was utterly hopeless to do so unless he completely destroyed the hares. And, again, he should have thought it perfectly idle to invest capital in the improvement of land if he had not the power of destroying hares. The Duke of Grafton also stated, before the same Committee, that he had destroyed all the hares on his estate in Suffolk on account of the injury they did to the crops of the farmers. Sir Harry Verney also stated it as his opinion that the preservation of game in great abundance was a serious discouragement to good farming. All practically acquainted with agriculture agreed in the opinion of these noblemen and gentlemen that the animals most destructive to the crops of the farmer were the hares and rabbits. It was most difficult, if not impossible, to estimate the damage done by hares, for their depredations were not confined to one place, but extended sometimes for miles; and it was not so much what they consumed as what they destroyed. He had seen a field of turnips destroyed during frost by the hares passing along the rows and taking a bite out of almost every turnip, thus exposing it to the frost and rendering it useless. He had seen fields of grain cut up with their

roads and the ground strewn with the heads of grain which had fallen from the straw being gnawed through at the joints by these pests. He had seen fields nearly ready for harvest trampled on and beaten to the ground by them in their mischievous gambols. He had seen a young plantation of firs irreparably injured by the tops of the finest plants being cut off by them. He had seen pastures so polluted by their manure that more useful animals refused to graze on them. He knew some farms where certain crops, such as winter vetches, could not be cultivated. His observations and experience had led him to the same conclusion arrived at by Lord Hatherton—that the preservation of hares and the improvement and the proper farming of land were incompatible. Various estimates had been given as to how many hares were equal to one sheep in the amount of food destroyed by the one and consumed by the other. The estimates had varied from two to six and eight hares for one sheep; and he was certain that, if he took into account the damage done to the different crops mentioned, the lowest estimate would be much nearer the truth than the highest. He recently read of an estate in Aberdeenshire on which 30,000 rabbits and 1,400 hares had been destroyed annually for the last twenty years. Suppose that three rabbits were equal to two hares, and four hares to one sheep, and that there must have been fed on the estate at least double the number annually destroyed, we had a number of hares and rabbits kept constantly on that estate which would be equivalent to about 11,000 sheep. The estate contained about 6,000 arable acres, about 3,000 acres of hill pasture, and about 5,000 acres in wood. Thus, there would be as much food destroyed by hares and rabbits on that estate as if nearly two sheep were kept on each arable acre, or about one and a quarter on each acre in cultivation and in hill pasture. Lord Hatherton, in his evidence before the Committee, stated that—

“He would be extremely glad to see hares taken altogether out of the class of game, and put on the same footing as rabbits. He believed it would correct a great amount of evil, affecting material interests both of tenant and landlord, and affecting the moral condition of the lower orders; and it was the simplest and greatest improvement that could be made in the Game Laws.”

Fully sympathizing in these views, he proposed that hares and rabbits should be dropped from the game list. He knew that some of his friends considered that this was going too far; but he was ready to consider favourably any Amendments that might be proposed in Committee, provided the tenants' interests were protected, and no encouragement was given to poaching. It might be said that rabbits were not game; but they were included in the Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 68, or the Day Trespass Act; in the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 69, or the Night Trespass Act; and also in the Act for the Prevention of Poaching of 1862. He proposed, next, to abolish cumulative punishments—that was, punishments imposed by several statutes, under each and every one of which a person might be prosecuted and convicted for one single act. Contrary as this was to the principles of justice and jurisprudence, and opposed as it was to the spirit of our laws, it was still true. For instance, under the Game Qualification Act of 1621, no man could hunt or hawk, “who hath not a ploughgate of land in heritage” under a penalty of £8 6s. 8d. A ploughgate varied from fifty to 100 acres, so that not a few Members of this House rendered themselves liable to be punished when enjoying their autumnal sports on the Highland hills. Then if the unqualified person committed the offence, or wilfully took, killed, destroyed, or had in his possession any moor fowl or ptarmigan out of the proper season—that is to say, between the 10th of December and the 20th of August, he was liable to be fined both £8 6s. 8d., under the Act of 1621, and £5 for each bird he killed or had in his possession, under the Act 13 Geo. III. c. 54, and at the same time to forfeit his gun under the Act 1707. Further, if he were a trespasser, and he was convicted before a justice of the peace of being in the pursuit of game between the beginning of the first hour before sunrise and the end of the last hour after sunset, he would forfeit and pay £5, or in default be imprisoned under the Day Trespass Act, 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 68. But if he were convicted of being in the pursuit of game between the expiration of the first hour after sunset and the beginning of the last hour before sunrise, the trespasser would be visited for the first offence, under 9 Geo. IV. c. 69, or the Night Trespass Act, with imprisonment with hard labour for three months; and he would be bound to find caution for £10 that he would not trespass again for one year; or, if he could not find caution, he must suffer imprisonment with hard labour for an additional six months.

For a second offence the penalty is doubled, and for a third offence he might be transported. And lastly, if the trespasser had not taken out the game certificate, he would have the punishment imposed on him under the Game Certificate Acts. The next clause of the Bill dealt with the tribunal before which all offences against the Game Laws were tried. At present, these were all within the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace. In nine cases out of ten the justices before whom these offences were brought were game preservers, or, at all events, being proprietors of land, were interested in the supply of game being kept up. It was very like appointing a man to be judge in his own case. Under the Day Trespass Act a trespasser was liable to be brought up, and, on the oath of the gamekeeper, to be convicted before the master of the keeper, who was at the same time the proprietor of the land on which the trespass was committed. Every gentleman acting as a justice of the peace under the circumstances would conscientiously discharge the duties which the law had imposed on him, and would endeavour to decide according to the Act. But he could not change human nature, and it could not be denied that a game-preserving justice was very apt to be prejudiced against a poacher; and the sentence, even if according to law, might on that account be unduly severe. This appointing a man to be a judge in his own case was, fortunately, quite an anomaly in our legislation, and quite at variance with the spirit of all recent enactments. No road trustee, who was generally a justice of the peace, could act at quarter sessions in an appeal from a meeting of road trustees of which he was a member. No occupier, or father, son, or brother of an occupier, could act as a justice of the peace under the Factory Act; no coalmaster or tenant of coal works under the Mines Act; no miller or baker under the Bread Act; and no brewer under the Licensing Act. It was proposed to remove all Game Law cases from the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace to the sheriffs of the county in which the offence was committed, who were somewhat similar to the County Court Judges in England. This met the wishes of many justices of the peace, who were desirous of being relieved of what to them was an invidious and irksome task. In most leases there was a clause reserving the game to the proprietor, and frequently there was such a large increase of game during the currency of the lease as to involve a serious loss to the tenant. At present, the tenant had his remedy at law if he had not signed some foolish clause depriving him of his rights. But litigation was generally so expensive, from each party having a right to appeal to a higher court, that few tenants were willing to raise an action for damages from game. The clause provided that the amount of damages in cases of injury caused by increase of game during the currency of the lease should be determined by the sheriff, whose decision should be final. An objection was made to this clause, that the increase of game might have been caused, not by the landlord of the tenant suffering the injury, but by a neighbouring proprietor. It was not difficult to distinguish a game-preserving landlord, who would encourage an increase of game, and one who was contented with a moderate amount of game; and the decision of this point might safely be left with the sheriff. He proposed that there should be a reservation of the rights under all existing game leases, and that the Act should not extend to England. He asked the House to consider the provisions of the Bill in a fair, generous, and conciliatory spirit, remembering that if any concessions were to be made, they must be made by that class which was most powerfully represented in that House to a class whose peculiar interests were but poorly represented. He trusted he had said nothing that would tend to stir up class against class, or to increase the heartburnings which, unfortunately, in too many instances existed between landlords and tenants on account of this question. His object had been, not to widen but to repair the breach between them. He might have detailed many cases of great hardship to the tenant from excessive game preservation; but he only touched on these, preferring to leave his case more to the love of justice and the generosity of the landlords. Legislation could do much in this question, but liberal concessions in private agreements could do quite as much. Let them not be too tenacious of their rights when these operate to the loss of others and the injury of the country. Among no classes of the country was it so desirable to have an amicable understanding as among those connected with the land, for upon a thriving and intelligent tenantry, and a contented and educated peasantry, depended the prosperity of the landlord and the success of agriculture.

Mr. M'Lagan

MR. FORDYCE said, the general provisions of the Bill ought to be accepted by the tenant farmers of Scotland as a satisfactory compromise on the game question. In some respects its provisions went too far. In others it did not go far enough; for instance, it did not propose any settlement of the vexed question of game preserving clauses in leases. But it grappled with the question, and was worthy of support. Public opinion in Scotland was very strong against game preserving, and it was very desirable that the provisions of the measure should be discussed in that country, whether the Bill passed or not, as it would pave the way to future legislation. It might appear a miserable question to engage the attention of Parliament; but he could assure the House that in many counties in Scotland it was driving the tenants to desperation. He trusted that something would be done to put an end to the present state of affairs with reference to the preservation of game in Scotland, and restore that good feeling between landlord and tenant which was so essential in a country district for the welfare of every one.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he wished to thank his hon. Friend for a Bill which appeared to be plain, simple, and admirably adapted to the end in view. Legislation on this subject was absolutely necessary, and some measure like the present would greatly benefit the agricultural interest in Scotland. His hon. Friend had not exaggerated the frightful damage inflicted by hares and rabbits in some parts of the country. He hoped there would be no opposition to the passing of the Bill.

MR. DYCE NICOL trusted the Bill just introduced by the hon. Member for Linlithgowshire would be favourably received by the House, calculated, as it was, in some degree to meet the grievance under which so many of the tenant farmers in Scotland were now suffering; and to allay that painful and increasing agitation arising from the excessive preservation of game; and by its systematic sale exacting a second rent from the tenant. He hoped that there would be little difference of opinion as to those provisions in this Bill by which the jurisdiction in game cases was transferred from justices of the peace to the sheriff or sheriff substitute, and giving to the same authority power as to the valuation and payment of damage from the increase to an unreasonable extent of game. As there would be other opportunities for its discussion in the progress of this Bill, he would only ask of the House its support of a measure essential to the prosperity of both landlord and tenant.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [27th February]. "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Fildes.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. NEATE said, his object in moving the adjournment of the debate on a former occasion was to give further time for the consideration of the provisions of this Bill. They talked of applying the strict principles of political economy to the measure, but he saw no reason why they should not be made to give way under certain circumstances. The principles of political economy had been made to give way in many cases—for instance, in our sanitary laws—and if the Stock Exchange so abused their liberty as to endanger the stability of the pecuniary interests of the public, Parliament had a right to step in and purify its atmosphere, enlighten their consciences, improve their morality, and, if necessary, control their transactions. There was an important distinction between shares in joint-stock banks and the shares of other companies. With regard to rumours circulated to the disadvantage of railway companies, it only injured those who were weak enough or credulous enough to listen to them; but in the case of joint-stock banks, a rumour of that kind affected the stability of a bank, and a run upon the deposits of one bank spread with rapidity to others, and thus affected the credit of the country. Many of these banks were also banks of issue, and thereby the currency of the country was affected. These joint-stock companies were limited in various ways, and therefore it was not just to apply to them the strict principles of political economy. It might, however, be said that it would be dangerous to depart from those principles in regard to these companies, because the adoption of such a course would lead to such an interference being carried further. It was contended that freedom of trade partly consisted in leaving people to calculate chances; but still it was the policy of the law to reduce to its minimum the element of uncertainty in financial transactions. But look at the difference between transactions of the Stock Exchange and the commercial operations of those persons who brought to our shores that which was the essential wealth of the kingdom. It was commonly imagined that the men of the Stock Exchange were better acquainted than other people with the affairs of Europe. So far, however, from that being the case, there was not a more ignorant set of people in the world. [Laughter.] He meant to say that their success was a proof of their own ignorance. The only chance for a stockbroker to be successful was not to know whether Berlin was the capital of Prussia or Vienna the capital of Austria. All that a stockbroker knew was what certain great people who represented great interests were doing, or who were the friends of particular people. They bought shares, not for themselves, but for others, and the information they obtained was a sort of back-stairs information, which was not obtained in a creditable manner or used in an honest way. The game on the Stock Exchange was like the game which children played where cheating was made fair. It was like a game at cards where all the cards were marked, and where those who were the cleverest in detecting the marks won the most money. The freedom of dealing in shares, no doubt, tended in some slight degree to increase their value, when the bank or other concern was fully established; but it was within the knowledge of many in that House that, so far from its being considered an acknowledged benefit, a great many of the best concerns in the City kept their business from the knowledge of the Stock Exchange. If they wanted to find out the best investments, they must go into the quiet corners and little squares in the City where the grass grew up between the pavement. They would there find good and honest companies from which the light of the Stock Exchange was entirely excluded. He knew something of these things, and he did not believe that any gentleman connected with the City would deny what he had stated in that respect. The dealing in railway shares might have been advantageous to the great railway companies like the Great Western, or London and North Western, whose transactions were of public notoriety and whose credit could not be affected by rumours; but the doings of the Stock Exchange with reference to them had been the means of keeping them out of the hands of a better set of proprietors and directory, and had most prejudicially affected the general railway system of the country. If it had not been from fear of the Stock Exchange, country gentlemen and landed proprietors would have held their proper place in the management of railway companies. They did not choose to have their money played with on the Stock Exchange. In the country a concern was frequently recommended on the ground that it had nothing to do with that place. He knew that it was commonly said to them, "You may safely invest in this, for it will not be known in the City." If the country gentlemen and landed proprietors had held their proper place in the railway management of the country, they would not have sold their property to each other for four or five times its value, nor would they have claimed heavy compensation for severance, for interruption of prospect, and other things which had run up the bills of companies to such an extravagant amount. The effect of the joint-stock system, therefore, as applied to railways, had been most prejudicial, and had saddled the public with an expense which was daily interfering with their safety and convenience. It was said that the Stock Exchange did no harm to the banking companies during the late panic, but that they brought it on themselves. There could be no doubt that the difficulties attending the Agra and Masterman's Bank were increased by the sort of dealing he had described on the Stock Exchange. If it had been left alone, and had not been subjected to such hard trials, it would have righted itself with much less loss to many deserving and innocent people than had been entailed by this freedom of banking. City gentlemen talked much at their ease on these things; perhaps they did not embark deeply in those speculations, but they noticed the oscillation of the pendulum, and as soon as the thing burst asunder they, like wreckers after a storm, said, "It was a merciful dispensation of Providence, and all for the best, that the ship that was brought on the rocks could not be expected to live—that it was an ill-founded ship, and must have been wrecked somehow or other—the thing had done no harm to any company, and had done them a great deal of good, and that they had been enabled to invest their money at the rate of 15 or 20 per cent in the best securities." Sir John Barnard's Act had failed partly from the difficulty of procuring evidence, and partly because nobody was interested in enforcing it. It had, therefore, fallen into disuse. They had by their legislation put down gambling houses and lotteries, and had in consequence concentrated the whole gambling spirit of the country in the Stock Exchange. Having done so it was too powerful to be dealt with in that House. He only wished to deal with a part of it. It was said that the question was too difficult to be dealt with. He believed that the real objection was that it would be too easy to deal with. There could be no difficulty in carrying out the provisions of the bill, because there would be numbers of joint-stock banks anxious to do so in order to protect themselves. The bill might be an experiment; but he believed this exceptional legislation was called for in the interests of the joint-stock banks and of the public in general.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, that every one must sympathize with the motive which had led to the introduction of the present Bill. A man who speculated in the misfortunes of others, and made his gain out of their losses, was not a man for whose protection the voice of any Member of that House was likely to be raised. The question, however, was whether, upon the whole, the proposed legislation was expedient, and he owned he had grave doubts upon the point. The hon. Member for Oxford had advocated the abolition of the Stock Exchange, and seemed to think country gentlemen would invest in railway shares if they were deprived of the means of selling them. But he was right in thinking that such a measure should be more general. He (Mr. Cave) felt several objections to the Bill before the House. In the first place, it was legislation which touched only one of a large class of cases which could not be distinguished in principle, though the effect upon them might not be equally mischievous. On what ground was a man to be prevented from selling on the chance of buying at a profit, and yet not be prevented from buying on the chance of selling at a profit? The former was the regular course of dealing in many trades. When the debate on the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act took place in 1860, the cases of tallow and opium were adduced. The French were ready to sell beetroot sugar of the coming crop. The Dutch sold refined sugar for future delivery; in no case had they the goods; they took the chances of buying before the day. Nor were these practices so innocent as the hon. Member seemed to suppose. Many holders of cotton for manufacturing purposes had of late suffered much from rapid fluctuations caused by speculators. Again, as a matter of principle, was there any more reason why, when a broker was instructed to sell bank shares, he should ascertain that his principal had them ready to deliver, than when he was instructed to buy he should insist on seeing that his principal had the bank notes in his pocket to fulfil his contract? Again, on principle, the public had as much right to complain of the price of commodities being raised by speculative purchasers as shareholders had to complain that their property was depressed by speculative sales. No one would seriously propose to interfere with the former. In old times, indeed, the laws against forestalling, regrating, and engrossing were levelled against those practices, but those laws had fallen into oblivion; and it was allowed on all hands that legislative interference was mischievous, bringing the law into disfavour, and tending to its constant evasion. It was that argument which was chiefly urged for the repeal of Sir John Barnard's Act, entitled, as the House knew, "An Act to prevent the Infamous Practice of Stockjobbing"—an Act passed, it was said, by misadventure, and which had for 130 years been powerless to prevent transactions of a similar nature to those against which the present Bill was directed. There was great difference of opinion in the House in 1860 on that subject. The late Chancellor of the Exchequer wished to repeal the whole Act, relying on the Act of 1845 to prevent gambling. But the late Solicitor General (Sir William Bovill), objecting to that, brought in a rival Bill. What was that measure? It was simply a proposal to "repeal so much of Sir John Barnard's Act as prevented persons selling stocks and securities of which they are not possessed." So that the Bill before the House was doubly retrograde, both in reference to the Government Bill of 1860, which was passed, and to the more moderate and cautious measure of the present Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. Well, then, was there any special evil which would justify such special legislation? Certainly, events had taken place in the commercial world which they all deplored. It had been said that certain banks and other establishments had been pulled down by the sellers of shares spreading false reports; but the spreading of false reports was itself illegal, and visited with heavy penalties. He admitted that one argument in favour of the present Bill was that it might enable such delinquents to be fixed with what was so difficult of proof; but the real cause of the downfall of those establishments and companies had been the inherent weakness of the shareholders—a weakness which was in itself almost fraudulent. When a man bought a £50 share for instance, with £25 paid, he rendered himself liable for the other £25, and ought to be able to meet his liability. If he could not, he was prone to take fright when shares fell in price, sold at a loss to relieve himself of a liability, and played into the hands of speculators. Could it be shown that any concern had been brought to a standstill solely by the sale of its shares? Had it not been a knowledge or strong conviction of unsoundness which had caused the sales, not the sales which had caused the unsoundness? He did not mean to say that solvent companies had not been attacked by these speculators for a fall. That had been done in some well-known instances: what had been the result? Why, that the attacking party had been severe losers, because, owing either to defensive purchases or to the natural change of the market, shares were dearer on the settling day than on the day of sale. The House would see how great the risk was which these speculators for a fall ran, bound as they were to deliver what they had contracted to deliver at any price. He thought that risk was quite sufficient protection to the public in ordinary times, and it was for ordinary times only that we ought to legislate in commercial matters. He believed that the best and most wholesome check to gambling transactions was the reduction of the time between contract and delivery to the shortest possible date. He confessed he was, in the first instance, disposed to acquiesce in the measure under discussion. It was one which appealed to our best feelings; but he was afraid, on further consideration, that while aimed at gambling in shares—that was to say, at a colourable contract between parties, in which no stock was to be delivered, but the difference only to be paid according to the rise and fall of the market—while aimed against that which, according to a decision of the Court of Common Pleas, was now illegal under the 8 & 9 Vict., it would place serious difficulties in the way of entirely legitimate transactions, and they all knew that the effect of such impediments was the artificial diminution of the price of such securities as compared with others which were not affected. So that the hon. Member for York would really injure those whom he intended to benefit. In conclusion, he would say that it was because the Bill was confined and partial in its operation, because it partook of the character of panic legislation, because it was retrograde, reversing the decision to which Parliament came so lately as 1860, and because now that commercial confidence was restored—if, indeed, it was restored—it would be found inconvenient, and therefore, like Sir John Barnard's Act, become inoperative, or only operative in giving facilities for, morally, though not legally, fraudulent repudiation of bargains—it was for these reasons that, although heartily sympathizing with the object of the Bill, he thought the House ought to hesitate before adopting it.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that he would willingly have allowed the matter to rest on the statement of his right hon. Friend who had just sat down, but as one who represented the parties that had come under the invective of the hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate), he felt bound to add a few words. There was no one more disposed than himself to give credit to the hon. Member for York (Mr. Lee-man) for his intentions in bringing forward the present measure; but he believed that the proposed Bill would not check the practices referred to, and that it belonged to that class of exceptional legislation which the House should be very cautious in adopting. It had the appearance of legislation under the feeling of panic, and the transactions against which the Bill was directed were exceptional in character and did not often occur. The right hon. Gentleman who last spoke had rightly said that the houses which suffered from the operations of these speculators were in every case in circumstances rendering them suitable objects for attack, and it was notorious that with respect to banks of another class their attacks failed. There was one subject he approached most unwillingly; but the hon. Member for Oxford, when he named the Agra and Masterman's Bank as one of the establishments which failed entirely in consequence of the proceedings of those speculators, stated that which was not at all founded in fact. The cause of the suspension of that bank was that it was founded on wrong principles of business, and that it was badly conducted. If, like other banks, it could have offered sufficient securities to the Bank of England, it would have received assistance. He would now say a few words on the constitution of the Stock Exchange and the nature of the transactions there carried on; because he did not believe that ten men in the House unconnected with the City understood the nature of its operations. The gentlemen of the Stock Exchange consisted of brokers and jobbers or dealers. The brokers were persons who bought or sold for clients on commission, while the business of the dealers was to deal in certain shares, stocks, or securities, which they selected for the purpose, neither buying nor selling for clients on commission. The dealers were always ready to buy or sell at a price. A broker having stock to sell or buy went to a dealer and asked him to name a price for the stock he dealt in. The dealer named a price, and at that price he was bound to purchase or to sell. The advantage to the public of this kind of transaction was considerable. If a person possessed of a certain amount of stock—to the amount, for instance, of a broken sum, like £8,550—wished to sell, his broker went into the market, and sold the whole amount to a dealer at its fair market price. Such operations as that would, however, be put an end to if the present Bill were to pass; and then the selling broker would be compelled to try and find some one desiring to buy the same amount as he had to sell of that particular stock, which in many cases he might not find it easy to do. The broker would also be obliged by the Bill to declare the respective numbers of the shares, or the seller's name. Now, in the case of a bank, if it were published that the principal person connected with it was selling the bank shares, their price would go down immediately, and he would not be able to get the fair price for them. Under the existing system the dealer was a most useful man, the person of the highest honour, and necessarily possessed of capital. The hon. Member for York had on a previous occasion referred to the committee of the Stock Exchange in a manner, though it might not be so intended, calculated to disparage that institution, and had complained of a certain resolution adopted by a majority of 15 to 12 out of a body consisting of thirty members; but what had happened since? Either at the end of last week or yesterday, these thirty gentlemen had been summoned to attend again; nineteen attended, and they came to the conclusion that this Bill ought not to be proceeded with by a majority of 18 to 1. The hon. Member for Oxford had characterized the people of the City as "wreckers." He seemed to be under a sort of impression that people sat there as crows on a tree, watching the progress of the plough to see what would be turned up. No one could agree with such extraordinary sentiments. It was said that collusion would take place, and that fictitious sales were made on the Stock Exchange. He begged to state on authority that fictitious sales never occurred there, and that collusion was impossible from the way in which business was carried on. The only object of collusion could be to sell the price of particular stock down; but what would be done if the price of any stock went down in an extraordinary degree? If a sale was recorded or put up at a great margin below the market price of the day, inquiry would be instantly made by the committee as to who was the seller, and what was the cause of the great fall in price. If there was collusion it would come to light instantly, and any parties who had lent themselves to such a transaction would be immediately expelled the house. The method pursued by the Stock Exchange secured equability of price, and that was one of the great advantages it gained for the public. The persons against whom this Bill was directed were not Stock Exchange men. Like Cain, they had a mark upon them. They were people outside the Exchange, and carried on their transactions by giving a commission to a broker. This Bill would not cure the evils complained of. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Cave) had so well stated his objections to the Bill that it was unnecessary to supplement them. Its object was exceptional, retrograde legislation, and it would inflict great disadvantage on the public occasionally resorting to the Stock Exchange.

Mr. ALLEN said: I think the Bill which has been introduced by the hon. Member for York, and which we are now asked to read a second time, is one of a most important character, and one which is calculated to be most beneficial to the interests of the joint-stock banks of this country. The simple object of the Bill is to prevent any sale of shares in a joint-stock bank which is not a real bond fide sale of shares which are actually in the market at the time for disposal. This Bill will consequently prevent all that system of bearing the market, and speculating for a fall, which has been carried on to so great an extent, and which has, in some instances, seriously affected the stability of various joint-stock banks. Now, it is important to notice that this Bill places no obstacle in the way of any bond fide holder of bank shares selling any shares which he may actually possess, at any time or at any price he may choose; and it likewise places no obstacle in the way of any bond fide buyer buying any shares which may be actually in the market; but, on the other hand, it does strike at the very root of that rotten and gambling system of buying and selling shares which are not in the market for disposal, on the speculative chance of procuring them by a certain day on paying the difference in price. Now, it has been asked, why should not this Bill be extended to consols and railway shares as well? and to this I answer, that there is not the same necessity for restriction in those as there is in the case of bank shares, because their stability cannot be damaged in the same way by a combination on the Stock Exchange. Take, for instance, the case of consols. You may indeed, by bearing the market to a great extent, bring down the price of consols in a fractional degree; but you cannot materially affect them, and you cannot at all affect their security, because they are backed up by the whole wealth and credit of the nation as security. Then, again, with respect to railway shares, you may indeed, by a combination on the Exchange, bring down the price of the shares of any particular line; but still you cannot materially affect them, because railways are not dependent in the same way on credit for their stability as banks, and, above all, from the fact that the borrowed money of a railway is borrowed on debentures for a term of years, and cannot be suddenly called in in case of a panic. But, on the other hand, under the present system joint-stock banks are entirely dependent on their credit for their very existence in this way: a joint-stock bank, with a paid-up capital of say £1,000,000, will probably have deposits to the amount of from £5,000,000 to £15,000,000. Now these deposits, amounting to between five and fifteen times the amount of the entire paid-up capital of the bank, are at call, or at a very short notice; but, on the other hand, the banker is obliged to employ them in his business in discounts and advances, by which they are locked up for one, two, three, or more months, as the case may be, thus rendering them not available for a sudden emergency. Now, this being the case, the bank is entirely dependent on its credit with the public for its stability; because the banker labours under this great disadvantage, that he is a trader who trades for the most part with borrowed capital, and with borrowed capital of the most dangerous description, as it is liable to be demanded from him at a moment's notice. And the consequence of this is, that, as he is dependent on his credit for his stability anything which shakes the credit of his bank alarms the depositors, who hasten at once to withdraw their deposits; and, whether there is just cause for alarm or not, if a run on the bank takes place of a sufficiently severe character, the soundest joint-stock bank must stop payment, from the inherent weakness of the present system—that their deposits are at call, while the banker is compelled to employ them in the legitimate course of his business for a lengthened period of time, so that they are not available if suddenly called for. Now, this being the case, a combination on the Stock Exchange by interested parties, by means of fictitious sales, coupled with rumours as to a bank's soundness, may very soon bring down the price of the shares of any particular bank; and this without a single share being actually in the market, and without a single bond fide holder offering his shares for sale. Then when depositors see that the shares of a bank are falling in price, and hear of rumours against its soundness, they very naturally feel alarmed, and begin to withdraw their deposits; and if the withdrawal of deposits goes on to a certain extent the bank must become embarrassed, and ultimately suspend payment; and all this mischief having arisen from a combination on the Stock Exchange to injure a bank by means of these fictitious sales. But it has been said that this Bill is an interference with the freedom of trade, and I boldly assert that it is nothing of the kind, because it will not place the slightest check on any real bond fide sale of shares; it will only prevent that cruel and wicked system of bearing the market which has brought ruin to hundreds of innocent persons. This Bill cannot injure any one, except it be a few dishonest and unprincipled stock jobbers; and when, on the one hand, there are the interests at stake of the great classes of shareholders and depositors in the different joint-stock banks of this country, and, on the other hand, the interests of a few unprincipled men, who care not for the amount of misery they inflict, I trust the House will not hesitate for a moment as to its decision with respect to the second reading of this Bill.

MR. BASS said, he should oppose the second reading of the Bill. There was in the late panic not a single bank which failed that did not do so through some inherent weakness. He had received communications from many commercial men, to the effect that in their opinion the Bill of the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) would operate most injuriously to the holders of shares. So far from its being a protection to them it would be almost impossible after the passing of such an Act to have any large transactions in the shares of joint-stock banks, for no broker would hold £20,000 worth of such stock in hand on the chance of meeting with a purchaser for so large an amount. On the one hand, the public would be the sufferers by the limitation of the business; while, on the other hand, the shareholders, instead of finding a ready sale for even the largest number of shares, would have to haggle with buyers, who would probably only buy a few at a time, and the consequence would be that the market being so restricted they would fall in value accordingly. Again, it might operate very injuriously to individuals; because, whenever a large number of shares were offered for sale, it would get abroad that Mr. So and So was selling his bank shares, and probably the effect would be that when 100 out of say 500 were sold, there would be no market for the rest. The House would do well to recollect that there could not be "bears" without "bulls;" there could be no sellers where there were no buyers. Both buyers and sellers were bound to look after themselves, and the less Parliament had to do with them the better.

Mr. WEGUELIN said, he was afraid that the opinion of the House was against the Bill, but he thought a good deal was to be said for its principle. He could not agree in the statement of the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. Bass), that no joint-stock bank failed in the panic that was not inherently weak. Could he point to a single one in which now, after the panic was over, the creditors did not expect to get every farthing of their money? and if so that was a proof that, had it not been for the alarm and consequent run, and had they had time to call in their capital, or even their securities, they would have been perfectly solvent. Such operations as those complained of by the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) would, if persisted in, go far to ruin almost any bank. Their object was to cause a run on the deposits, and thus lower the price of shares. The House knew that, even in ordinary times, it was almost a ruinous thing for a bank to make a call. The public, who were depositors, immediately took the alarm, rushing to the conclusion that the bank must have made some enormous bad debt, and at once proceeded to withdraw their deposits, thus precipitating a catastrophe which would never have taken place but for the operations complained of. The only resource a bank had was its credit. The business of a bank was carried on with other people's capital, and any blow to its credit that induced depositors to withdraw their capital must lead to its ruin. Taking the best and most substantial bank in London—the London and Westminster—it would be found that the £20 shares were worth £95, £55 of which represented the value of its good-will and credit, and this part of their property was exposed to the attacks of unprincipled speculators, combinations which it was the object of the Bill to destroy. The limitation of the sales to those of actual shares would not in the least limit the real bond fide business, and although it was quite true that it would limit the speculative transactions on the Stock Exchange, the sufferers would be clearly not the public, but the stockbrokers, who formed these combinations. It was said that the law would be constantly broken—that Sir John Barnard's Act was; but that might equally be said of all laws. In legislation affecting interests it was a right principle to give the greatest weight to the interests of the greater number. It was plain that there were concerned in these matters two parties, one including shareholders, depositors in banks, and the general public, who were injured by the combinations complained of; and on the other side the stockbrokers for whose benefit these combinations were made. He asked which of these parties ought to be most considered? It was all very well to reason calmly now that there was no crisis, and men said how foolish it was in shareholders to be alarmed. But he was not at all sure that if there were a financial panic at this moment a Bill of this kind would not receive the support both of the Vice President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Cave) and the hon. Member for London (Mr. Crawford.)

Mr. MILLER said, he should support the Bill, considering that the reasons advanced against it were entirely fallacious. One of the arguments used was that it would curtail transactions in banking shares. That was not a consideration for the public, though it might be for sharebrokers and stockjobbers in the City. The hon. Member for Reading seemed to think that if people put money into a business which they did not understand and lost it, it was their own fault, and there was nobody to blame. He could not subscribe to that doctrine, neither could he believe that in such cases widows and orphans were not entitled to the protection of the law. The Member for Finsbury had mixed up two questions when he opposed this Bill on the ground that it was an attempt at legislating for trade. He (Mr. Miller) had always understood that the evils which the Bill was intended to meet sprung from illegitimate trade. What were the means adopted by these conspirators when they thought they could get a profit by trading on the fears of shareholders? They marked out a particular bank, got at the names of the depositors, scrupling not to employ bribery for that purpose, and then, having spread false rumours, brought them to the notice of the depositors in anonymous letters; while, on the other hand, they wrote anonymous letters to shareholders, advising them, if they wished to save anything, by all means to sell. Why did they do this? Because they themselves had sold large numbers of shares of a fictitious character to be delivered on a certain day, and the difference between the price of the shares on that day and the higher price at which they had sold them would go into their own pockets. He thought this Bill should pass, if only as a tentative measure. It did not go beyond banking shares; and, inasmuch as banking was an exceptional business, it was entitled to protection against such unholy combinations.

MR. CLAY said, that although banks subject to the attacks of conspirators might not be broken they were always grievously injured. It was not the custom for banks to keep sufficient money in their drawers to meet extraordinary emergencies. The soundest bank in the country, of which he had been one of the first six shareholders, never kept in its drawers sufficient to meet an extraordinary emergency, but only sufficient to meet ordinary requirements. Therefore, in a case of an extraordinary emergency money must be realized, and securities must be sold at a depreciated value, all of which would be prevented should the Bill of his hon. Friend become law. The evil complained of was of no modern date. Fifteen years ago an old-established, highly respectable, and perfectly solvent institution, paying a moderate dividend of £8 per cent, actually lost £70,000 in one half-year by the spreading of these wicked reports. He attached very little importance to the resolution passed the other day by the stock-brokers, because they would naturally be opposed to any measure which was likely to restrict their business. He could not agree with the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford), that this measure, if passed, would be inoperative; nor could he agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Cave), that the restrictions which it would impose would affect the value of banking shares, because he did not believe that such sales as those which it would prevent, raised the value of securities. The shares in the old waterworks and insurance companies never came upon the Stock Exchange, and yet he had never known any one experience difficulty in selling them in a day or two. The Bill might need some amendment in Committee, but its principle was a sound one.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that there could be no question that the circumstance, that a security could be immediately turned into money, increased its value. In some cases, weeks elapsed before sellers of the class of shares referred to by the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Clay), could obtain their money.

Mr. Miller

This Bill provided that dealers should not sell the shares of joint-stock banks unless they complied with certain formalities. If the observance of those formalities was impossible or inconvenient, dealers might refuse to trade in these securities, the trading in which, without those formalities, would subject them to be punished for a misdemeanour. That would place the shares of joint-stock banks at a disadvantage in comparison with all other shares, because it would be almost impossible to convert them readily into money. He considered the middle men, or jobbers, on the Stock Exchange a most valuable class, and was surprised that disparaging remarks should have been made with reference to them. Undoubtedly their dealings had a tendency to support prices, and therefore they benefited the holders of this kind of stock. Seeing the enormous amount of this kind of stock that was held by the public, it was to the public advantage that there should be a ready means of disposing of the shares in the market. If the law was not strong enough to reach the conspiracies of which complaints had been made, he should be glad to see it strengthened; but he believed that if this Bill was passed, the remedy would be worse than the disease.

MR. PEASE said, he desired to say something in behalf of the commercial public. Those who had watched the panic of last year knew that the commercial public had suffered more than any other body from its consequences. The right hon. Gentleman who had last spoken highly appreciated the services of middle men. He appreciated them very lightly, especially in relation to banking shares, and if bank shareholders were polled to-morrow they would be found of the same opinion. They would rather do without the middle man, even at the cost of accepting a less price for their shares. He appreciated the difference between moral and immoral trading, and he would therefore vote in favour of the Bill, in the hope that it would stop the plottings of the blacklegs of the town.

MR. THOMAS CAVE said, he was too deeply interested in this question to permit himself to give a silent vote. He had listened with pain to the seeming levity with which the hon. Member for London (Mr. Crawford)—he had almost said Member for the Stock Exchange—had treated the subject. It was absurd to say that this Bill would depreciate a bank's shares when its chairman sold any quantity, because everyone knew that now, even without the Bill, the fact that such a sale had been made was known in a few days, because a transfer must be signed. The hon. Member for the City forgets the widows and orphans and other holders in joint-stock banks who suffered by the panic of last year. The hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) had overstated the case, but there was a good deal of truth in what he had said. There were no doubt many honourable men engaged in transactions in these shares, but there were unfortunately a great many others who fully deserved the appellation of "wreckers." Good banks did go down in consequence of this wrecking system. He knew of a good bank that was placed in the utmost peril by this system. It required the assistance of its friends and customers to carry them through it. He was afraid the hon. Member for York (Mr. Leeman) had damaged his own case when in introducing the Bill he had spoken ill of the members of the Stock Exchange, who were a very estimable body. The Stock Exchange had been too often regarded as the offender. He, however, knew of a case in which an auditor who thus had access to the books of a certain bank, had become possessed of information as to a weak point in its affairs; he thereupon sold 3,000 of its shares which he did not possess, then circulated damaging reports about the concern, brought the shares down with a run, bought in before his settling day, made a fortune, and retired from business.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he thought that his right hon. Friend fell into error in supposing that this Bill, if passed, would put an end to the transactions in bank shares on the Stock Exchange. Those transactions were confined to two sets of dealers—those who dealt having shares to sell, and those who dealt having no shares to sell. Those who had shares to sell by legitimate directions from their clients, would sell them with more satisfaction if this Bill would pass than at present. He would support the Bill because he believed it would give great satisfaction to all bond fide holders of stock, and because the banks throughout the country were in favour of it.

MR. LEEMAN said, he must call attention to the remarkable changes which had taken place in the minds of certain hon. Members in regard to this measure. The hon. Member for Grimsby (Mr. Fildes) who moved the Amendment had expressed to him on a former occasion his satisfaction that the Bill, as originally introduced, had been reduced so as to apply only to joint-stock banks. ["No, no!"] The hon. Member said "No;" but he (Mr. Leeman) had in his hand the original Bill, with the words, "and other joint-stock," obliterated by the hon. Gentleman, and the words, "joint-stock, finance, and other companies," written by him in the margin. Subsequently the hon. Gentleman put a Motion on the paper to move the omission from the preamble of the words he had obliterated, and to make the Bill applicable only to joint-stock banks. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Alderman Salomons) made a statement on Wednesday last in reference to the Bill which surprised him. Last year he (Mr. Leeman) prepared a question to be put to some Member of the then Government, inquiring whether their attention had been directed to the practices then being carried on at the Stock Exchange, and he showed the notice to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, who on that occasion made the suggestion from which the Bill emanated. His hon. Friend said, "Do not ask any question; bring in a Bill." The hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) stated that a change had also come over the minds of members of the Stock Exchange, and that whereas there had been a minority of 12 against a majority of 15, of opinion that legislation was needed—now the minority had been reduced to one gentleman, who continued of that opinion. He could not help thinking that the distance of the fatal 11th of May had operated on the minds of some Gentlemen. Hon. Gentlemen were mistaken in supposing that the great banks of the City of London were opposed to the Bill. He had himself presented petitions in its favour from four of them, and he had the authority of two others for saying that they were also in perfect accordance with the views he sought to enact by the Bill. The petitions presented from all parts of the United Kingdom left no doubt as to the opinion of the joint-stock banks throughout the country on the subject. In fact, the opposition to the Bill came only from the City of London, and the arguments were conducted as if the City only were affected. Not a single Member representing a country district had ventured to utter a word against the Bill. The Vice President of the Board of Trade was connected with one of the largest institutions in the City of London. The hon. Member for the City much misunderstood his remarks on Wednesday, when he said that he had sought to disparage the Stock Exchange. He (Mr. Leeman) appealed to the House whether he did not say, as regarded the Stock Exchange, that it was composed of gentlemen as honourable as any in England; but there were others who had allowed themselves to be the vehicles of transactions last year which required some legislation on the part of that House, seeing that the Stock Exchange would not take action to put an end to them. The reasoning against the Bill was based on the assumption that the real investors in joint-stock banks were persons who perpetually bought one day and sold another. A comparison of the names of the shareholders of those banks, published from time to time, would show that the assumption was groundless. There were no fewer than 50,000 investors in joint-stock banks, and an examination of the lists would show that they did not go in one day and out another, and that they did not require the assistance of jobbers and dealers on the Stock Exchange. It had been said that there were no fictitious sales last year. He had it from members of the Stock Exchange that not one in a thousand of those transactions resulted in actual transfer. If so, were not the sales fictitious? The sale notes were no more than mere registers of bets—records of wagers that stock on a given day would stand at the price mentioned in the sale note—and that was the state of things he sought to check. It was said also that investments should never be made except in solvent and well managed concerns. Why, the Bank of England itself many a time in the present, as well as in the past century, had been in no better position than some of the joint-stock banks last year. He hoped the House by its decision would sanction this measure, the object of which was to give security to permanent investors. It was a simple proposition, easily understood. It had been contended that the Bill would inconvenience real holders of bank stock. The fact was, that real investors were seldom in the market at all. The only persons the Bill would affect, were those who dealt in fictitious sales. The permanent investors were interested in the Bill; but there was another class also deeply interested—namely, the depositors, for whom he was desirous of obtaining the security which the Bill would afford.

Mr. Leeman

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he had never in any way given the remotest encouragement to his hon. Friend to bring in a Bill like that before the House.

(Mr. Goldney, Mr. Leeman, Mr. Powell.)

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was anxious to hear from his hon. Friend (Mr. Goldney) what object he had in view in making the alteration in the law which this Bill would effect. When the Bill was read a second time, he was unfortunately absent from the House, and did not hear his hon. Friend's explanation. It seemed to him no good object would be gained by passing the measure, for it could not be said that the law in force did not work well. The present law was settled upon recommendations of the real property Commissioners, and he could not see why it should be altered.

MR. GOLDNEY said, his object was to get rid of a cumbrous mode of proceeding at present in existence, and which was no security to married women, or to the public, but which put parties—particularly those having small properties—to unnecessary expense. The law now required that a married woman should acknowledge every deed executed by her, which purported to pass her estate or interest, before two commissioners, but only one of them was required to be a disinterested party, and the other was generally the married woman's solicitor. The certificate of such acknowledgment, and an affidavit of the facts, had now to be sent to London to be registered; but what he proposed was that there should be an endorsement upon the deed itself, instead of such registration. Since the Act of 1834 was passed, he understood that the expenses under it—and what he deemed wholly unnecessary expenses—had amounted to £1,500,000.

His Bill would give every protection to married women's rights. They would have an independent person to explain to them their rights, and to ask them if they knew what they were about before they would be allowed to execute a deed. The Law Institution had accepted the measure after making one suggestion, which would be remedied in Committee. As there was nothing in the Bill which at all militated against a married woman's rights he hoped the House would allow it to proceed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the law which his right hon. Friend sought to alter was settled after much consideration, and was adopted on the recommendation of some of the most eminent lawyers of the time, with a view to protect married women in disposing of their property. These piecemeal reforms, brought in to disturb a large plan of legislation, were not desirable. As it now stood the Bill merely dispensed with the certificate of the execution, and with the registration of that execution. He could not agree with his hon. Friend that this was a matter of no importance. The opportunity of search which this registration afforded was of such importance that since 1860 no fewer than 700 searches had been made. That showed the necessity of the existing system. He also objected that the Bill abolished the employment of the officers employed under the present Act, and provided no compensation. He trusted the House would not pass a Bill, the object of which was to disturb what had been so carefully settled by legislation. Thinking that no sufficient grounds had been shown for altering it, he moved that the House do go into Committee on the Bill that day six months.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee,"—(Mr. Attorney General,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. GOLDNEY said, he must persist in taking the sense of the House. His object was to get rid of an unnecessary, cumbrous, and expensive machinery, and to remedy the inconvenience felt by parties sending home powers of attorney for the sale of land from the colonies. The opposition was not to the measure itself, but was founded upon the fact that the Bill would remove the present registrar and the two clerks employed under him.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he opposed the Motion for going into Committee—not because the Bill would deprive an officer of salary without providing compensation, which would in itself be a hardship, but because the measure was unnecessary. Under the present law ample protection was afforded to married women according to rules laid down by the Court of Common Pleas. Those rules gave the utmost security to married women in transferring their property, and it was for exceptional cases, where a spendthrift husband attempted to get possession of his wife's property, that the protection was necessary. The hon. Member, to be consistent, should have proposed to abolish the acknowledgments altogether. That the certificate was not useless was proved by the fact that since 1860 there had been 700 searches, and during last year and the present year about 150.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

QUESTION.

Mr. MONSELL: Sir, information has reached me, within the last few minutes, that an outbreak of the Fenians has taken place in Ireland; and I wish to ask my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Government has received any information upon the subject; and, if so, whether he will state to the House what it is?

LORD NAAS: At a quarter before eleven o'clock this morning, I received the following telegram from Dublin Castle, from the Under Secretary, Sir Thomas Larcom. I have received no further information; and therefore I think I had better read the telegram to the House, and the House will then be in possession of all the information which the Government themselves have upon the subject. There is also a second telegram, which has been received at the Admiralty, from Commander Williams, stationed at Youghal. This is the telegram received from Sir Thomas Larcom—

"Wires cut early in the night between Dublin and Cork, and between Dublin and Limerick, and later in the night between Dublin and Limerick Junction. Up mails late; engine despatched from Thurles to discover the cause; found line blocked up with sleepers, and rails torn up one mile south of Thurles. All communication with Cork, Limerick, and Tipperary therefore denied to us, and we are ignorant as yet of what has taken place there. The rising around Dublin, from Drogheda round to Dundrum, generally, but not as numerous as the Fenians expected. In the dark impossible to estimate numbers; estimates vary from 1,000 to 4,000. No serious outrage on persons or property. At Drogheda police barrack attacked, assailants driven off and followed, some shot, and some prisoners taken. Metropolitan police stations at Kilmainham and Crumlin attacked without success. The city, emptied of its troublesome class, remained perfectly tranquil. Troops very skilfully disposed. One of the men taken had Greek fire, as well as arms and ammunition. Many now returning in twos and threes."

"Fenians, number unknown, rose and attacked the police station at Castlemartyr, twelve miles from here, at 2.30 this morning. One man, an American, said to be shot, and several wounded. Troops gone from here to assist civil force. Telegraph wires cut between this and Cork."

I may say, further, that I am perfectly convinced that most ample preparations have been made, and that the military authorities throughout the country are fully prepared to meet the emergency.

TESTS ABOLITION (OXFORD) BILL.

(Mr. Coleridge, Mr. Grant Duff.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. COLERIDGE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said: Sir, the Bill is substantially the same as that which I introduced last year; and therefore I do not propose to detain the House at any length from the issue proposed, a simple issue—a very important issue—but one as to which I cannot bring myself to entertain any serious doubt. Indeed, it is not necessary for me to discuss the matter much at large. So far as I am able to deal with the question, I dealt with it last year at length upon a like occasion to the present; and though, of course, I do not suppose that any remarks of mine in detail are remembered by the House, yet the debate, I have no doubt, is remembered. The general scope of the discussion is well recollected, and hon. Members of the House who take an interest in this question are pretty well aware by this time, after the many debates in this and former Parliaments, of all that is to be said for or against this very short and very simple measure. It is only necessary for me, therefore, to recapitulate very shortly the heads of the argument which a year ago was submitted to the House. First of all, we contend that the University is a national institution in a sense which thoroughly justifies the interference of Parliament to compel the admission of all the subjects of the Queen to a participation in its benefits, without reference to the religious communion they belong to, or the religious belief they hold. It is national in a sense in which the Colleges are not. I do not say I do not mean that Parliament may not, as it repeatedly has, most properly interfered with the Colleges; but I maintain that to be a different and distinct question, mixed up with very different considerations from those which affect the University, and carefully to be kept separate and dealt with by itself. Next we say that it was only, so to speak, by accident, and by no means with the views and objects which are now maintained, that the University first lost its purely educational character and became sectarian, or, to avoid the use of an offensive word, exclusive. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen) has shown that it was in the Chancery of Lord Leicester, in the time of Queen Elizabeth, that these Acts were first imposed, and then for very different objects from those for which they are now maintained. Furthermore, we say that all subjects of the Queen are entitled, as a matter of fairness and justice, to the advantages of the University, unless some danger accrues to some important part of the Constitution by their admission, and the onus is on you who exclude them.

There are a set of loyal well-affected subjects—here is a national institution; show me by some strong and conclusive proof why they are not to belong to it, or at once suffer them to enter. Again, we contended, and I think we showed, that no danger was reasonably to be apprehended from the admission of Nonconformists to any interest or any institution which this House is bound to consider or to protect. On the contrary, great advantages, in many ways, are likely to follow from this admission. Nonconformists will be benefited by a familiarity with the beauties and noble associations of the University, and by the high intellectual training which they will receive in a place speaking to the mind no less than to the eye. The University will be benefited not only by the new class of minds who will come to it, but by the wider sympathy with the national mind which will follow from this measure, and the broader foundations on which in consequence it will stand in the heart and affections of the people; and the Church will be benefited by the free discussion and healthy rivalry with the best men and most cultivated minds of other communions which may be anticipated as a probable result. On this last point only I desire to add a word, for on such a subject as this the opinions of the humblest Member of the House should not be left doubtful if he has the opportunity to make them clear. It must be plain, I think, to any one who studies the signs of the times, and who lives at all amongst educated men, that the Church will be obliged greatly to widen her gates and largely to liberalize her tests if she is in any way to retain within her communion the substantial majority of men of religious feeling and religious thought—unless she can retain them, she will cease in any true sense to be national; and if she ceases to be national, she will soon cease to be established. A repetition of the scandal of the Irish Establishment in England would be simply and wholly unendurable. I know well, indeed, that to the existence of a Church some definite limits of opinion are absolutely necessary, and if the time should ever come for discussing what those limits should be—why, they must be drawn. Now, I am only concerned to say that the liberty I claim for myself it seems fair to grant to others, and that if the Church is to be national she must needs be very comprehensive. Can any fair man doubt that already the Thirty-nine Articles are costing us dear? Does any candid man deny that year by year it is becoming plainer that it will not do much longer to bind the religious thought of the 19th century within the bands of the theological language used in the 16th? I can conceive no greater boon which the University could confer upon the Church than to train and discipline the spirit, whether within the Church or without it, which is to give her greater freedom:—and I could earnestly desire that, like the light which broke from the tomb of Michael Scott over the aisles of Melrose, the lamp of religious liberty might be carefully guarded and regulated in the University and send out its beneficent rays therefrom. Such, in short outline, are the affirmative grounds on which I support this measure. And what are the objections? The only practical and substantial objection put forward last year by the distinguished men on the other side was, the danger to the religious teaching of the University if Dissenters were admitted to the full privileges of membership. It is very difficult to understand or to deal with this objection if we leave the region of theory and descend to facts. A Dissenter may take a B.A. degree, and the religious teaching is safe—nay, he may take a M.A. degree, under the restrictions proposed last year by my hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Heathcote) in his Amendments, and still the religious teaching is safe; but if a single Dissenter enters Convocation as a member, then it seems we are exposed to all these dangers which the acuteness of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire detected, and the more copious eloquence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman who now represents the University (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) described in greater detail. This surely is utterly unreal. It cannot be for such a reason as this that you keep up this little bit of safe intolerance, which wounds and irritates without destroying your opponent; which provokes without defending. I hope I need not say that I disclaim personal offence, and that, being obliged to differ from many with whom I would fain agree, I wish to do so without loss of temper or good feeling. But truth must be told, and surely it is the truth that for years—I had almost said centuries—the prevailing temper of the Governors of Oxford has been steadily set against religious earnestness, from whatever quarter it may come. That allay of dullness which in Fuller's time, as he has told us, was found to sort well with the headship of a College, has naturally enough been constantly opposed to anything like originality, or life, or activity. You may read in Southey's Life of Wesley, or in any other authentic record of the University of those times, how he and his friends were obstructed in their efforts to revive religious life and rekindle devotional feeling. The rougher manners of those times displayed themselves in physical dirt and mud and stones, discharged at the heads of Wesley and his friends as they walked to church; and he was finally, as we know, driven from the University and from the Church of England. A century passed by, and a great man arose in the same University and experienced, allowing for difference of time and difference of manners, substantially the same treatment. There was a man in my time of admirable genius, of rare eloquence, of saintly life, of singular humility and self-denial, who taught us not any peculiar theological dogma, but simple religious truth; whose example kept a lofty standard of practice always before our eyes; who led us by his life and by his teaching to all things "lovely and of good report," to whom many, I am sure, in Church and State owe it, that their sense of responsibility was awakened, and that they are now, in their degree, doing, in some poor and imperfect way, their duty both to God and man. Newman, like Wesley, met with cold aversion and steady discouragement on the part of the authorities; he was pelted, not with stones and mud, but with protests of four Tutors, and changes of the time of college dinners, to prevent young men going to his sermons, and wretched censures by Hebdomadal Boards, at the hands of men whom it would be simple folly to compare with him in any way; and this was at a time when he had no intention of leaving the Church of England, when, indeed, he was as desirous of remaining in her communion as any one of those who thus treated him. Nor was there, as far as I can remember, anything given us in the regular University system to justify this discouragement of irregular excellence. I find no fault with the distinguished men who administered my own College (Balliol) and others with which I was acquainted at that time. They did as others did, and the effect of the indirect teaching of their high characters upon us I daresay was very good—at least it ought to have been. But I do say, that to speak of the Oxford system having been founded on religious influences, or guided by personal religious teaching in any sense which could be interfered with by the presence of Nonconformists in Convocation, is really to fly in the face of the plainest facts, and to take refuge in the merest theory and imaginative dreaming. We did not escape controversy—what young men of any sincerity and freedom of mind do escape it? And it is by no means an unmixed evil if it be one, at any rate it shows the existence of much care and activity of mind upon serious subjects. And to suppose, that by excluding Nonconformists you can banish controversy, or that by including them you will weaken religious teaching, I should call, but for my respect for those who maintain it, one of the idlest dreams that ever flitted across the brains of clever men. But as things are you may have Dissenters in positions from which, if from any positions, this very danger you are so afraid of may be apprehended. I have a letter here from a distinguished tutor of a distinguished college, parts of which I will take the liberty to read to the House in support of what I say, and as stating the facts much better than I could state them—

"1. Any Nonconformist may statutably be Public Examiner in any school whatever, even in those in which Divinity (and even the Articles) enter into the Examination. For the statutable qualification for an Examiner is that he shall be M.A., B.C.L., or B.M.; and a Nonconformist may be a B.C.L. Indeed, at the present moment a B.C.L., who has never signed the Articles, is Public Examiner in the School of Law and History. It is true that Divinity does not enter into that School, but there would be no statutable bar to his appointment to the School of Literæ Humaniores, in which Divinity does form part of the Examination. The real security for the appointment of Examiners is, that after being nominated by the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors they must be approved by Convocation, and this would be unaltered by your Bill, except so far as Nonconformists might acquire any influence in that great body. 2. Any Nonconformists can at present teach any subject as a private tutor. I remember that Lord Cranbourne in a former debate expressed alarm lest moral philosophy should come to be taught by a Nonconformist; but certainly a few years ago one of the most celebrated resident private tutors in that subject was a Nonconformist. 3. Persons who have never signed the Articles might be at present College lecturers on any subject whatever, if the authorities of the College chose to appoint them, and many College lecturers at present are only Bachelors of Arts; though I do not know that any are at present actually pre-fessed Nonconformists, and perhaps the Act of Uniformity would prevent their being so. 4. The office of College tutor need not, to the best of my belief, be held by an M.A. The statute says that he shall be 'in aliqua facultate graduatus,' and goes on also to require that he shall be 'religione secundum doctrinam et ritum Ecclesie Anglicane sincerus,' and vests the appointment in the head of the College, with appeal in case of dispute to the Vice Chancellor. So that whatever securities at present exist to make College tutors members of the Church of England seem to be unconnected with subscription to the Articles. Several Bachelors of Arts are at present College tutors if the Oxford Calendar may be trusted. 5. Some Professorships appear to be tenable without any necessity for the Professor to be a member of Convocation. Sir B. Brodie held the Aldrichian Professorship of Chymistry for some years as a B.A. before he proceeded to the degree of M.A., and he need not have gone on to M.A. at all if he had been content to remain without a vote in Convocation. I do not speak of any other ways in which Professors are bound, as, for instance, by the Act of Uniformity, as these would, I presume, be unaltered by your Bill. There is also a clause in the statute—'Quod nullus professor vel prælector publicus quicquam directe vel indirecte doceat, vel dogmaticè asserat, quod fidei catholice vel bonis moribus ullà ex parte adversetur.' This statute no doubt is rusty, and would be difficult to work, but such as it is, it would be unaffected by your Bill. I do not know how many Professors there are who need not at present be Masters of Arts. The chief practical security is no doubt afforded by the mode of election, which, except in case of the Regius chairs, is by Convocation or a board of some sort. In most of the boards theological influences are at least sufficiently represented."

It seems, therefore, that either these Nonconformists are there already, and do no harm, or that if they do come they will do great good. I have now only one word to say as to the shape which the Bill assumes. It was exactly the same as the Bill of last year—and for one plain reason, which I hope hon. Gentlemen will thoroughly appreciate; it aims at a simple definite issue, and is not intended to deal with any questions that might arise collaterally about schoolmasters, fellowships, or such matters. If there be any provision in the Bill which goes beyond the simple object which I intend, if my hon. Friend will point it out I shall be perfectly willing to have it altered. On the last occasion on which this question formed the subject of debate the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) found fault with the Bill for its smallness and shortcomings. I am ready to admit the Bill is a small one, and only deals with one definite point; nor do I expect if it were to pass that any great and important changes would take place in consequence. But, on the other hand, I should not be dealing candidly with the House if I disguised from it that the Bill put forward a very important principle. It will establish the nationality of the University as against the Church of England—it will destroy its exclusive character and change its constitution. I have been informed that it is not the intention of hon. Gentlemen opposite to go to a division on this stage of the Bill. I wish it were also true of other stages; because, though I have not the slightest doubt as to the result, I would far rather that the Bill should be successful without a struggle than after one; because I have no wish to win a victory over men whom I respect in a cause which is as much their cause as my own. I wish hon. Gentlemen would see how easily they may create those very evils which they fear, and which would have no existence but for their own obstinate resistance. I wish them to reflect before too late what a difference there is between a friendly settlement and a hostile victory, between a generous and manly yielding to a just and righteous claim, and a hardwung, sullen and angry acquiescence in an extorted right. You must know that you cannot prevent this change; why, then, make it, against the will of those who support it, the occasion of a party triumph?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Coleridge.)

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE said, that as far as he was concerned no opposition would be offered to the second reading of the Bill. Last Session he endeavoured, in Committee, to insert Amendments obviating the objections to which it was open, but the hon. and learned Gentleman offered a successful opposition to them. Amendments would again be brought forward at the same stage, and he believed it would be proposed to extend the operation of the Bill to Cambridge. Notice had also been given by the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie) of a measure bearing on another part of the same question, but he did not think it expedient at the present stage to trouble the House with any observations on the subject.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday, 10th April.

QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he had received any intelligence from Ireland?

THE EARL OF DERBY: Nothing as to the state of Ireland has been received, except what has been given in the papers. In the course of the day we received this telegram, dated 11.45 a.m.—

“Railway line open to Cork; thirteen prisoners brought into Limerick from Kilmallock; some wounded; three shot dead. No event of any importance is reported as having occurred last night. Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and Waterford quiet.”

On my way down to the House I called at the Home Office, and found that this telegram had been received, dated 3.45 p.m.—

“Telegraph reports have come in from all parts of Ireland. No event of any importance took place last night. Fugitives heard of in many districts. Police and military in active pursuit. Numbers of abandoned arms have been taken. No considerable body of insurgents reported as any longer in existence.”

I may add that no additional reinforcements of troops will be required in Ireland.

(The Earl of Derby.)

REPORT.

Amendment reported (according to Order.)

LORD HOUGHTON expressed his regret that the noble Earl at the head of the Government had not taken advantage of the additional opportunity which had been given to him of introducing among the new Commissioners some gentleman eminent for his skill in natural science. He had upon a previous occasion brought this subject before their Lordships, and, although he had not succeeded in attaining his object, yet there was a very strong feeling expressed that it was highly important to have a man of science on the Commission, which would otherwise be deprived of a great deal of the moral influence which it ought to possess. He might remark that our Public Schools were deficient in that practical training which would make a youth not only a gentleman in every sense of the word, but would also enable him to take a fair start in the different professions and walks of actual life.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the question as to the representation of the interests of science on the Commission had been already discussed in that House, and it had not, he thought, been received with very great favour. The Bill was afterwards referred to a Select Committee, when the question was again raised, and did not meet with the slightest encouragement, and the Bill passed in its present form. Since that time, however, two of the gentlemen who had been originally appointed on the Commission had desired that their names might be withdrawn from it, and he had inserted in their place the names of two eminent Members of the House of Commons, in accordance with what he understood to be the general wish of their Lordships.

BILL—(No. 12.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that notice had been given of some Amendments, some of which were formal and others substantial; and he therefore proposed now that the House should go into Committee pro forma, in order that these Amendments, to which he had assented, should be embodied in the measure, and the Bill be re-printed.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he did not consider that there was any reason for the grudging spirit in which some noble Lords had received this Bill; and for himself, he was sincerely grateful to the Government for having introduced the measure, which he thought was a wise one, effecting an important alteration in the existing laws. The Bill was a much more important one than many of their Lordships were aware. He might add that the question to which this Bill referred was one which did not exclusively apply to Scotland, but had its importance and influence in England as well. In England, as well as in Scotland, the landlord had a priority of claim in respect of his rent above all other creditors. The measure of preference in Scotland was different from that in England, and the machinery for giving it effect was different; but the principle was the same; for in both parts of the kingdom the landlord had the same preference over every other creditor. Now, recently the question had been raised in Scotland, whether it was wise and just that the landlord should have any preference; and the argument in the negative was maintained, on the one hand, on the ground of general principles, and on the other, on the ground of expediency. On the first ground, it was argued that there was no reason in the nature of things why landlords should have a preference, and especially now, when the industry of agriculture was becoming so much commercial, and when large sums of money were expended on manures and seeds. It had been contended that the claims of the manure merchant and seed merchant ought to run pari passu with those of the landlord, as regards the power given by law to assert their respective claims over the produce of the soil. Then again, with regard to the argument founded upon expediency, it had been maintained that the preference given to the landlord resulted in this—that the landlord was less careful and less anxious than he ought to be with respect to the character and the capital of the tenants to whom he let his lands; and it had been argued that it might be as expedient for the landlord himself that there should be no priority of claim given to the latter, but that he should be left to trust to his own inquiries as to the character and capital of those whom he was about to take as tenants. Now, although he (the Duke of Argyll) was open to conviction on this question, he must confess that he thought, in point of abstract principle, there did exist some reasons why the landlord should have a certain priority of claim upon the produce of the tenant's land over other creditors. In the first place, the rent was itself simply a specified part of the produce, and, in point of strict argument, that portion of the produce was not at any time the property of the tenant at all. Originally, almost all rents were paid in kind; and in some parts of Scotland, and also in certain districts of England, the rent was still stipulated for partly in kind, the conversion of it into corresponding money values being a mere matter of convenience. Now, supposing the rent to be stipulated to be paid in kind, and to be deliverable to the landlord, that stipulated amount of the produce would belong to the landlord as his property, and never, under any circumstances, would be the property of the tenants. But the more important argument on behalf of the total abolition of the law of hypothec and distraint seemed to be in the advantage which the abolition of the law would give to the larger class of tenantry both in England and Scotland. The agitation in favour of the abolition of this law was mainly got up and carried on by tenants of large capital. This class of tenants had not at all concealed their opinions on the subject before the Royal Commission, for they had stated distinctly that their desire and conviction was that the abolition of the law of hypothec would act severally against the smaller class of tenants. They said that the rent of land was at present unnaturally high on account of the great competition for land, owing to the number of small tenants seeking farms in the market. They said there were always a large number of persons ready to bid for land in the market, although they had no capital, and were not of the highest character; and they said that this right of priority of claim in the landlord induced him to accept the highest offer, without due inquiry into character and capital. He (the Duke of Argyll) was not quite sure the effect would be to the extent that was supposed; but if the change was to be made immediately and suddenly it would have a most disastrous effect on a large and deserving class of men in Scotland. The West of Scotland was farmed by small holders, with little more capital, in many instances, than was just sufficient to stock the land. They were the most important link between the labourers and the large capitalists who held the large farms, and they were generally men who might be described as working men, and their daughters and sons were also engaged in the work of the farm. He was therefore against the total abolition of the priority of claim on the part of the landlord, both on abstract principles and as regarded expediency. The law of hypothec was based on the old Roman law, and carried the power of the landlord to great excess in Scotland. It was an important amendment of the law that was now proposed, and he hoped it would receive the sanction of both Houses of Parliament. He asked the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to consider whether the priority of claim had better not be extended to three months after the first year's rent, and not three months after the half-year, as proposed in the Bill.

THE DUKE OF MONTROSE said, the 4th clause, which limited the landlord's priority to three months after the rent was payable, would lead to the very state of things which the noble Duke deprecated—namely, the displacement of a large number of small tenants. He asked the noble and learned Lord who had charge of the Bill to consider whether it would not be better to fix the limitation to a period of three months after a year's rent had become due?

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, he had not intended to take any part in the debate on this Bill; but from what he had heard, he had no doubt that the Bill, if passed, would have a great effect on the rights of the landlords in other parts of the country. Even with the best tenants the rent was hardly ever paid exactly at the end of the half-year, and frequently they were two or three months or sometimes more in arrear. If therefore they took away the right of distress within three months after the half-year's rent became due, it would disturb the whole of the existing arrangements of the country. Hundreds and thousands of tenants would be in arms and declare that a new tenancy had been created; for the landlords would in consequence be necessarily driven to distrain at the end of every half-year. It is not the custom of English landlords to distrain—a distress is a rare occurrence; but the power is important, and enables the landlord to give more indulgence than he might otherwise think it prudent to do.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought those matters could be better considered in Committee, and he would defer what he had to say until then.

Bill reported, without Amendment; Amendments made; House to be again in Committee on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed as amended (No. 33.)

TRADES UNIONS BILL—(No. 31.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, their Lordships would probably remember that in October last a trade outrage was committed in Sheffield, whereby it was attempted to blow up a house and its inmates, and although large rewards had been offered for the apprehension of the perpetrators, they had not been discovered. Mr. Roebuck and Mr. Hadfield, the representatives of the borough, in consequence of that outrage, waited upon the Home Secretary, and having pointed out to him that within the last twenty years there had been some 200 outrages committed, represented that special powers of inquiry would be needed to discover the instigators of these outrages. A deputation, also headed by Mr. Roebuck, waited upon Mr. Walpole to disclaim, on the part of the Sheffield operatives, all connection with these outrages, and to urge that special powers of inquiry should be granted. He could not do better than read the remarks made by Mr. Roebuck on that occasion. Mr. Roebuck, addressing Mr. Walpole, said—

“ They believe that a full inquiry will prove that trades unions have been and are of great benefit to the working classes, and through them to the country at large; that they are wholly innocent of any such foul proceedings as are laid to their charge; that their conduct has been wise and just to their employers as well as themselves; and that the more searching is the inquiry the more patent and obvious will appear the wisdom of those who have directed the proceedings of these unions, and the immense advantage to trade and the country at large from their existence. Such being their firm conviction, they earnestly pray you to accede to their request, and that you will move the House of Commons to pass a law creating a Commission with ample powers to make all requisite inquiries into this most momentous subject, and that you will support such Motion with all the powers of this Government."

Having complied with the requests addressed to him, Mr. Walpole thought the opportunity a very favourable one for inquiring into the whole subject of trades unions, what good points there might be in their constitution and what bad ones, what defects existed in the law regarding such associations, and how those defects might best be remedied. The result was the appointment of a Royal Commission, and this Bill had been introduced to confer on the Commission the special powers necessary for effectually conducting that portion of their inquiries relating to the outrages at Sheffield. The preamble of the Bill recited the terms of the Commission, the scope of which was very wide. It was—

"To inquire into and report on the Organization and Rules of Trades Unions and other Associations, whether of Workmen or Employers, and to inquire into and report on the Effect produced by such Trades Unions and Associations on the Workmen and Employers respectively, and on the Relations between Workmen and Employers, and on the Trade and Industry of the Country, with Power to investigate any recent Acts of Intimidation, Outrage, or Wrong alleged to have been promoted, encouraged, or connived at by such Trades Unions or other Associations, and also to suggest any Improvements to be made in the Law with respect to the Matters aforesaid, or with respect to the Relations between Workmen and their Employers for the mutual Benefit of both Parties."

A great outrage had recently been committed at Sheffield, which it was very desirable should be fully investigated. The 2nd clause of the Bill limited the inquiry of the Commission into any acts of intimidation, outrage, or wrong alleged to have been promoted, encouraged, or connived at by trades unions or other associations to the town of Sheffield and its neighbourhood; and to the last ten years, unless the Secretary of State should otherwise determine. The 4th clause gave power to the Commissioners to delegate all or any part of such an inquiry to one or more special examiners. But the most important clause was the fifth, which proposed to indemnify the witnesses against any proceeding for the evidence which they gave in the matter in question. The clause as originally drawn was objected to in the other House of Parliament, on the ground that without such indemnity the truth could not be arrived at, as it was alleged that the actual perpetrator was not really the most guilty person—that these outrages were planned by other persons behind the scenes; and therefore the Secretary of State agreed to the alteration of the clause to its present form. In conclusion, he could only say that he hoped that out of evil would come good, and that the result of the labours of this Commission would be that both employers and workmen would see that their true interests are not adverse but identical; that they would always remember that as they are fellow citizens of one country, and subjects of one sovereign, so are they members of one body politic, and always bear in mind this great truth, that whatever is injurious, or causes suffering to one member of a body, must, of necessity, cause suffering to all the others.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Belmore.)

LORD CRANWORTH said, he did not rise to oppose the second reading of the Bill, which, nevertheless, he thought demanded the utmost consideration, inasmuch as it involved principles of the deepest importance and interest. This Bill related to two distinct matters—the one, an inquiry into the trades unions, with the view of ascertaining whether their general policy was hurtful or advantageous to the country at large. But the second object had little or no connection with that question—it was to facilitate an inquiry into the outrages which had taken place within the last ten years at Sheffield. No one could object to the issue of a Royal Commission to inquire into the first matter; but he much doubted the policy of issuing a Commission, even under the sanction of Parliament, to inquire into outrages of that sort, which ought, in his opinion, to be met by the strong arm of the law in the ordinary way. If such a measure were to be adopted, it ought to have safeguards beyond those which were proposed by the Bill, and not to be encumbered with propositions the most startling. He did not, in the first place, like the clause which empowered the Commissioners to commit persons guilty of contempt. A person guilty of contempt in the Superior Courts was liable to be imprisoned for an indefinite period of time, and it was most undesirable that any two persons should have a power to commit against which there could be no appeal. To this clause

he had a strong objection. But the 5th clause was in his mind still more objectionable, inasmuch as it empowered the Commissioners, or such one or more of them as they may appoint to conduct an inquiry and to examine witnesses, to exercise the highest prerogative of the Crown—namely, that of pardoning for the committal of serious offences. That appeared to him to be trenching upon the ordinary policy of the law. But the clause even went beyond that, inasmuch as it authorized those two Commissioners who were appointed to carry out this inquiry to delegate to a third person the power of discharging those duties, armed with the same functions as they themselves possessed. He felt it his duty to call attention to these objectionable provisions, and he trusted before the Bill went into Committee some means would be taken to remedy what he considered to be a great blot in the measure.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, there could be no doubt but that the object of the Bill was of the greatest importance, whether the remedy proposed for the evil in question was right or wrong. It was of the utmost importance that a thorough inquiry should be made into an outrage which had shocked the whole kingdom, and by which an industrious man with his wife and seven children narrowly escaped being killed whilst in their beds. The main object of the Bill was to ascertain who were the original planners of this outrage, who were the men who it was supposed had employed others to commit a crime which they had the wickedness to plan, but lacked the courage themselves to execute. The Government had done everything in their power to bring the guilty parties to justice; but all their efforts had proved ineffectual. Every man in the kingdom, whether he were a master or a member of a trades union, was he was happy to say anxious for any measure by which the Government would be enabled to get at the bottom of these outrages. The noble Earl (the Earl of Belmore) was correct when he said that it was believed that the instigators of this crime were men belonging to a higher class than the wretched creatures who had been the actual perpetrators of the outrage, who had been made use of as tools to wreak the vengeance of those who had influence over them upon the unfortunate man who had so narrowly escaped being killed. Under such circumstances, it would be most desirable to get to the bottom of the matter, so that the real offenders might be discovered and punished. The late Government had done all in their power by offering rewards and a pardon for the discovery of the instigators and the perpetrators of the crime, but their efforts had been without result. Did their Lordships propose to rest content with this want of success, and to let this crime remain unpunished now that this Bill had passed the House of Commons? Let their Lordships suppose the possibility of these outrages being instigated by persons of higher station than those who really committed them, and that the perpetrators were paid for what they did, then they could hardly doubt that if the perpetrators knew they were personally safe, and that they could also obtain a large pecuniary reward, they would volunteer to reveal all that it was desired to know. He quite agreed that the course proposed was an anomalous one; but it was only adopted in order to trace a crime when the ordinary law had failed to enable them to do so. This Bill rested precisely upon the same ground as did the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus in Ireland—an anomalous course was pursued in order to protect all alike from a common danger. The bulk of Irishmen submitted now to all the consequences involved in the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, because they knew that common danger rendered that suspension necessary; and these outrages, in like manner, justified exceptional measures. The case was exceptional, and liberty was not injured, but preserved, by submitting to an exceptional course. They had already heard that the head of the Commission was Sir William Erle, and he must say that in all England they could not find a man upon whom greater reliance could be placed, and there could be no danger of the Commission under his guidance being led to do any unworthy act. It might be true that they wanted to get a man to tell that which would, under ordinary circumstances, bring him to the gallows, by granting him an indemnity, and that they would let off a criminal who ought to suffer the highest penalty of the law; but their object was neither to pardon nor punish that one man; it was to avoid future outrages, to save the lives of those who were exposed to them, and to put an end to the system which led to them. No one would oppose more than himself such a measure for ordinary cases; but there were powerful reasons to justify exceptional legislation in this matter. As to some of the points which had been referred to, perhaps the Bill might require amendment, but that matter could be considered in Committee.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE said, that living near Sheffield, and being chairman of quarter sessions there, he was constantly employed in trying cases of stealing wheelbands, and outrages of a similar nature. Being, therefore, specially familiar with them, he desired to make a few observations. He gathered from the observations of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cranworth), that he did not see any connection between trades unions and these outrages; but he (Lord Wharncliffe) thought that the combination of trades unions and trade outrages in the scope of the Commission's inquiry was fully justified on the ground that these outrages were committed only where the unions exercised great authority, as they did in Sheffield, and from what he knew of Sheffield he was perfectly convinced that these outrages were connected with the trades unions. In saying this, he did not assert that trades unions were bad, or that they were responsible for these outrages; but they occurred only where the unions exercised great influence. The noble and learned Lord seemed to think that there were means under the ordinary law of obtaining the required information; but one of the strongest arguments in favour of exceptional legislation was the fact that the offering a large reward had totally failed to secure the slightest information, and a Royal Commission seemed to be the only machinery by which the truth could be arrived at. When the recent outrage was committed he (Lord Wharncliffe) had a conference with the leading men in Sheffield as to the course it was most desirable to pursue; they were strongly in favour of a Commission, and he accompanied a deputation to Mr. Walpole, to whom they announced that the case was one requiring the adoption of special means to arrive at the truth. He must, therefore, congratulate the Government upon having brought in this Bill, though he thought that some of the clauses might be beneficially amended in Committee. For instance, it was provided, as he understood, that the inquiry should be limited to the five years previous to this year. Now, with regard to that clause, he had received strong representations from persons of high authority in the town of Sheffield, who stated that such a limitation would render the inquiry of very little use. An outrage of the kind referred to was committed nearly ten years ago at Sheffield, and a man was tried at York on a charge of having been concerned in it. Now, that case could not be investigated if the period were limited to five years, and he therefore hoped Her Majesty's Government would extend it to ten years. Then, again, in his opinion, the Commissioners who were sent to Sheffield ought to be numerous and influential, for if the best men were not sent, he was sure the investigation would not be operative or satisfactory. By the 5th clause he noticed it was made compulsory that any witness giving evidence shall receive an indemnity. He was of opinion, however, that the granting of that indemnity should be optional and not compulsory.

THE EARL OF DERBY interposed and said, he believed the clause in this Bill was the same as that in respect to the somewhat analagous case of Commissions to inquire into bribery at elections. The provision was that if, in the opinion of the Commissioners, any person had made a full and complete disclosure of all matters within his knowledge he was to receive a certificate indemnifying him against the consequences. Of course, if the Commissioners did not think the disclosure a full and complete one, the certificate would be withheld. The inquiry was limited to ten years and not to five as the noble Lord supposed.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE expressed himself satisfied with the explanation of the noble Earl, after which it would be unnecessary to make any further remarks on the subject. He had, as he resided in the neighbourhood and had a great deal to do with the public and judicial business of Sheffield, thought it his duty to offer these observations to the House.

LORD HOUGHTON desired to bring before their Lordships' attention one point. The trades unions thought that if the indemnity were given in the way proposed, any man, capable of committing this outrage, would also be capable of coming forward and giving false evidence about it, and that the character of the testimony given would therefore be worthless. He also hoped that it would not be assumed, as the noble Lord who had just sat down seemed to assume, that trades unions were in any way connected with these outrages. At the conference now being held by trades union delegates they most strongly protested against this assumption, and they said that if that assumption were proceeded upon it would have an influence upon the effect of the Commission. It was quite clear that such was the effect upon his noble Friend's mind; for he took this Bill to be an expression of that opinion, and to be framed for the purpose of connecting these outrages with trades unions. If this outrage were a perfectly independent act, and the trades unions had nothing to do with it any more than any of their Lordships had, surely it was unfair to appoint a Commission nominally and apparently to ascertain the connection between these associations and the outrages in question, whilst the effect of the inquiry in such a manner must seriously prejudice them in the opinion of the public. It would be for their Lordships to consider in Committee whether they should give an indemnity to persons who might come forward to give evidence against these organizations solely with a view of damaging them. He thought it might be well to consider whether, upon this point, they would be in danger of prejudicing the whole of the inquiry. They wished to approach this question without imputing to trades unions any connection with these outrages; but if they retained the clause in its present shape they would in some degree appear to implicate them.

EARL GRANVILLE felt that the discussion that had taken place very much confirmed him in his opinion that a great mistake had been committed in blending in this Commission two things which, as the noble and learned Lord (Lord Cranworth) said, were perfectly different objects, though that view was somewhat controverted by the noble Baron opposite (Lord Wharncliffe). For his part he agreed entirely with his noble Friend who had just sat down, that the construction given by the noble Baron mixed up the two questions together even more invidiously than before; for the noble Baron considered that the outrages which took place at Sheffield and in other parts of the country were so intimately blended with the trades unions that it would be impossible to separate the two subjects.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE: Not in any other part of the country; he only referred to Sheffield.

EARL GRANVILLE thought that the noble Lord would remember that he said that it was only in parts of the country where trades unions existed that these outrages occurred; but, of course, he must be content with the noble Lord's contradiction. In his opinion, this was a most unfortunate position which they had to deal with. After all, there was good cause for inquiring into the circumstances of trades unions, who had a practical grievance of which to complain, and certainly he was not influenced by any personal prejudice in their favour, because they had cost him a great deal of money in the course of his life. They, however, had a claim for inquiry into that state of the law, which prevented them having any redress against any of their own officers, who embezzled their funds. He thought that it would be unfair to connect in the inquiry the trades unions with the outrages. He thought much evidence was likely to be obtained by the Commissioners which would be of much use in enlightening both the masters and the men in respect of their dealings among themselves. But the outrages committed in Sheffield were a completely different subject; and he confessed he did not look forward to such important evidence in that branch of the inquiry. The noble Lord (Lord Wharncliffe) had told them that in one outrage case a professional gentleman had allowed himself to be committed to prison rather than give evidence in a Court of Law. Now, he should like to know how the Commissioners were expected to succeed when the ordinary Courts of Law had signally failed. And it was to be remembered that, even if they do not succeed, an indemnity was to be given to all witnesses. Considering the very creditable feeling that had been exhibited in the matter by the operatives of Sheffield, he regretted that two subjects so very dissimilar should have been confounded together in the Commission. He admitted in that the subject was a difficult one; but he hoped the Government would give it some further consideration with the view of meeting the difficulties to which he had referred.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reference to the objections urged against the mixing up of the two inquiries, begged to remind their Lordships that the question before them was not whether a Commission should issue. The Commission had already issued, and the question was, whether Parliament should give the Commissioners certain powers to enable them to discharge the duty intrusted to them under the Commission. The noble Earl (Earl Granville) had objected to the mixing of the two inquiries, observing that it was unjust to the trades unions to have their general organization and the Sheffield outrages inquired into by the same Commission. But was the noble Earl aware that the trades unions themselves had particularly solicited that there might be inquiry into the Sheffield outrages in order that they might be afforded an opportunity of showing they had had no connection with those outrages? The subjects would appear, perhaps, at first sight to be not connected with each other; but, after such a request from the trades unions, there could be no offence in combining them. With his noble and learned Friend (Lord Cranworth), he admitted it would be desirable to leave such offences as the Sheffield outrages to the ordinary course of law; but if, as appeared to be the case, there was no chance of getting at the facts by that means, would it not be well to elicit them by means of an inquiry by Commissioners? As to the objection that the Commissioners ought not to have the power of committing for contempt, he would ask his noble and learned Friend how were they to deal with witnesses refusing to answer questions if that power were not given to them? There would, perhaps, be some difficulty with regard to the clause which enabled the Commissioners to delegate their powers to other persons. With respect to the indemnity, that was usual in the case of Parliamentary inquiries; and in a case like this they could not hope to get at the truth unless they protected witnesses against any prosecution for offences in which they might admit they had been concerned. In reply to the objection that this was a sort of invitation to wicked persons to come forward and give evidence against trades unions, he must observe that it would be impossible to protect themselves in every way against wicked persons; but there was a clause in the Bill making witnesses, who told falsehoods to the Commissioners, liable to the penalties for perjury. He had only to add that the Government would be ready to give their best consideration to any suggestions which might be made in Committee.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON observed, that though the trades unions had asked for an inquiry into the Sheffield outrages, they had not asked that it should be made a part of the general inquiry into their own organization. As to witnesses being indemnified in Parliamentary inquiries, it could scarcely be said that bribery, grave offence as it was, equalled in enormity murder or attempt to murder. He doubted whether any precedent could be adduced for giving an indemnity to persons who came forward to accuse themselves of crimes of such a grave description. He earnestly trusted that Her Majesty's Government would re-consider their determination, and would see fit to restore the Bill to the shape in which it had been originally introduced into the House of Commons.

LORD REDESDALE thought that strong reasons had been stated for combining the two inquiries. The trades unions had been induced to come forward and solicit investigation, because, throughout the country, their names were combined with these outrages. How was it possible for the unions to clear their character from suspicion except by showing, before the same tribunal which inquired into the outrages themselves, the true nature of the associations to whose door, rightly or wrongly, the crimes were laid?

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD said, nobody could entertain the slightest doubt of the necessity for inquiry, for it had been demanded both by employers and employed in the town of Sheffield. Great differences of opinion, however, might reasonably exist as to the limits within which such an inquiry ought to be confined. And, as far as his personal feelings were concerned, he should gladly see the Commission relieved from that portion of their duties which consisted of giving an indemnity to persons who came forward to declare themselves the perpetrators of serious crimes. Such a course was unprecedented, and was further objectionable, because persons implicated in the most outrageous offences might, by their testimony, while securing for themselves entire immunity, implicate others, despite the legal maxim that the testimony of an approver should always receive corroboration. The Bill had only been laid upon the table yesterday, and for the important alteration made in "another place" he had been wholly unprepared. He hoped the Government would not unduly press forward the further stages of the measure.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl who had last spoken was himself named as a member of the Commission, and suggested that the Government, before proceeding with the measure in Committee, should take means to ascertain whether other members of the Commission shared the objections expressed by the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD said, that he had only put forward his own individual opinion.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, their Lordships would not be asked to go into Committee upon the Bill before that day week.

ADMISSION OF ENGLISH SALT INTO FRANCE.—QUESTION.

MR. TOLLEMACHE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any reason has been assigned by the French Government for the delay that has taken place in making arrangements for the admission of English manufactured Salt into France, which subject has been under negotiation during the last six years?

Earl Granville

LORD STANLEY: I made inquiry, Sir, into this subject late in the autumn, and I then ascertained that the French Government had appointed a Commission to examine the question of the Salt Duties in that country. It was then expected that the work of that Commission would be ended very quickly; but it has since been intimated that the Report of the Commission, when issued, would have to be submitted to the Chamber of Commerce, Agriculture, and Industry before any steps could be taken upon it. I have written again on the subject within the last few days, but as yet have received no reply. When the Report is received, as I hope it will speedily be, it will be communicated to the parties interested.

STATUES OF THE PLANTAGENETS AT FONTEVRAULT.—QUESTION.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If any recent communications have taken place between the English and French Governments as to the removal of the Statues of the Plantagenet Kings Henry II. and Richard Cœur de Lion of England, Eleanor of Guienne and Isabel of Angoulême, from the Chapel of Fontevrault, Anjou, to this Country; and, if the Statues are properly taken care of in the Chapel of Fontevrault? In order to make his Question more intelligible, he would beg to read a paragraph which appeared in The Times of the 22nd ultimo, and which was as follows:—

“M. Beulé, of the Institute, has written to the Débats a letter on behalf of the Scientific and Artistical Society of Angers, to protest against the contemplated delivery to the English Government of the Statues of the Plantagenets in the chapel of the prison at Fontevrault. He relates that on the 8th instant an agent of the French Government arrived there to remove the four statues of Henry II. and Richard Cœur de Lion of England, Eleanor of Guienne, and Isabel of Angoulême. The Director of the establishment, however, affirming that the order presented was informal, refused to deliver up the relics. The writer states that the agitation throughout the ancient province is intense, and that the Prefect, the Bishop, the Mayors of towns, and several learned bodies, have forwarded petitions to the Emperor against the proposed removal; he also declares that the Statues belong not only to Anjou, but to the whole of France, and should not be given up to England without a Bill passed by the Legislative body. M. Beulé adds that applications from the English Government were refused by the Restoration in 1817, and again under Louis Philippe; that Sovereign, he says, removed the relics to Versailles, and placed them in the National Museum, in order to discourage any ideas on the part of England of obtaining them, and it was the President of the Republic who, in 1849, acceded to the earnestly expressed wishes of the people of Anjou, and had the four Sovereigns replaced in the chapel of Fontevault."

LORD STANLEY: Sir, no official communication has passed between the French and English Governments on the subject of the hon. Member's Question; but the House will no doubt remember that last year a good deal of attention was called to the matter, and a very general wish was expressed among persons who interest themselves in matters of that kind that the statues should be removed to this country, with whose history they are intimately connected. I did not think it would be becoming on the part of the British Government to ask for the gift of those statues; but the matter came to the knowledge of the French Government, and the Emperor, with that courtesy which he has invariably shown where this country is concerned, wrote a letter to the Queen offering them as a gift. That offer was accepted and the statues will be removed accordingly. As to what has passed between the French Government and any local authority, I have no information. With regard to the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, I have no official, and, indeed, I may say, no certain information; but a letter written by a private person who saw these statues in 1863 has been brought to my notice, and it states that at that time they were lying in a vault belonging to a building said to be used as a convict prison. Beyond that I know nothing on the subject.

SANITARY STATE OF HOLYHEAD.

QUESTION.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will lay upon the table of the House, Copies of any Report made to the Medical Department of the Privy Council by Dr. Buchanan as to the sanitary state of Holyhead, and any Communication that may have been made by order of the President of the Council to the President of the Poor Law Board on the same subject?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that he had no objection to lay the Report of Dr. Buchanan on the table; but as it would, in the ordinary course of things, appear among the Reports addressed to the Privy Council, the hon. Gentleman would probably not think it necessary to have it printed separately.

PHYSICAL PROPERTIES OF CHOLERINE.—QUESTION.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the statement in the Weekly Report of the Registrar General, November 17th, 1866, that Dr. Frankland had investigated some of the physical properties of Cholera-stuff (Cholerine), is exactly true; and whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any measure tending to obviate the loss, alarm, and injustice consequent on the theory of the infectious nature of certain diseases, when unsupported by demonstration?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that whether the Report in question was scientifically true he could not say; but the Registrar General had informed him that it was a very valuable one, that it had been drawn up by an eminent chemist, and that he considered the publication of it would tend to put the public on their guard, with a view to exercising greater care to destroy what was supposed to increase the number of cholera cases. He was not aware that it was the intention of the Government to introduce any measure on the subject.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he would also beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Medical Officer of the Privy Council (1866), in which he states, pp. 39, 40, the mode in which Cholera-contagium is generated; whether the discoverer has divulged his method of obtaining this deadly agent; and, if not, why not; and, whether the Annual Report of the Medical Officer, which was not accessible to Members till towards the end of July in the last, will be so at an early period of this Session?

MR. CORRY said, in reply, that the opinions expressed in the paragraph referred to by the hon. Gentleman were not the result of any single discovery, but of scientific investigations carried on by many medical men of eminence, almost ever since the first introduction of the cholera into Europe. The Report of the medical officer of the Privy Council was not likely to be ready earlier than last year, as a great deal of extra work had been thrown on the department in the preparation of appendices relating to the outbreak of cholera.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce a measure during the present Session to amend the law relative to the Court of Admiralty in Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MORRIS) replied that the matter was at present under the consideration of the Irish Government.

QUESTION.

MR. LAYARD said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether certain Despatches respecting the policy of Russia in the East, dated the 20th August, 12th September, 27th October, and 23rd November, 1866, and any other Despatches relating to the same subject, addressed by the Russian Government to the Russian Ambassador in London, have been communicated to Her Majesty's Government; and, if so, whether he will lay them upon the table of the House, together with any Correspondence which may have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and that of Russia with regard to them? He wished also to ask the noble Lord whether he is aware that a Despatch has been communicated by the Russian Consul at Belgrade to the Servian Government in the following terms:—

"Russia is in nowise disposed to adjourn indefinitely the solution of the Eastern question. She will no longer entertain any idea of a reconciliation between the Turks and Christians. Let the latter obtain their deliverance by arms if they can. Russia will confine herself to watching that the foreign Powers do not intervene in this war between the Porte and its subjects, and should they interfere she would be forced to undertake the active defence of the Christians. Russia desires Turkey in Europe to be replaced by three Federative States—namely, Servia, Roumania, and Greece, with a central Government at Constantinople."

He would also ask the noble Lord whether, if he has received a Copy of any such Despatch, he will lay it on the table?

LORD STANLEY: With respect, Sir, to the last Question of the hon. Gentleman, I can assure him that I have seen no despatch of the Russian Government that at all corresponds with what he has read, and it is not of a nature that if I had seen I should be likely to forget it. As to the first Question, I may say that none of those despatches have been communicated to me in an official manner, though two of them were placed in my hands confidentially, remaining in my possession only for a short time. Under these circumstances, I cannot undertake to lay them upon the table; and I would add that, in the present state of the whole question to which the inquiry of the hon. Gentleman refers, I do not think it would be for the public service that the Correspondence should be produced.

QUESTION.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that perhaps the Secretary of State for the Home Department would state to the House, What information he had received relative to the Fenian outbreak in Ireland?

MR. WALPOLE: Despatches have been received, Sir, giving a more detailed account of the movement which was announced yesterday by my noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland in the telegram which he then read. I do not, however, know that any particular information is given in them beyond what has appeared in the leading journal of to-day. I may, however, make this remark, that in some of the public journals I regret to find that the facts are rather more highly coloured than is justifiable. The only account which I have received this morning is a telegram, which reads as follows:—

"11.45 a.m.—Railway line open to Cork. Thirteen prisoners brought into Limerick from Kilmallock. Some wounded; three shot dead. No event of any importance is reported as having occurred last night. Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and Waterford quiet."

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.
SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

139,163 Land Forces (including 9,778 all ranks, to be employed with the Depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions).

GENERAL PEEL (SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR): Sir, as it is a matter of public convenience that the number of men required for the army should be voted as early as possible, I shall, before sitting down, and after explaining the causes of the difference between the Estimates of the present and the coming year, conclude by moving the Vote for the Number of Men required. Although the Estimates which are now under consideration exceed those of the present year by no less a sum than £412,200—although they exceed the actual expenditure of 1865-6 by £637,467—although my favourite Estimate of £100 per man falls far short of what is required to cover the expenditure of the next year, for that £100 must be raised to £106—still I trust that, if the House will grant me its attention, I shall be able to show that the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, which stated that the Estimates were “framed with due attention to economy and the requirements of the public service,” was perfectly accurate, and that the excess to which I have alluded has arisen from circumstances over which we have had no control. I was most anxious, naturally, to reduce the Estimates of the forthcoming year as much as possible, in order to meet the extra expenditure which the House will be called upon to sanction in the Supplementary Vote for carrying out the purposes for which the Royal Commission on Recruiting was appointed, including an army of reserve. I will venture to say that no person in my position was ever called upon in time of peace, without any intention of increasing the number of men, to frame the Army Estimates under such disadvantageous circumstances. Those circumstances arose, in the first place, from the necessity of providing for Leap year. That is a perfectly unavoidable circumstance, and that alone gives an increase to the Estimates of £24,700. I then found that my predecessor had granted a warrant, which had been approved by the Treasury, to increase the pay of the medical officers of the army. I highly approve that warrant; but still it adds to the Estimates the sum of £18,000. I also found that the late Government had come to an arrangement to take over the Straits Settlements. Now, this is a new feature altogether in the Estimates, and the whole military expenditure falls, for the first time, upon the Army Estimates of the present year, instead of, as formerly, upon the Indian Government. This entails the necessity of providing garrisons of nearly 1,200 men, consisting of two batteries of artillery, a wing of a European regiment, and eight companies of Ceylon Rifles. It is perfectly true that the Straits Settlements pays a sum of £60,000, but that goes to the Treasury, and this item appears, for the first time, in these Estimates. There is also another alteration made with regard to the troops in Ceylon and Australia. Formerly it was customary to introduce into the Estimates only the absolute pay of the troops in Ceylon—that colony paid the commissariat and barrack expenses; but, in consequence of the new arrangements, made before I came into office, by the payment of a capitation rate which goes direct into the Treasury, all the commissariat and barrack expenses in Ceylon and allowances in Australia are transferred to the Army Estimates, and appear for the first time in those for the forthcoming year. The total cost of the new arrangements with regard to the Straits Settlements, Ceylon, and Australia, is £128,000, to be added to the Estimates we have to provide for. Then comes an increase—at which no hon. Gentleman will feel surprised—the increase owing to the increased price of provisions and forage. That alone adds £92,700 to the sum to be provided for next year. Next comes an item, which I view with great alarm, not so much on account of its magnitude as on its bearing upon the whole Estimates. I allude to the additional sum required for the recruiting of the army during the next year. There will be, during next year, no fewer than 21,300 men entitled to their discharge at the expiration of their ten years' service. This, in addition to the common average requirements of the year, arising from deaths, desertion, and sickness, renders it necessary to provide for 32,600 recruits during the next financial year, against 18,100 during the present year. A great many of the men who are entitled to their discharge will, I hope, re-enlist; but whether they do so or not, the expense is the same, as they are as much entitled to their bounty and their free kit on re-enlistment as if they were entering the army for the first time. There will, therefore, under that head be an additional charge of £69,000. There is next another charge for which I shall have to provide—an item of £79,100 for clothing, on account of biennial and quadrennial charges which fall due within this unfortunate year. This is to provide for certain extra issues of clothing which do not actually take place until the 1st of April, 1868, as they are not due until 1868-9. Their proper place would therefore seem to be in the Estimates for 1868-9, and I think that in future a much better arrangement might be made, and that the expense of these biennial issues, instead of falling upon one year, ought to be divided between two years. Then there is an additional charge of £20,000, on account of furlough pay of officers on leave from India. This is one of those items supposed to be covered by the capitation rate, in accordance with the agreement entered into with the Indian Government. That arrangement, the principle of which I could never understand, was made in 1860. The first year the furlough pay appeared in the Estimates it was fixed at £30,000. It has since risen up to £130,000, and I am obliged this year to take £150,000. For the first three years the Indian Government were, I believe, great losers by the capitation rate; but the state of things has changed, and we may, in framing the present Estimates, I think, calculate on having the loss fall upon us to the extent of £100,000. It has, unfortunately, been decided that any re-adjustment of the matter should be based on the average of five years, so that if that re-adjustment were to take place now we should gain nothing by it. There is another increase in the Estimates for the present year arising out of the increased demand for guns on the part of the navy. The sum provided for that purpose amounts to £675,000, while the sum provided in the Navy Estimates for the army expenditure is only £405,000; so that the army is, under these circumstances, a loser to the extent of £270,000.

I think I have stated sufficient to show the causes of the increase, and I think I am justified in saying that when the accounts come to be made up it will be found that the Estimates for next year form no excess on the expenditure for the present year. I come to that conclusion because we have now, for the first time, the opportunity of comparing the Estimates for the coming year with the actual expenditure of the past. I have always said it was a most fallacious thing to compare Estimates with Estimates; but this year we have the opportunity of comparing next year's Estimates with the absolute expenditure of 1865-6, as well as with the Estimates for 1866-7. Taking the first seven Votes it will be seen that their amount depends entirely on the number of men. The number of men for next year is exactly the same as for this, yet the sum I am obliged to ask for on account of those seven Votes is £402,800 more. The question then arises, which Estimate is right? I would ask you to decide that question by comparing, with the actual expenditure for 1865-6, under the head of those Votes, that of which I estimate the expenditure for the ensuing year. In 1865-6 the total number of men provided for in the Estimates was 143,773; although the number voted was only 142,477. You will perceive that some of the staff, although provided for, were not included in the numbers voted, which I contend they ought to be, and are for next year, as they are subject to the provisions of the Mutiny Act. Well, for the 143,773 men provided for in 1865-6, the estimated cost was £8,141,702, or at the rate of £56 12s. 0d. per man. The absolute number, however, borne during the year fell short of the number provided for by nearly 2,000, and yet the expenditure for the decreased number amounted to £8,440,471, or £300,000 more than had been estimated for the greater number, the cost per man being £59 9s. instead of £56 12s. In the Estimates for the present year the number of men is 139,300, at a cost of £7,864,500, which is at the rate of £56 9s. per man. [Colonel SYKES: Including the first seven Votes?] Yes, including the first seven Votes. So far, I may add, from there being any reason to suppose that we shall have a less number of men during the present year than was estimated, for we find, that at the end of the first nine months, we were absolutely in excess of our establishment to an average extent of 477 men, instead of being 2,000 below it; and if a supplementary Estimate should ever be called for, I must decline to be responsible for it. During the first three months, before the reliefs went out to India, there was an average excess of no less than 2,500; but that has been gradually decreasing, and at the end of the year the numbers will probably correspond. The number of men we ask for for the year 1867-8 is 139,163, and the amount required for that number is £8,267,300, being an average of £59 8s. per man, which almost exactly corresponds with the actual expenditure of 1865-6.

I think I have now said sufficient to account for the apparent excess of the Estimates of next year over those of this, and the Committee will have the means of judging which of them are the more likely to be correct.

When once you have settled the number of men, the only other two Votes which it will be necessary to examine for the purpose of comparison are the 12th and 13th, the Votes for Manufacture and Stores. If you look to the absolute expenditure under those heads for 1865-6, as given in the papers now before you, you will find that the whole difference between the Estimates of that year and the actual expenditure is shown on these two Votes. Of the excess in the proposed expenditure for next year, £611,793 will be a charge for the supply of guns to that greater extent, and it is to this Vote, and the Vote for the Volunteers, that the whole of the excess in these Estimates is to be attributed. The Estimates for 1865-6 amounted to £14,348,447, and there was an excess over that to the extent of £358,765, making in all £14,707,212, or very nearly the amount of the Estimates for next year, had it not been for the two Votes I have pointed out. You can, on referring to page 2 of the papers in the hands of the Committee, learn at once the causes of the decrease and increase of the number of men. If I can show that the number of men asked for is no more than the service requires I think it will not be necessary to defend the first seven Votes. The first cause of increase is the necessity of adding twenty men each to the depôts of the Indian regiments. The Indian depôts constitute one of those sources of expenditure which are supposed to be covered by the capitation grant. It was originally proposed that the depôts should consist of only 100 men per regiment, but that number has not been found sufficient to supply the requirements of a regiment 900 strong in India. The Indian Government object to men whose term of service is nearly expired being sent out, as they would have to pay their expenses back, and the consequence is that sometimes 50 men out of the 100 are only waiting for their discharge, and many recruits are sent out too young. When the capitation rate is considered hereafter, the charges for this addition to the depôts will fall on the Indian Government, and therefore the change may almost be considered a reduction in the army. Another increase is due to the circumstance that we propose to employ a regiment of Native troops to do duty at Hong Kong instead of British soldiers. There are 656 men about to be raised for that purpose, who will, in point of fact, form to that extent a substitute for English troops. I may also observe that 100 men for the Military Staff Corps are, in reality, no increase, because they are only substitutes for labourers. They are men of good character allowed to leave their regiments, receiving an addition to their pay. I believe the plan answers extremely well, and it is proposed slightly to extend it. Thus there is an increase to the army of 1,724 men; which I propose to meet by making a reduction in the establishments of regiments. I know that many military men object to this arrangement, and would much rather see the regiments kept up to their full number, and if I did not meet the inconvenience of having the establishment of regiments at a low amount by the army of reserve which I am about to propose, I should be as much opposed to the reduction as they are. This intention is to reduce the regiments on their return to this country to 600 men for the first and second years, increasing the number to 680 in the year after, and up to the full number when they go on Colonial or Indian service. I have been obliged to raise the establishments of the Indian regiments to their full strength, because the Indian Government complained that the regiments going to India were not kept up to their full quota of 910 men. It had been hoped and believed that when they got out to India men would volunteer from other regiments out there; but this has not been found to be the case, and therefore it is necessary to raise the establishment of the regiments going to India to 910 men, and thus the number of men to be provided for is almost equal to what it has been in the present year.

I now come to Votes 12 and 13, relating to Manufactures and Military Stores. Perhaps the House will like to know what is the number of guns proposed to be provided for the money to be voted on account of the Royal Gun Factory. It is proposed during the next year to provide 426 rifled guns. Of these, 12 are to be of the largest size, or 23-ton guns; 41 are to be 12-ton guns; 31 will be 9-ton guns; 12 will be 7-ton guns; and 179 are to be 6½-ton guns. The rest will be composed of 64-pounders, 9-pounders, 7-pounders, and 6-pounders. The present occasion is almost the first in which provision has been made for supplying guns for the fortifications. It was agreed in 1860 that the armaments for the fortifications were to be provided for in the annual Estimate ; but up to the present year no provision whatever has been made for the purpose, and most fortunate it is that such was the case. If these guns had been made in 1860 the pattern would have been very inferior and the cost would have been treble. Three years ago the cost of the 23-ton gun was £3,500, and it had gradually come down to £1,800 in the present year. Therefore, delaying the manufacture of these guns had caused a great saving of public money. But still, you cannot conceal from yourselves the fact that the work must be done, and if the present Estimates had not been so unnaturally high this year I should have taken a larger Vote for the purpose.

I now come to a matter of great interest to the House—the question of small arms. I know that there have been a great many Reports, and that much anxiety has been felt as to the success of the Snider conversion, and I think it better to begin from the very first with regard to the conversion of the rifles into breech-loaders. So long back as 1864 it was decided by a Committee that the whole British army should be armed with breech-loaders. Soon after that another Committee decided that, instead of the common Enfield rifle, our muskets should be rifled on the Lancaster principle. The consequence was that there was not a single new rifle manufactured for the last three years. It was then decided that, instead of making new rifles, the Enfield rifle should be converted into a breech-loader. Experiments had been going on for two years, and just before I came into office the pattern and ammunition were decided on. The great events on the Continent occurred between that time and my coming into office. I resolved to carry out what had been decided on, and to arm the whole British army with breech-loaders as soon as possible; and I also decided not to re-open the question, but to go on at once converting the guns into Sniders, and I provided for the conversion of 200,000 in the course of the present year. When I proposed a supplementary Estimate the late Chancellor of the Exchequer expressed an opinion that I was too precipitate; but the fact was that when I came into office the entire number of rifles that had been absolutely converted was only twelve, and they had not been converted by machinery, but by hand. Now, there is a great deal of difference between experiments carried on by hand labour under the most favourable circumstances, and those carried on by machinery on an extensive scale. My intention was, as soon as a sufficient number of the converted guns could be procured, to subject them to the only real test—and that was to place them in the hands of the troops. But, unfortunately, just at that time there came from the Governor General of Canada a demand for an instant supply of breech-loading arms. He pointed out the moral effect upon the men coming into contact with troops armed with breech-loaders, and called upon us to supply not only the whole of the British troops in Canada, but the whole of the Volunteers. This was a perfect impossibility at the time, as we did not commence delivering the converted rifles till the middle of October. But so determined was I to prevent the British troops from being brought into collision with troops armed with breech-loaders, while they had only muzzle-loaders, that I sent an order to America, and purchased 4,000 at £6 each. We went on working at the gun factory day and night—and, I am sorry to say, sometimes on Sundays—but we succeeded in sending out converted Sniders to every British soldier in Canada before the navigation closed. Then there came sudden demands for arms from the garrison at Dublin. In the meantime I sent sixty guns to Hythe for trial, and the first report was that the shooting was more than favourable. Shortly afterwards the head of the Laboratory came to me and said he was sorry to inform me that when the ammunition was made up in millions there was a slight escape of gas, which threw up the breech-loading apparatus. We therefore proceeded to try a new or No. 2 cartridge, which was sent down to Hythe and fired with exactly the same rifles which had shot so well in the first instance. The report that came to us was that the cartridges would hardly hit anything, and scarcely ever hit the target at all. If the fault had been in the gun I would have stopped at once the conversion of the Enfield rifle, for my desire was to place the best arm in the hands of the British soldier; but, apparently, this defect was in the cartridge, and I proceeded at once to discover the cause. The Committee must understand that there are two descriptions of rifle—the short and the long rifle. The short rifle is six-grooved, while the long rifle is the common Enfield, with only three-grooves. With the six-grooved rifle the No. 2 cartridges shot beautifully ;

which made it appear that the previous failure had been the fault of the three-groove arm. But it was ultimately discovered that it was in consequence of the ball being a little longer than it had been before, and that by reducing its length it would shoot extremely well. We come back now to the question of the breech-loading rifle. I do not say you will ever attain any great superiority in accuracy of shooting with any breech-loading rifle over the muzzle-loader; the advantage you gain is not in accuracy, but in rapidity of firing. I am happy to say, from the last accounts I have received, that I have not the slightest doubt that in the Enfield rifle converted into the Snider you have as good, if not a better, weapon than any other country possesses. No later than yesterday I received a letter from my noble Friend, Lord Strathnairn, than whom nobody is a better judge, in which he says—

“I had a field day yesterday—all the troops with Sniders. The rapidity and uninterruptedness of the fire were remarkable—not a check. I had to caution them to fire slowly, to prevent running short of cartridges.”

This will, I think, prove to the Committee that we are going in the right direction in converting the Enfield into the Snider breech-loaders for the whole British Army. I do not mean to say there may not be an improvement in the cartridge. There is now provision made in the Estimates for the present and next year for the conversion of 350,000 rifles, and there I would recommend conversion to stop. I should not recommend the conversion of any greater number, for this reason:—These are all new arms, which have never been issued, and are perfectly serviceable weapons. If you convert more they will be arms that have been used, and you will have to pay an additional price to make them serviceable. I think it would be far better to wear out the arms now in the hands of all other than the regular forces, and use up the common Enfield rifles. You will have to begin making a new weapon as soon as you have decided on the pattern. You have not made any new rifles for the last three years, and you will have to begin gradually as soon as you have decided on the pattern. If not, the only store of small arms you would have would be those returned in exchange for converted Enfields. Therefore, you must make up your minds to provide a store of new weapons as soon as you decide on the pattern. These are the causes which have occasioned the large sums asked for under these two heads.

I do not know that there is any other Vote on which I need make any explanation, except the great increase in the Vote for Miscellaneous Services. That arises from the increased attention required by the late Act of Parliament to be given in certain naval and military stations for the prevention of contagious diseases. There is also a sum of £13,000 required for equipping a ship for hospital and sanitary purposes at Hong Kong, which, according to the Report of the Chief Medical Officer, was absolutely necessary, although not solely for hospital purposes. Then there is another Vote of £5,000 to the municipality of Gibraltar in aid of works for drainage; and being as it is for sanitary purposes, I am sure the Committee will give it willingly. There is also a large increase in the amount to be given as rewards to inventors; and I will take this opportunity to relieve the minds of hon. Gentlemen, by saying that it merely provides some reward for those from whom the service has derived very great advantage, and is not for inventors generally. One of those gentlemen is Major Palliser, and the other Mr. Frazer, both of whom have been the means of effecting a very great saving to the Government in the cost of guns and shot. I am certain the House will not refuse to reward those services.

I promised that when I brought forward these Estimates I would give an explanation of what I proposed to do with regard to the Report of the Royal Commission on Recruiting. That Commission was mentioned in the speech of the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington), when he introduced the Estimates on the 5th of March in last year. The necessity for the appointment of a Commission arose from the great difficulty which was experienced in procuring recruits for the army, and, in point of fact, the question then was, and now is, whether the British army should be allowed to collapse—whether it should be reduced to the strength of your recruiting powers, or whether your recruiting powers should be raised to that point which should meet the wants of the Service? Are we to endeavour to raise the recruits we want, or are we to be obliged, not as a matter of policy, but from necessity, to have recourse to that expedient which was proposed by the hon. and gallant Member opposite (Major Anson) of employing Native

instead of British troops abroad? The points submitted to the Commission were the deficiency of troops during the last two years, and the remedies required to obviate that deficiency; and they were also required to Report on the formation of a reserve force, and with regard to the organization of the recruiting service. I will advert very shortly to the recommendations made by the Royal Commissioners. Their first recommendation was with regard to the organization of the recruiting service. They pointed out that the recruiting system was entirely under the Adjutant General, who has so much to do that he cannot give adequate attention to the subject, and they recommended the appointment of an Inspector of Recruiting, who would be able to give his undivided attention to it, and I have carried out their wishes by approving of the appointment of an officer to have entire charge of that service. I do not think it necessary to go into details which will not be settled until that officer, who has been selected with great care and attention, should be able to point out what arrangements would be necessary to improve the recruiting for the army. I am sure it must be some gratification to those who served on the Commission to know that I believe the very fact of the Commission being appointed has had a most salutary effect. I think in October last it first became known that the Commission had made proposals for improving the condition of the British soldier, and from that moment the recruiting improved. The average number of recruits raised during the last five years ending December, 1865, was 12,449. During the twelve months ending December, 1866, we have raised 15,277; in the preceding ten months ending in January we raised 13,193, and if we go on at the same rate for the next two months, we shall have raised 16,119 during the twelve months, instead of 12,449. This is very satisfactory. The quarter ending last December is the first since June, 1862, in which the casualties did not exceed the addition to the army by recruiting. The net increase over the casualties was 388. In the month of January, 1867, we have also progressed, the net increase having been 546. Therefore, we have great reason to hope that an increased number of men are coming forward. The Commissioners made another recommendation, which I strongly and highly approve, and which ought to be carried out as far as possible—it is the recommendation that men should be enlisted for general service instead of for particular regiments—always, of course, giving recruits the selection of regiments for which they may have a preference. The soldier enlisted for general service is a far more useful man than one enlisted for a particular regiment; and this would enable you to prevent men being sent too young to India. Depôts will be formed to receive them; and from them you can select those of a certain age for foreign service, permitting the younger recruits to join those regiments that have just come home. That is one of the recommendations to which I attach very great importance. There are recommendations respecting the system of medical examination which are under consideration, and will, I have no doubt, be carried out. There is a recommendation as to a military training establishment for boys, similar to the training ships for the navy; which, I have no doubt, is very desirable; but I am sorry to say it was a question of money. Besides the expense of buildings and establishments, the average cost for each boy would be £30 a year, which would amount to a large sum. I do not therefore propose to adopt that recommendation. Then comes the recommendation about localizing the regiments. But a connection cannot be forced between a regiment and any particular locality—that must spring up of itself. I may mention as an instance of this that, although the Bedfordshire regiment and the Bedfordshire militia, which is so ably commanded by my hon. Friend behind me (Colonel Gilpin), were at Aldershot for some time together, only one man volunteered from the militia into that regiment during the Crimean war, although a number equal to the whole strength of the regiment volunteered into other regiments. Therefore, I repeat that a connection of that kind must be spontaneous, and cannot be forced. Now I come to the chief recommendations of the Commission, and the expenses which they will entail. The recommendation to increase the reward on enlistment will cost £7,000, and is to be carried out. The Commission recommend that certain articles of clothing which are at present supplied by the soldiers at their own expense, and termed “necessaries,” should be provided from the public funds. It was my duty to call for an estimate of the expense that would be entailed by each recommendation, and I found that the expense of this one would amount to £80,000 a year. Another recommendation was that the soldiers at home should receive an additional quarter of a pound of meat a day; but I cannot help thinking that if that addition be made to the allowance of the soldier at home, it must also be extended to the soldier on foreign service. I did not see how I could come down to this House and propose the increase to the soldiers at home without also proposing that it should be extended to the soldiers who are actually performing military duty abroad. It is perfectly true that the soldier abroad is at present allowed 1 lb. of meat per day, but the allowance is made on the ground that 1 lb. of meat abroad is only equal to three quarters of a pound at home; and if you give the soldier at home 1 lb. a day you must give the soldier abroad $1\frac{1}{4}$ lb. a day. With reference to this point, Sir William Power, the Commissary General, who is an excellent authority, expressed his belief that any increase in the meat ration would be the least effectual and at the same time the most costly mode of improving the soldier's condition, and would by no means be as acceptable as an increase of 1d. or 2d. a day. I decided, therefore, instead of these allowances of meat and clothing, to propose an addition of 2d. a day to the pay of the soldier. I am perfectly certain that such an increase will be a greater boon to the soldier than the allowances of meat and clothing would be, especially to the married soldiers, and to those, and I am glad to be able to state that there are many such, who are desirous of laying by a part of their money in the regimental savings banks. Another consideration is that such a course will meet a difficulty which could not have come before the Royal Commissioners, and, indeed, would hardly have been noticed by them. The British soldiers serving with Indian troops, as in China, formerly received an additional 2d. a day. When, however, the Native soldiers were withdrawn and this extra payment was considered, it was determined not to withdraw it from the troops already in China, who, having been in the habit of receiving it, might consider the withdrawal a great hardship, but to make no increase in the pay of regiments who might be afterwards sent to that country; and consequently a difference exists in the pay of soldiers engaged on the same service, which will be got rid of by the adoption of this plan, and giving all the troops an extra

2d. a day. I am perfectly certain every military man will be of opinion that, both as regards the interest of the soldier and the interest of the public, this increase of 2d. a day is preferable to the allowance of meat and clothing, the cost of which would be £80,000 for clothing, £200,000 for $\frac{1}{4}$ lb. of meat to troops at home, and £115,000 to troops abroad, making £395,000. This additional sum of 2d. a day will involve an additional expenditure of £376,000. Now, the Commissioners recommend that 2d. a day should be given to those who re-engage over and above the then amount of his pay; but I think that an increase of 1d. a day in that direction will be sufficient; that is to say, the long-service man will receive an addition of 3d. a day to his present pay. But, after all, the best inducement that can be held out to him to re-enlist is good treatment during the first period of his service, and an additional 2d. a day during this first enlistment, with an increase of 1d. a day afterwards, will, I think, be sufficient to induce him to re-enlist. The Commission again recommend, with regard to the limited period of enlistment, that there should not, as heretofore, be any difference between the cavalry, artillery, and the line, but that all shall be placed upon the same footing, the first term of service being for twelve years, and the second (if a man chooses to re-engage) for nine years, making altogether twenty-one years, which entitles a man to a pension. The proposition is a wise one, but it will require an Act of Parliament. Then it is recommended that the price of discharges by purchase should be higher than it is now, on account of the increase in the rate of wages. That recommendation certainly does appear as if it intended to point out to the soldier that he had made a bad bargain in enlisting at all; but I shall deal with that point more particularly when I come to the army of reserve. Many people attach more importance to the rate of pensions of the soldier than to the rate of pay. The question with me, however, was how can I lay out the money at my disposal to the best advantage in getting recruits and attracting men to the service? I believe that this result is likely to be better attained by the daily increase of 2d., and the further increase of 1d. a day afterwards, than by an increase in the rate of pensions. [Mr. O'REILLY: Will the 2d. or 3d. a day be carried to the pensions as an increase?] No. It is also proposed to let the soldiers, as far as possible, repair their own barrack damages—a plan by which a great source of annoyance and complaint will be removed. The recommendation with regard to re-engaging men when under orders for foreign service is also provided for by the Estimates which I have laid upon the table of the House. It is, no doubt, a matter of great economy to get the men who are abroad to re-enlist, instead of sending them home to this country. The amount of bounty to be given to men re-enlisting in India, however, is a question for the Indian Government to deal with.

I now come to the reserve force, and the recommendations of the Commissioners with regard to them. The Commissioners state, with great truth, that our real army of reserve is the militia, and that it is in that quarter that we shall eventually have to look for our reserve; and they consider it advisable to raise the militia to its full number—that is to say, to 120,000 men. With regard to the sums provided in the Supplementary Estimates, there is one great advantage—every shilling goes directly into the pocket of the soldier. There are no establishments, no clerks, nothing to intercept it. But, notwithstanding this additional cost of £450,000, it is not proposed to add a single man to your army, but merely to enable you to raise the men that you now want. The question, therefore, is, how are you to form an army of reserve which, if war should become imminent, you might combine with the regular army? Recollect, there are wars of two descriptions in which England may be engaged. She may be engaged in a war with a Power from which there is little or no chance of invasion. Such were the wars within my recollection—the war in the Crimea, the Indian Mutiny, and others in which you have been obliged to employ your regular army abroad, and for which you had the greatest difficulty in raising the numbers necessary for your purpose. Everybody recollects what took place in the Crimean War. You had to appeal to the militia to give up every man they could spare, and to raise recruits by means of an extraordinary bounty; and what was the result? Why, the men you raised were by no means so efficient as they should have been. Now, we want a reserve of two kinds—a first and second reserve. We want men who would be ready, at a moment's warning, to fill up the ranks of your regular regiments; I have proposed to reduce the strength of the regiments serving at home as low as 600 men; and if you have a proper reserve, should war threaten to break out, you could at once fill up the ranks to 1,000, and you would not require additional officers, as these are all there already. In the first reserve the condition of service would be that the men should serve abroad; the men of the second reserve would not be called upon to leave the country. Now, how are we to raise this army of reserve? You relied for its formation for the last six years on men who had completed their term of service. That system was pronounced by the Royal Commission to be a perfect failure, and the Royal Commission never came to a more correct conclusion. The first thing I did upon entering office was to suspend the operation of the warrants. It has been suggested that you should attempt to form an army of reserve by making service in the reserve a portion of the original contract of the soldier—that is to say, by making it a condition of enlistment that the men should serve so many years in the regular army and so many in the army of reserve. But I do not think that would answer—for this reason, that when a man, having served in the line, came then to serve in the reserve, he would not be able to live unless he had some employment or you gave him high pay; and when you wanted him perhaps you would not know where to find him. I think, therefore, that instead of making the time to be spent in the reserve a portion of the original service, it should be made a substitution for a portion of that service. The way I would deal with it is this:—When a regiment had completed its period of foreign service and returned home, I would propose that it should not be sent in the first instance into camps or garrisons, but that it should go to some locality with which it had or might wish to form some connection, and where little or no duties would have to be performed the first year. The regiment being about, as I have said, to be reduced to 600—they would come home much stronger—I would give the men long furloughs, and if, at the end of their leave, they came and said that they could find employment, I would commute the rest of their service to service in the reserve. Now, this should be treated not as a matter of right, but of favour—because, if it was a matter of right, some regiments might be completely broken up on account of the number of men who might claim their discharge. Then I would propose that the first reserve should be attached to the militia. I should be very sorry to see another army raised up between the militia and the line, and I think militia officers have the strongest feeling upon this subject. I have always had the strongest inclination to bring the militia forward as much as possible. [Captain VIVIAN: After how many years' service would you allow a man to join the reserve?] I propose that any of these men who could find employment after having completed two-thirds of their first engagement and served five years abroad, should be allowed to commute the rest of their service for service in the first reserve, and that they should be liable to general service in case of war, but for that war only. The Royal Commission has said that for the future wars will probably be of very short duration—perhaps confined to one campaign. When the war was over, therefore, I would allow these men to return to the reserve. I would have them enrolled as regular militiamen, subject to no other duty or liability except that of being called upon to serve if war became imminent. The men who were in the second period of their engagement, and had served two-thirds of their period—that is, men who have been seventeen or eighteen years in the army, I would attach, not to the first reserve, because I desire that it should consist, not of worn-out soldiers, but of men ready to take the field at a moment's notice—say of men who have served about seven years. I would attach the second period of service men to the pensioners, requiring two years' service in the second reserve for one in the army, because they would not be liable to leave this country. I do not anticipate that these two classes would give a large reserve, because I believe that most of the men who would go back to civil life would desire to return to the army; and in that event I would allow them to do so, counting two years' service in the reserve as one in the line. The regiments coming home this year will be about 2,165 in excess of their strength of 600 men per regiment; and probably all these will, if they can find employment, be entitled to join the army of reserve. You will have to discharge that number of men, and the whole of them would be entitled to the boon I have described. But, after all, that would give only a very small force; however, it would gradually increase. As each regiment came home, the average excess of its numbers would be about 150, and so many might be permitted to commute the rest of their service by service in the reserve. Hon. Gentlemen are aware that a good many officers in the militia do not like to have old soldiers saddled upon them, but I think those serviceable men would be of great use. At all events, officers commanding the militia need not call them out for training unless they wished, for these old soldiers would not require twenty-eight days' drill, but there they would be any time we wanted to lay our hands on them. This, as I have said, will give you but a very small army of reserve; but I would propose to invite the officers of militia regiments to call upon, say one-fourth of their establishments, to volunteer for the first reserve. The Royal Commission recommended that the militia should be raised to their full strength, the quota being 120,000. The present strength of the militia is about 90,000, and the difference between that and 120,000 would constitute the army of reserve. I would invite the officers of militia regiments to ask their men to volunteer for this purpose; but I propose to make no alteration in their term of service in the militia, nor to take them away from their regiments, except in the event of war, in which case they would be called upon to serve with the regular army. As an inducement for them thus to volunteer for the army of reserve, I would double the ordinary militia bounty—that is to say, the militiaman who now gets £6 spread over five years would get £12 spread over five years. I have not the slightest doubt that such a bounty would induce any number of men you want to enlist, and that when men saw they received double bounty for exactly the same duties, there would be a great desire to enlist in this army of reserve. Moreover, every regiment that contributed a certain quota to the army of reserve I would allow to be raised to its full strength, so that you would have the militia regiments exactly in the same state as before, and would have the additional men belonging to the army of reserve. Those men would be liable for service in the regular army only during the duration of war; and I believe there are thousands of militiamen who, while they would object to becoming regular soldiers liable to colonial duty, and to remaining in the army for a long period of service, would have no objection to come forward for a single campaign. From this source, therefore, I expect there would be a considerable addition to the reserve. These men would have the ordinary militia pay; so that the only additional expense would be the extra bounty. But I may be asked how I propose to raise the additional force to the militia under the new system, seeing that it is now considerably below its number? I reply, that I believe the addition of 2*d.* a day, which will be given to the militia as well as the regular army, and the double bounty to the reserve men, will have the effect desired. The number of men required to place upon a war footing of 1,000 men each, fifty battalions of infantry, and complete the strength of the household troops, cavalry, artillery, &c., would be 37,659; and I believe that while the plan I am now recommending would be by far the cheapest that you could adopt, it would also enable us at once to put our hand upon the number of men we required, who would be ready for service without any delay. My proposal, however, is to limit the army of reserve to one-fourth of the present establishment, and for this reason—I do not wish to break up the militia regiments. When on former occasions such regiments have volunteered for service abroad in time of war they have been almost broken up by allowing men indiscriminately to enlist in the line. I propose, therefore, to restrict the number. I would not take a man from the militia for the first reserve until he had gone through his drill and was able at any time to give efficient service. Then I propose that every 100 men drawn from the militia for the reserve should be accompanied by an officer, who should get a commission in the regular army. I am aware that this is an experiment dependent upon the voluntary action of others; but I recommend it because I do not wish to have recourse to the ballot for the militia, or to any other means than that voluntary enlistment which has supplied our service for so many years. The Royal Commission conclude their Report with an admission that their suggestions will lead to increased expense, and they add that, considering the vast interests at stake, and the immense amount of wealth and property accumulated in the country, as well as in our large cities, they cannot believe that the nation will hesitate to pay what, after all, will but amount to a very trifling rate of insurance. I, too, am certain that the nation will not grudge that expense, and that if, this being the only country in the world where the people are free from military service, we can raise all the force we want on the moderate terms I have mentioned, we may think ourselves well off.

With regard to the second army of reserve, I do not propose to exceed the number of pensioners which there is already power to raise by Act of Parliament. There is at present power to raise 30,000, and the number we now have is only 14,000, and the difference between the two numbers will involve the whole of the second reserve. The pensioners are an admirable force, and are the only body which the civil power has a right to call out in case of disturbances. Nobody objects more than I do to the calling out of the Volunteers for such a purpose, and I hope that that question will be finally set at rest. Pensioners, however, may be called out by the civil authorities. I propose that men who have re-engaged and completed two-thirds of their second engagement should be allowed to commute their remaining term of service for service with the pensioners, receiving the double bounty of militiamen, but serving two years for one to entitle them to a pension, as they would not be liable to be sent abroad. The success of this plan will depend upon the extent to which lords-lieutenant and colonels of militia encourage volunteering to the reserve. I am convinced, however, that this is the plan that must be carried out, and if it cannot be worked in connection with the militia it must be—which I should very much deprecate—carried out without connection with that force. I should strongly deprecate making the army of reserve unconnected with the militia, because the effect would be that a man, on obtaining his discharge from the militia, would instantly go to this army of reserve, instead of remaining in the militia, which the double bounty I propose would induce him to do. What I propose will carry out not, indeed, any direct recommendation of the Royal Commission, but almost all the suggestions they have offered with regard to the army of reserve. They recommended that the Secretary for War should have power to commute the last four or five years' service in the army for service in the reserve, and that an addition should be made to the pensioners, both which I propose to carry out. They recommended, too, the militia as the source to which we must look for an army of reserve. Before coming to this conclusion I wrote to His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief to ask for his opinion, and the recommendations of His Royal Highness were almost identical with what I have proposed. The effect will substantially be this—you will have a militia, consisting of 120,000 men, of which one-third or one-fourth will be an army of reserve, liable in time of war to fill up the ranks of the army, and the only additional expense will be the extra bounty that they will receive. You will have time before coming to a Vote to reflect upon the subject, and to consider whether the propositions I have submitted are advisable to adopt or not. All I can say is, that should the recommendation I have now made of an addition to the pay of the soldiers be carried out by this House, it will be the greatest pleasure to me to think that the last act of my official life will be one which will, I trust and believe be for the benefit of the soldier, and for the advantage of my country. The right hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving—

"That the number of Land Forces, not exceeding 139,163 men (including 9,778 all ranks, to be employed with the depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions) be maintained for the Service of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland from the 1st day of April 1867, to the 31st day of March 1868, inclusive."—(The Secretary of State for War.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON : Sir, I am quite sure that the Committee will agree with me when I say that the very able, clear, and straightforward statement of the right hon. Gentleman will increase the regret which, affected in no degree by any political differences between us, we all feel that the country is about to lose his services. Sir, I do not understand the right hon. Gentleman to ask the Committee to express any opinion upon the scheme he has just laid before us. I think the Committee will agree with me that it is quite impossible to do so, the more especially as the Estimate now placed before us does not give us any explanation of the details of the plan. That plan not only involves questions of great importance in a financial point of view, but it affects a question of still greater importance—the future military policy of this country. As I understand it, the proposal is that this country shall commence the adoption of something approaching to the Continental system, where a comparatively small number of men are kept in military service, and where a much larger number of men are kept under liability to serve. That is a proposition of great importance, because it makes a great and fundamental change in the constitution of the force which has always been considered the constitutional force of this country—the militia. That force has hitherto been raised simply on the condition of service at home, and the proposal is that a portion of this force shall undertake the liability of serving abroad. It appears to me, as the scheme stands at present, that it very materially interferes with the efficiency of militia when it is first embodied in case of actual war. For these reasons, I would suggest that the Committee should not only abstain from giving any final decision on the scheme to-night, but that, as far as possible, they should abstain from discussing either the principles or the details of the measure. In the first place, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to explain more fully than he has done why the expenses attending the scheme have been placed before us in the shape of a separate Estimate. I am willing to admit that for the purpose of discussion of the Army Estimates there are some advantages to be obtained by having the scheme of the Government in the shape of a Supplementary Estimate. But a large portion of the expense included in the Supplementary Military Estimates would, as it appears to me, have been more properly embodied in the ordinary Estimates. The 2*d.* and 3*d.* per day which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to add to the pay of the troops would, if adopted, come under Vote 1 of future Estimates, and I want to know whether there is any reason, in addition to the obvious one of convenience of the House, which induces him to lay these Estimates before us in two forms? I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman and the Government consider there is any difference in the responsibility they have undertaken in such Estimates; and whether they consider that the House is pledged to the additional expense proposed in the Supplementary Estimate on account of the Report of the Royal Commission; or whether they look upon the two Estimates as merely two portions of one plan? Another question I should like to ask is, as to that portion of the plan in which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to allow men who have served a certain portion of their time to commute the remainder of the service for service in the militia. Does it not occur to the right hon. Gentleman that this proposition, extending, as I understand it, merely to regiments at home—on their return home from foreign service—will materially interfere with the recruiting for regiments at present abroad? If a man enlists for a regiment which has lately gone abroad, he will know that he will have, according to the length of his service, probably the whole or the greater part of his ten years' service in India. If he enlists in a regiment which has nearly completed its term of colonial service, he will soon come home and have the benefit of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. I should also like to know whether it is his opinion that the sum of £500,000 which is included in the Supplementary Estimate will probably be the whole cost of the scheme after it has once come into operation? If, as I think he will admit, that £500,000 will not nearly cover the whole of the cost entailed upon the country, I wish to ask him whether he has formed any estimate of the ordinary annual expense of the scheme? I conclude that in order to carry into effect the changes proposed of increasing the period of enlistment from ten to twelve years it will be necessary to introduce a Bill. It will also be necessary to introduce a Bill to enable the right hon. Gentleman to enrol militia-men with liability for foreign service. If I am right in these two conclusions, it appears to me the most convenient form in which we can discuss the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman will be that he or his successor should as soon as possible lay before us the Bill, in order that we may see the machinery by which it is proposed to work it out. At present we have not the scheme before us at all. We have, no doubt, had a very clear and lucid statement from the right hon. Gentleman, but we ought to have all the details of the plan before us. As the right hon. Gentleman referred to the Report of the Recruiting Commission, I wish to say that I have read certain portions of that Report with great satisfaction, as they bear out statements which I frequently made in this House, and which appeared to be received with considerable doubt on the part of several hon. Members. The first has reference to the supply of recruits, and the second to the re-engagement of the ten years' men. Last year the supply of recruits, although short of the demand, was not alarmingly deficient; yet some hon.

Gentlemen urged upon the Government to take some active and energetic measures for increasing the supply. Almost the first paragraph of the Report of the Commission states that although the evidence showed that the number of recruits raised had not been sufficient, still, that the deficiency had not been such as to create uneasiness, and could be attributed to causes which might be remedied. I think that this passage of the Report entirely justified the late Government in not acting sooner in the matter, and, when we did act, in only going to the extent of instituting inquiry. With respect to the re-engagement of the time-expiring men, a very large portion of the time spent in discussing the Army Estimates during the last two or three years has been occupied with this question of the re-engagement of ten years' service men. From many Members connected with the army we heard the most alarming statements of the loss which was being caused to it by the discharge of those men who were said to have left in such numbers as greatly to endanger the efficiency of their regiments. Now, though I could not deny that large numbers of men were taking their discharge, I felt it to be my duty to point out that one object of the Limited Enlistment Act undoubtedly was to enable them to do so after they had served for a certain time. I at the same time admitted that it was desirable a considerable number of these men should be retained; and I was, from figures which I had in my possession, able to show that in the artillery and the cavalry a large number of men did actually re-engage, and that the loss to the infantry was not more than 40 or 50 per cent. That statement has been fully borne out by the Report of the Commissioners. They say—

“In regard to the retention in the army of men after the expiration of their first period of service, referred to in paragraph 4 of the Secretary of State's letter, there can be no doubt that if we look only to the efficiency of the army, and take into consideration the strong opinions which pervade the minds of its officers, it is not desirable that too many of the old and seasoned soldiers should be lost. Nor do we think that such is the case; and, in support of that opinion, we would call attention to a Return marked K 17 in the appendix, which shows the increase and decrease of the army for five years, from 1861 to 1865, from which it appears that while the casualties from all causes amounted to 93·5 per 1,000, the loss of limited service men was only 14·8 per 1,000, and this would appear to include not only the men who refused to re-engage, but those who, though willing to do so, were from various causes rejected; the table in the margin and the Return in the appendix show also that the age and service of the soldiers composing the cavalry and infantry are not less favourable for military efficiency at the present day than they were in 1846, just prior to the introduction of the Limited Service Act, when enlistment for life was the rule. We would also call attention to a Return in the appendix, showing the decrease of the army for six years, from 1860 to 1865. From this it appears that out of the total number of casualties from all causes, amounting to 125,890 in all arms, the number of soldiers lost to the service under the Limited Service Act was 17,585. By another Return in the appendix it is shown that during the five years ending 1864-5, out of 25,403 soldiers whose time of service had expired 11,343 left the army, while 14,060 remained."

"In the artillery nearly two-thirds of the men entitled to take their discharge re-engage, and in the engineers about three-fifths. In the cavalry and infantry the proportion of re-engagements is considerably smaller."

Now, the conclusion thus arrived at, after full deliberation, entirely confirms, in my opinion, everything which I stated in this House on the subject of the Limited Enlistment Act. I know that there has been a very strong feeling manifested very generally throughout the country on this subject. It was contended in the press that the scope of the inquiry was inadequate, and that the investigation of the Commissioners was not sufficiently searching to meet the necessities of the case. I must, however, in justice to the Commissioners, point out one thing which I think ought not to be lost sight of. It must not be forgotten that the feeling which existed in the country when the Commission was appointed was very different from that which now prevails. It was appointed in May or June of last year, and we then had not the experience which we have since derived from the war in Germany. The country would have been satisfied in May or June if we had been able to point out to the House some plan sufficient to supply recruits to our army, organized as it was at the time. We wanted, I believe, nothing more than that we should have an army maintained at the strength at which it had been kept up for some years—an army sufficient to discharge the duties required of it in India, in the colonies, and at home; and that we should have no difficulty about recruiting it to that strength; while, as regards reserve, it would have asked for nothing more than a well organized militia and Volunteer force. The events of last summer in Germany caused, however, a very great change in the public feeling on the subject. After the war which then took place there were, no doubt, a great many persons who were not satisfied that our army should be that which they would have been contented with earlier in the year, and who desired that we should have not only a sufficient defensive reserve, but also a large reserve, organized on something like the Continental system, by which we could call up a large number of men from the reserve and use them, if necessary, not only for purposes of defence, but of aggression. I need not remind the House of the number of schemes which were put forward during the winter with the object of providing the country with such a reserve. The general tone of a great many of the writings and speeches in which those schemes were shadowed out was that, taking into account the scale on which war was now carried on in Europe, it was useless for us to think of maintaining our rank among European Powers unless, instead of counting our armies by thousands, we mustered them, as they do, by hundreds of thousands. I must, however, say that I do not believe, great as the excitement in the country was—and it is not, perhaps, yet quite subdued—that it was the wish of any larger portion of the public that any plan should be put into execution which would enable us to organize our army on the scale now adopted on the Continent. The great majority of the country would, in my opinion, have been satisfied should we at any future time, unfortunately, be called upon to take part in another Continental war, if we were able to do as we have hitherto done—place in the field an army respectable, not from its enormous numbers, but from its composition, materiel, organization, equipment, and discipline, instead of vieing with Continental nations in sending forth armies mustering 100,000, 200,000, or 300,000 men. I believe I may add that there is one good lesson which may be learnt from the recent war in Germany, and it is one which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman would appear to have had in view in preferring his scheme. If that war proves anything it is, I think, the fact—though the conclusions drawn from it may have been in some respects exaggerated—that in the Prussian campaign in Bohemia it was clearly shown that an efficient infantry soldier might be obtained by an amount of drill not exceeding three years. Indeed, a great part of the Prussian army was composed of men who had served in the ranks only one year, and the bulk of it consisted of men who had had only three years' drill. That is a fact which we may turn to account; and I must say that the part of the scheme of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman which I heard with the greatest satisfaction was that in which he explained the means by which the term of service of the British soldier would be practically shortened, if his services were not required, in time of peace. Indeed, I shall be anxious to see whether, in the execution of the scheme, it may not be possible to go still further in that direction than he proposes. I have now said everything which I deem it necessary to say upon this plan, and I would only add a very few remarks with respect to the ordinary Estimates. The right hon. Gentleman has expressed his regret that those Estimates show a considerable increase over those of last year—an increase which he set down at £412,000. He omitted, however, to take into account a sum of £250,000 which was added to the Vote of last year on his own Motion, and which formed no part of the Estimate of the late Government. I am not at all complaining of the magnitude of the sum which he now asks us to vote, but I feel bound to remind him that his Estimates are not £412,000, but £662,000 in excess of those of 1866-7. The increase, I may add, would have been still greater had it not been for a mere matter of account, which enables the right hon. Gentleman to reduce his Estimate. The Committee will perceive that there is an increase for the present year in almost every Vote, except Vote 13, on which there is an apparent reduction of £150,000. The sum which the right hon. Gentleman proposes to spend is, however, really not reduced by that amount. The apparent diminution is attributable to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman expects to be repaid by other services and by the colonies £150,000 in excess of the amount we estimated we should obtain from those repayments last year. I do not wish to dispute the accuracy of his Estimate, but I should like to have some explanation on that point. The Committee will at the same time see that but for this Estimate the actual excess of the Vote proposed for the present year would be £810,000 over that proposed by the late Government. Against the right hon. Gentleman's arguments in favour of that excess I have not a word to say. He contended that the first seven Votes are entirely dependent on the number of men. That is not, however, quite an accurate statement, for it must be observed that some of those Votes include a great many items over which the House has control—such as those relating to depôt establishments, recruiting establishments, the purchase of horses, instruction in gunnery, &c. All these are items which are not, perhaps, susceptible of any extensive reduction, but over these the House can exercise a control if it pleases. Over the Commissariat Vote the House, when once it votes the number of men, has little control; but the expenditure in Vote 3 does not depend entirely on the number of men, but on the economical or extravagant manner in which the clothing departments are conducted; and, possibly, by a careful revision, a reduction might be made in that Vote. Vote 4 to a very small extent depends on the number of men, and I know that when I was at the War Office very considerable reductions were annually made in that Vote. Whether those reductions have reached their limit I cannot say; but this I know, that they do not depend on the number of men raised for the army, but to a great extent on the careful supervision of the officer at the head of the department. The same remark applies in a certain extent to Vote 7. There always are, and I believe there always will be, very good reasons discovered every year for some increase in the expenditure, and which when stated as the right hon. Gentleman has stated them, appear to be unanswerable. As I said before, I find no fault with the right hon. Gentleman for the increased expenditure, as it was not in his power to prevent the rise in the price of provisions and clothing; but all I wish to say is that the head of every department must continually have to meet and deal with demands for increased expenditure, and it seems to me to be his duty, while providing all that is absolutely necessary, not to relax in his endeavours to keep down the expenditure in those branches where reductions can be made. I believe that is the only way in which we can expect to get any economy at all. I do not mean to follow the right hon. Gentleman in all his observations; but the fact is, that these are the first Estimates for four or five years past which are not reduced, but very considerably increased. With respect to the particular Vote now before the Committee, I have only to observe that a careful examination of it affords most convincing proof of the truth of the statements made the other night in the discussion on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield (Major Anson), that the increase of our colonial and Indian establishments merely amounts to a decrease of the British establishment. I entirely approve the proposal for forming a special force for service at Hong Kong, and I believe that preliminary directions for it were given before I left office. That addition is exactly balanced by the reduction which the right hon. Gentleman is compelled to make in the British establishment. The right hon. Gentleman will doubtless recollect that a very interesting discussion took place last year on the subject of musketry practice, and the result was that the Commander-in-Chief appointed a committee to consider whether the system was not carried to a certain degree of excess. It was deemed desirable to ascertain whether some relief might not be given to the men, and some reduction made in the Vote if possible. As the result of this inquiry, it is intended to give up, after six months, the school at Fleetwood. In that discussion it was urged by a great many Members that the system of musketry instruction was excessive and might be reduced. I should like to know what has been done in this direction, and whether any other reduction is to be made besides that at Fleetwood. No reduction appears to be made in the Supervisor's Staff. Then, as regards the manufacturing departments, I should like to have minute information furnished respecting the conversion of the Enfield rifles into the Snider pattern. It seems likely to turn out that the right hon. Gentleman was too hasty in making so large an expenditure so suddenly; and so it may be seen that the late Government was right in not proceeding faster than it did, for many difficulties seem to have been met with which were not anticipated last year when the Supplementary Estimate was moved, and I am not sure that the caution given by my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) was not a wise one. I think the process might have been more economical if the right hon. Gentleman had proceeded more slowly. I do not wish to find unnecessary fault with the right hon. Gentleman; but I think we have had proof that in all such matters the greatest deliberation and prudence are necessary. I have now finished the remarks which I desired to make upon the Estimates moved by the right hon. Gentleman; and I will conclude by again venturing to suggest to the Committee that it will be impossible for us to give a decided opinion with reference to all the details of the scheme laid before us until they have been communicated in their entirety.

MR. NEWDEGATE tendered his thanks to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman for the statement which he had just made to the Committee. Various proposals had been brought forward by previous Governments for increasing the defensive means of the country, and there was a general sense of the importance of their being maintained and perfected, especially when we had regard to the experience of foreign nations, and considered the complicated state of foreign politics, and the present unsatisfactory condition of Ireland. Certainly this was not a time when the defensive resources of this country ought to be diminished. The proposals which had been introduced to the attention of the Committee would involve an increase of expenditure; but the scheme was based on a principle consistent with the constitutional usages of the country. The right hon. Gentleman told them he had done that which was not contemplated by his predecessor: but he (Mr. Newdegate) thought that the right hon. Gentleman was quite justified in the course he had adopted when strong apprehensions were entertained of the invasion of Canada, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman deserved the greatest credit for the manner in which he had proposed to meet the difficulty, and for the promptitude, decision, and efficiency which he had displayed, and by which he had been successful in warding off the danger. He was enabled to speak with confidence on this subject, because he had received communications from friends in Canada who expressed gratitude for the energy of the Secretary at War in having the troops armed with breech-loaders, while the malcontents of the United States imagined that they would be restricted to muzzle-loaders. It was the hope of the Fenians, that by buying up the arms which were being sold at the close of the civil war in the United States that had mainly stimulated the idea of a Fenian raid on Canada; they counted upon finding themselves armed with breech-loaders, while the English soldiers would be armed only with muzzle-loaders. The country owed a deep debt of gratitude to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman for having, by extraordinary exertions, placed a breech-loader in the hands of every

British soldier in Canada before the communication between the colony and the mother country was interrupted by the ice. He (Mr. Newdegate) desired to pay his tribute to the efficiency which had marked the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman in the administration of his most important Department—a Department which was doubly important at the present time. He would not then pronounce any opinion upon the able scheme which the right hon. Gentleman had laid before the country for an army of reserve; but he knew that he spoke the general sense of the country in expressing gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman—a feeling which was only heightened by regret that the right hon. and gallant General should have left a Department which no other Member of the House was capable of conducting with so much advantage to the State—he believed that such was the feeling pervading the country, and had no doubt that the expression of that feeling would be reiterated on both sides of the House.

MR. O'REILLY agreed with the noble Marquess the late Secretary for War that it would be premature to-night to express any decided opinion on the scheme so ably brought before the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman; but, at the same time, he thought there was sufficient matter in the statement they had heard to enable them to express a proximate opinion till they saw it more in detail. He wished to make one observation on what the noble Marquess had said with regard to the Commission of which he (Mr. O'Reilly) had the honour to be a Member. The noble Marquess said that public opinion had declared that the recommendations of the Commission were inadequate, and that they did not appear to consider the great necessity for urgency in regard to the army of reserve. The noble Marquess had vindicated the Commission for not largely entering on that subject, because, he said, the campaign of last summer had not then taken place. But the more simple vindication of the Commission was that, neither in the Order of Reference nor in the letter of Instructions which the noble Marquess addressed to them, was their attention called to the subject of the army of reserve. The direction of the Commission was—

“To inquire into the operation of the laws at present in force for raising men to serve in our army, and into the existing system of recruiting for our army, and, after full and careful consideration of these important subjects, to report to us any changes in the existing laws and regulations affecting the raising of men for our army, which would in your judgment facilitate recruiting and to retain in our army a due number of men who have completed their first period of service.”

Lord Hartington's Letter of Instruction referred the attention of the Commissioners to the following points. They were to inquire—

“1. Whether the deficient number of recruits arose from any defect in the present recruiting arrangements, for the increased number now required in time of peace, from any circumstances which render the military service less attractive than formerly, or from the increased advantages of civil life:—2. What were the remedies for this state of things—whether by localizing regiments, and connecting them with the militia of their respective counties; higher pay, without pension; or higher bounty:—3. Whether the operation of the Limited Enlistment Act has, on the whole, operated beneficially:—4. Whether it is desirable to retain in the Army a larger number of ten years' men than now re-engaged; whether any change should be made in the first or second period of enlistment, and whether a third period should be introduced:—5. Whether it is desirable to retain a hold over those ten years' men who do not remain in the Army either by forming them into a separate Reserve Force, or to incorporate them with the Militia; and whether those plans should be part of their original engagement:—and 6. Whether the system of regimental recruiting should be continued or a system of general enlistment introduced.”

He ventured to say that every one of the items referred to in the Letter of Instructions had been considered by the Commission, and specific recommendations were given in regard to them. He fully concurred with the noble Marquess that, notwithstanding the excitement in the public mind caused by the campaign of last year, this country had no desire that our military force should enter into competition with the military strength of the nations of the Continent; and that it did not desire to raise such an army as might induce us to engage in Continental wars. What the country did desire was that our army should be thoroughly well organized, including the army of reserve, so as to be thoroughly efficient for the defence of the Empire and its honour whenever it was attacked. The noble Marquess said that one part of the Report of the Commission had given him great satisfaction, because it vindicated what he had said, that the falling off in the number of recruits was not such as to excite alarm, seeing that it had arisen from causes that might be remedied. He was one of those who, four years ago, first drew attention to the fact, and urged on the House the necessity of investigating the causes of the falling off in recruiting. He made a Motion on the subject which the noble Marquess did not then think it necessary to accede to, but which culminated in the Commission of Inquiry. It was not fair to say that our army was very little below the numbers voted for the last five, six, or seven years. The question was, what was the number of recruits we had been able to obtain compared to the number it would ordinarily require to keep up the army? The average strength of the army might be taken at about 200,000; 140,000 on the Votes, and some 60,000 in India. The average annual loss from all causes, not by expiration of service, was 80 per 1,000, which gave 16,800, and if we enlisted men sufficient to supply our wants every year for twelve years' service, 8,000 would be entitled annually to take their discharge. The number of recruits required would therefore be 24,800 every year, while the average number obtained for the last seven years was very little over 15,000. Even taking into account the number of time-expired men who were re-engaged, 60 per cent on 8,000, there was a large deficit, which rendered it most important that means should be found for increasing the number of recruits. There was another point which the noble Marquess said had given him considerable satisfaction—namely, that the discharges of time-expired men were not so considerable as might have been thought. But they were apt to confound the number of men who ten years ago enlisted with the number who in any year would be entitled to take their discharge. On this subject he had obtained a Return of the number of men entitled to take their discharge two years ago. In those years out of 38,000 men enlisted only 8,000 were in the ranks at the expiration of their first period of service, and entitled to claim their discharge. No doubt that was an exceptional time; but even during peace he believed out of every 1,000 men enlisted only 450 or 500 would be in the ranks at the end of their first period, and in a position to claim their discharge. Even now not more than about 200 would claim it. That fact appeared to him to be the strongest argument in favour of the view of the Commission as to the non-necessity of repealing the Limited Enlistment Act. He wished now to make a few remarks, rather in an interrogatory spirit, on the plan of the right hon. Gentleman for an army of reserve. In the first place, he must say—reserving, of course, the right of modifying his judgment—that he most frankly and cordially concurred in the plan of the right hon. Gentleman. He thought it was fraught with great advantages. Chief among them was this, that it would give the country an army of reserve at the very moment when it was most wanted—that was, at the outbreak of a war. It would also conduce to economy in the Army Estimates, as it would enable them to reduce the regiments in time of peace to an extent that would not involve danger in the case of war. But this plan showed the necessity of other measures, all tending in the direction which he had urged upon the House four or five years ago, and which was also urged by the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield (Major Anson). He was afraid the right hon. Gentleman would never be able to carry out his plan while so many of our regiments were engaged in foreign service. Out of the 132 battalions of infantry (exclusive of the guards) there were never more than from thirty-two to thirty-four at home; and he feared there would not be sufficient to work the system. But the greatest merit of the plan, in his eyes, was its simplicity; it involved no new or strange organization, but rested upon the old groundwork of our army system. He had always looked with doubt and suspicion upon any plan involving a new or strange organization. With the pensioners, Volunteers, militia, and regular army, we had at the present moment organizations sufficiently numerous and varied, and the plan proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would tend to link the two great branches of the service more cordially together, a result that was very desirable. There was another point which he looked upon as one of great merit—that of a local connection to be given to the regiments. He had urged this consideration upon the House four years ago; not, indeed, that the connection should necessarily be one with the county whose name the regiment bore, but that it should be such as spring naturally from the circumstances. Perhaps the best mode of carrying it out would be by counties; all he contended for was that it should be encouraged in every possible way. The same point had been pressed upon the Committee by military authorities, such as Lord Strathnairn, Lord William Paulet, Colonel Campbell, and most of the officers connected with the recruiting service. It was stated in evidence before the Committee that some of the second battalions of regiments which had been raised in Lancashire never had any difficulty in raising recruits from that district. A third advantage was that it would bring not only many men from the reserve into the army, but it would induce a number of others to enlist for the period of the war. The advantage of this plan was seen in the late contest in America, when hundreds of thousands of men who never would have enlisted as common soldiers for prolonged service were found to be ready, either from a spirit of patriotism or adventure, to enter for the period of the war. The right hon. Gentleman proposed very properly to allow men on returning from foreign service, when the battalion was above 600 strong, to join the army of reserves, and even when the battalion was below that strength a man might join the army of reserve on procuring a recruit. He would venture to suggest whether it might not also be well, when a regiment was ordered on foreign service, to allow men who had nearly served their time to enter at once into the army of reserve, instead of cumbering their depôts with them? With regard to the increase of pay, he thought there was great force in the remark of the right hon. Gentleman, that the men would appreciate it better if they got the 2*d.* a day direct instead of in the way the Committee proposed. But, as a Commissioner, there were one or two recommendations of the Commission for the benefit of the soldier to which he wished to draw attention. A soldier, they recommended, should be able to get his good-conduct pay in two years actually, and not have to wait until the expiration of the third year before he received it. At present a man might get into the defaulter's book as often as he pleased during the first year, and still get his good-conduct pay at the end of the third year as soon as the man who had never been in the defaulter's book at all. The consequence was that a soldier had no inducement whatever to behave well for the first year. Then they had suggested as important that the good-conduct badge should not be so lightly lost. [General PEEL: That will be attended to.] He was glad to hear it, and he was sure it would be gratifying news to the army at large. Another suggestion was that drills of instruction should, if possible, be diminished in the case of re-engaged men. Lord Strathnairn had emphatically expressed his opinion that this could be done, and that it would be most desirable. Another recommendation was that they should diminish the length of time spent in camps of instruction. On the Continent the camps were only used in the summer months, when instructions were given in the service of a campaign. But he knew of a battery of artillery that had been in Aldershot for four years. He was much gratified to learn from the right hon. Gentleman that in future regiments returning from abroad would not be sent to camps of instruction, but to country quarters. The greatest dissatisfaction had hitherto arisen from the fact that three regiments had been sent to Aldershot. He had only, in conclusion, to express his regret that the right hon. Gentleman was not about to remain in office to carry into effect the admirable scheme he had planned.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL begged to express his thanks to the right hon. Gentleman for the able statement he had made that evening, and for the full and ample manner in which he had entered into the Estimates. There was a great deal in which he concurred with the right hon. Gentleman, but there was one point on which he was entirely silent. It appeared to him that if they were to go into the question of army organization it would be impossible to separate it from the still more important question of War Office and Horse Guards organization. As matters stood now, the best possible Minister could not make the system work well. The Secretaryship of State was created in the year 1854, and almost every Department of the State was plundered to make work for it. The Home Office handed over to it the charge of the militia and the Yeomanry; the Colonial Office contributed the military affairs of the colonies; the Ordnance Department gave up to it the stores, the fortifications, and the depôts out of India; and the Treasury handed over to it the commissariat. What had happened since then? The work had been more than doubled; it had been indefinitely multiplied. The numbers of the regular army had been largely increased, the forces in India had been augmented, a force of about 150,000 Volunteers added to the responsibilities and duties of the already over-tasked Minister. He would not detain the House by entering at length into the subject at present; but would say that he thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had forgotten what was due to himself in his anxiety for the good of the soldier. He trusted that at some future time the important questions connected with the organization of the War Office would be fully considered by the House, and dealt with in a bold and comprehensive manner.

MR. GLADSTONE trusted the noble Lord who had last spoken would have an early opportunity of entering fully into the subject to which he had referred; the great attention which he had evidently given to the matter would, he was sure, command for him an attentive House. He might remind the noble Lord that the Motion of which notice had been given by the hon. Member for Invernesshire would open up the whole subject for discussion. There was certainly much to be said in favour of an inquiry into the subject. The subject is one of great difficulty; and when the noble Lord returns to the subject, I may venture to assure him that he will find a willing audience—an audience sensible of the difficulties of the subject, and sensible, too, that all the changes made at the time were not sufficiently well considered. The extensive changes in the War Office during 1854 and 1855 were necessarily made under circumstances of great pressure and with much haste; and there were many Members in both Houses of Parliament who would be able to speak with authority upon the subject. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), he confessed he could not follow him in his reference to the present state of the Continent or of Ireland. It was paying too great a compliment to the insane persons, as he would almost venture to call them, who had troubled the peace of the sister isle within the last day or two to, let their acts influence us to any extent in considering our military defences; and as to the Continent, he had the satisfactory conviction that our relations with foreign nations were steadily improving from day to day. It might be wise to place the defensive system of the country in a position to meet every emergency; but it would be the greatest mistake in the world to suppose, with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, that any increase in our forces was proposed to meet dangers likely to arise out of our relations with the Continent. With regard to the limited range of the inquiry made by the Commission to which the noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) had alluded, it had been explained that the Commission did not think that the question of the army reserve came within the scope of its instructions. The matter resolved itself into a question of interpretation, not of the Commission itself, but of a letter addressed by the noble Lord when Secretary of State to the Chairman of the Commission, which contained instructions which might have received a larger interpretation than was put upon them by the Commissioners. Under the third head of instructions contained in that letter the Commissioners are told that—

“Your inquiry should extend to the operation of the Limited Enlistment Act, and you should report how far that Act has answered the expectations with which it was passed, and whether its operation has or has not, on the whole, been beneficial to the army.”

He confessed that the words of that letter might, in his judgment, have conveyed to the minds of the Commissioners that which he believed was in the mind of the Government at the time—namely, that they were to be at liberty to consider the whole subject of the reserve as far as it grew out of the time of service in the army, and as far as it was connected with the subject of recruiting. He should never think of blaming the Commissioners for having adopted the prudent and circumspect course of keeping within their instructions rather than to exceed them; but, considering the ability of those who were upon the Commission, it was greatly to be regretted that the country had lost some part of the benefit it would have derived from their inquiry, owing either to the narrowness of their instructions or to the too modest interpretation which they put upon their instructions. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had adverted with great clearness and force of argument to the question respecting the difference between the kind of advantages offered to the soldiers by the recommendations of the Commission, and the more direct and intelligible advantage in the shape of a small augmentation of their pay that he proposed to offer them. There was another subject immediately connected with this question, which appeared to have dropped out of view in the discussion which had taken place; and he was not sure whether the matter had been brought under the attention of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite. It was, that last year, before the appointment of the Commission, a departmental committee was formed to consider the very important question of ration stoppages in the army, by some modification of which it was possible to have conferred very great advantages upon the soldiers—advantages which might not have been less beneficial to them than those which were proposed by the Commission and by the plans of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman. That departmental committee drew up a Report for the consideration of the Government, and that Report, if he was not mistaken, was referred to the Commission; but it did not appear to be contained in the volume on the table of the House, neither did it appear from the Report of the Commission to have been under their consideration, notwithstanding that it was obviously a subject of great importance, because it offered a third alternative and method of proceeding distinct from that recommended by either the right hon. Gentleman or the Commission. Not feeling himself a competent judge of the matter he could not trust himself to say whether the alternative proposed by the departmental committee was or was not preferable to that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman or by the Commission; but as the object of the inquiry conducted by that Committee had been the subject of serious thought, he thought it was one that should not have been lost sight of; and therefore he would suggest to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that unless there was some objection to such a proceeding, of which he was not aware, that Report of the departmental committee should be laid before the House, as it must be calculated to enlarge their information upon a subject of great national importance. He wished also to express to the right hon. Gentleman his anxiety that he should candidly direct his attention to the question of the ultimate charge of the plans which he had proposed. He thought the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, in stating the extra charge which his plan for an army of reserve would entail, had forgotten that, besides the direct charge, there would be a great additional indirect charge involved by the adoption of his plan, inasmuch as by passing a large body of commuting soldiers into the militia, vacancies would be created in the regular army, which could only be filled up by a more rapid and extensive system of recruiting, necessarily involving a considerable expenditure. It would be desirable that some estimate should be given showing the probable amount of the indirect charge, if any, that would result from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman's plan if it were adopted. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had himself told the House that the figures before them did not represent the real state of the case as regarded the heavy augmentation that had taken place in the Military Estimates. He could not regret any augmentation in the charges of the army that had been caused by the rise in the price of labour; but it was necessary to ascertain how far the increase in the army expenditure was attributable to that cause. It would also be the duty of the House, when they came to consider the Estimates in Committee, to inquire whether the condition of the soldier could not be improved by other means than by the rough-and-ready one of increasing his pay. He was afraid in these times, when Parliament and the public were disposed to deal liberally with the army, there was a strong disposition to regard a dose of public money as a universal panacea for every difficulty, without considering the advantages that might be obtained from other resources. He was rather disappointed at not hearing from the right hon. and gallant Gentleman that it was his intention to compensate the increase of charges in one department by a diminution of the expenses of another department. It might well be that from the vast amount of ordinary work the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had to perform he was unable to make the necessary investigations into the working of the numerous departments under him, and, perhaps, that might form a subject for consideration when a Motion in the nature of the Motion of the hon. Member for Inverness come on for discussion. As compared with last year let the House see how the matter stood. As his noble Friend the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington) had pointed out, the real increase of charge was a sum of £810,000 diminished by about £120,000, which his right hon. and gallant Friend expected to get in the shape of an augmentation of extra receipts, but, on the other hand, increased by £500,000 to be proposed as a Supplementary Estimate. So that the fact was there would be an augmentation of nearly £1,200,000 in the Army Estimates of the year. It might be unreasonable, but it was perfectly natural for a Member of the House of Commons to entertain a feeling that some not inconsiderable means of reduction might have been discovered to balance this excess of charge. It was not possible for himself to pretend to offer any material assistance to the House in discovering such means of reduction, and he heartily concurred in the observation of his noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), that it must happen that every year there would be some one or more head of service coming forward for an increase of public charge. But it was the duty of that House to make such provision as to insure that a steady and careful review of all the establishments should be going on within the departments themselves, so as to obtain, as far as possible, the advantage of compensating by reduction for any necessary augmentation of expense that might take place. It appeared to him a matter deserving the attention of the Government whether some special provision might not be necessary for the inspection of the various branches of our military expenditure, and it was worthy of the serious consideration both of Government and Parliament whether they had sufficiently discharged their duty on this occasion. Undoubtedly, before 1854, whatever might have been the imperfections of our establishments with reference to the gigantic operations required in time of war, there was an organization, both in the Ordnance Department and the Office of the Secretary for War, which was good for the purpose of checking the military expenditure. He thought the same organization would work equally well in time of peace. His right hon. Friend did not, probably, differ from that opinion, and he only stated what was on record in public documents when he said that the Duke of Wellington, who was no less great as an administrator than as a general, was the real author of the most difficult portion of that organization—namely, that relating to the Ordnance Department. He trusted, therefore, that this matter would receive the serious attention of the Government, for he was convinced that, without imputing blame, the fact that Her Majesty's Government, under the peaceful circumstances of the time, should think themselves obliged to propose so large an additional charge, instead of a reduction, would create disappointment in the country, and impose on the House the duty of determining whether some check should not be provided, and if the business of revision and reduction could not be sufficiently carried out by the ordinary means of departments it would not be necessary to consider whether there should not be some special machinery established for that purpose.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he was convinced that the service could not be improved without an increase of expenditure:—but the great question was whether they got an equivalent for what they paid. For his part, he wished to tender his thanks to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War for the lucid statement he had made, and to express his regret, in common with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, that the services of one who had shown himself so competent to deal with the important question of army organization were likely to be lost—he hoped only for a short time—to the country. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had stated that the reserve force must, to a considerable extent, be aided by the militia. He had taken the liberty to say to the late Mr. Sidney Herbert, when bringing in some Bills on the subject, that no matter what measures he introduced, there was no other organized force that he could fall back upon to do garrison duty and fill up the gaps in the army but the militia. The militia had been rather eclipsed of late by that splendid force, the Volunteers; and he remembered hearing the late Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams) say that the militia were no longer necessary now that we had the Volunteers. That, however, was a great mistake. The Volunteers could never perform the same duty as the militia, except if this country should be attacked, and they fought side by side. He remembered the Duke of Wellington, upon the second reading of the Bill under which the present militia was constituted, saying that about 1810 and 1811 no force could be better than the militia for Her Majesty's troops. Some of the militia regiments raised under the ballot volunteered for the Peninsular war. At the time of the Crimean war the original force which embarked for the Crimea was about 25,000 men, and during the progress of hostilities the militia sent some 34,000; and not only that, but they enabled us to send on our troops from Gibraltar and the Mediterranean, and did the garrison duty of this country. And now they would be enabled to do more by the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the reluctance of militia colonels to receive men from the line. For himself, he could say he would be very glad to have such an addition, for they might be made extremely useful as non-commissioned officers, and he would have no fear of being unable to keep them in order. Again, it had been said that some colonels of militia did not like to give their men. But this he would say, that if it were pointed out to them as a duty, it would be performed with zeal, and he hoped to the benefit of the country.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that as a Member of the Commission appointed to inquire into this subject, he should like to say a few words in reference to it. He thought that much of the criticism which had been passed on the Report of the Royal Commission had arisen from a misapprehension of the scope of the inquiry which was intrusted to them. They had been censured for not having included in their recommendations a plan for forming an army of reserve, and the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) had attributed their not having gone so far on this point as some desired to a change having occurred in public opinion subsequent to their appointment. The censure was most unjust. The fact was, as was shown by the noble Lord's own letter, and by the terms of their appointment, that the scope of their inquiry was limited to the consideration of two questions, how the deficiency in the supply of recruits was to be met, and whether it was desirable to maintain the Limited Enlistment Act or to fall back on the old system of enlistment for life. It was true that they were also directed to consider the means of maintaining a hold over the ten years' men who were disinclined to remain in the army, and whether they should be formed into a reserve, as to which the Commission reported that it was desirable to keep them in the regular army; but the question of forming an army of reserve only arose after the Prussian campaign, and therefore could not have been included within their inquiry. Every Member of the Commission must have been convinced of the extreme desirability not only of enlisting more recruits, but of widening the field from which they were drawn; for the present system, to use the mildest term, was very discreditable, and nobody could read the evidence which had been given on the subject without a sense of shame. The recruits were, in fact, said to be drawn from the very lowest classes. There were two aspects in which the question ought to be regarded—from the soldiers' and from the civilians' point of view. The grievances of the soldier were very small, so small that they might be called irritating sores rather than grievances. But although very small taken separately, yet being endured day by day they caused a worrying sense of irritation which became at last a serious grievance. Upon this point he attached greater weight to the evidence of the soldier than to that of the most experienced officers. Great irritation was felt at the different stoppages to which the soldier was subject. There was not a man who did not lay stress upon it; and many of the officers did the same. The men said they never knew when they had got 2d. in their pockets, or what they would have to-morrow, or what they could depend upon. First and foremost was the stoppage for the "shell" or fatigue jacket. There was some foundation for this grievance. They made a man work in a certain coat, and did not allow him to wear one made of a material that would last the longest and be the most serviceable to him; but he was compelled to wear it and keep it in repair, however strongly he might feel that it was not suited to the work he had to do in it. And then, out of a soldier's 2d. or 2½d. a day, they put a stoppage upon him to renew this jacket. There were several other items of stoppage which it would be much wiser to abandon. The meat was certainly complained of by the cavalry and the artillery. These were illustrations of the soldiers' grievances; he felt the pressure of them every day of his life, and it was a mistake to imagine that an increase of 2d. a day in his pay would remove them. He was afraid that after an enormous expense of between £300,000 and £400,000 had been incurred, the grievances would remain where they were before, and the House would still have to redress them. He was rather afraid that the right hon. Gentleman would then have to give 2d. a day and what the Commissioners recommended for stoppages and meat besides. This question of 1d. or 2d. a day additional was, however, in his opinion a very superficial way of looking at the subject. It was necessary to go much further and deeper into it. A very serious question and one which required an answer was, how it came about that there was so great an indisposition on the part of the labouring classes in this country to see their relatives enlisting into the army. How came it that a profession to which the upper classes were proud that their sons should belong, and which they regarded as the highest in the country, should be looked upon by the poorer classes with so much aversion? He could not pretend to answer this question offhand; but it behoved the House to see whether they could not remove some of the causes which made the army unpopular. It was lamentable to reflect upon the class from which the recruits were drawn. One recruiting sergeant said his recruits were always young men who had either got into trouble or were out of work, or who had come up from the country and failed to obtain employment. Another declared that recruits were the refuse of the population, who fled into the army as a place of refuge. The army was avoided by men of steady character and industrious habits. Was that a state of things creditable to this country? None of the explanations that were sometimes advanced was adequate to account for it. It could not be, as some thought, because parents did not like to see their sons expatriated? The same objection applied to officers, but the parents of officers made no objection to their sons going abroad with their regiments. Nor did he believe that the state of the labour market was the cause; because where the army competed with the labour market on even terms, it failed to draw recruits. A soldier was better off, in many respects, than an agricultural labourer. He had more meat, was better housed and fed; and the labourer, after twenty years' service, had no pension to fall back upon; yet the agricultural labourer refused to be a soldier. Nor could it be said that the martial ardour of the nation had fallen into decay, or that the prospect of expatriation was distasteful, for the officers of the army showed no dislike to foreign service, and the well-filled ranks of the Volunteers gave no countenance to the suggestion that Englishmen had lost the warlike spirit of their forefathers. He was pleased with much that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman on this subject; but with nothing more than his remarks on the subject of employing soldiers in industrial occupations. One of the great objections to a soldier's life was its terrible monotony, the eternal round of drill, from one year's end to another. He honoured those officers who worked so hard to find amusement, and to open reading rooms, for their men; but soldiers wanted something besides drill and amusement. They wanted some employment to occupy them. He was sorry, on the other hand, to hear the right hon. Gentleman pass over, with so much brevity, the recommendation of the Recruiting Commissioners for the enlistment of boys. The House would remember that, a few years ago, the navy was worse off than the army now was for recruits. The House was then recommended to adopt a plan by which boys, who were too young to enter the naval service, received a year's training. That plan had been a magnificent success. There was hardly an officer of the navy who did not bear testimony to the wonderful alteration since that system was adopted. The Commissioners recommended a somewhat analogous plan for the army. The right hon. Gentleman had merely remarked, on this recommendation, that the boys would cost £30 a year, and that this would be a very expensive way of getting recruits. Including buildings, the estimate might not be excessive; but the House must remember the difference which a year and a half's training would make in completing the education of the soldier. The lads would be taught to mend their own clothes, to handle a spade, and to do many of those things which a Continental soldier was able to do, but which were now done for our troops by others. He would be introduced into the army a complete soldier, instead of a raw recruit, who had to be taught everything, and be drilled, by slow and tedious process, into soldiers. No comparison could be instituted between a boy who entered at sixteen, and was turned out at seventeen and a half years of age, and who cost £45, and a recruit who was picked up in Charles Street; but he hoped the right hon. and gallant General would give some further consideration to the matter, which was well deserving of the serious attention of the House. The question of inducing men to enter the army was all the more grave, because an army of reserve would increase the necessity for recruits, which there would be still more difficulty in obtaining, as the price of labour rose. The present system of recruiting could not continue, for it was such that the Commission used only a mild term, when they spoke of "inveigling young men into the army." The more the evidence was read, the more necessary would it be to represent to the recruit the real terms of the service, for two men, well qualified to form a correct opinion, declared to the Commission that so great was the mistrust inspired by past deceptions, that the recruiting sergeant would not be believed even if he were able to refer to an authoritative statement on paper of the terms of the service. It was high time for the War Office to see that recruiting was conducted more satisfactorily.

LORD HOTHAM said, that no apology was needed by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) for speaking as a civilian on a subject so important; and considering the calm and temperate manner in which his remarks had been made, and the good feeling by which they had been characterized, they could not fail to commend themselves to great attention. In a great deal of what had been said by the hon. Member he entirely concurred, and particularly in what he had said about stoppages. He believed there was nothing more annoying to a soldier than to be constantly subject to stoppages, their frequency, and the uncertainty as to their amount, created a bad feeling which it was impossible to over-estimate. On the recommendation of a Royal Commission, over which he (Lord Hotham) presided some years ago, many of these stoppages had been done away with altogether, and the more they could be reduced the better. With respect to the description of persons who were now enlisted in Her Majesty's service, he should be very glad if the improvements which had been suggested could be carried out. The man who could discover a mode of enlisting a better description of men would be a great public benefactor; but although it might not be impossible to make such a discovery, the matter was attended with more difficulties than the hon. Member for Bedford seemed to imagine. He did not intend to enter into any discussion as to whether the Commission had or had not fully carried out its instructions. He was appointed some years ago to serve on a Royal Commission, and the first thing he was told was that he must not recommend anything likely to cause an increase of expenditure; and it rarely happened that any Royal Commission so appointed found itself able to go either as far as it desired or those whom it concerned expected. The main point in the discussion had turned on the Supplementary Vote which had been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. Now, on the point of recruiting, which had formed the principal topic of discussion, he would merely allude to two or three matters on which his right hon. Friend was disposed to follow the recommendations of the Commissioners. First, as to the abrogation of the Ten Year's

Mr. Whitbread

Enlistment Act. When that Bill was introduced by Lord Dalhousie one of its objects was to enable a man to retire from the service at the end of ten years at such an age and in such a state of health as to enable him to become a good and useful citizen, all the better for the training he had undergone. Whether that object had been attained or not he would not say; but he had always entertained the opinion that enlistment for ten years would not be satisfactory in a military point of view, and the alteration proposed afforded a justification for his having voted in every division against Lord Dalhousie's Bill. The right hon. Gentleman had stated his intention of allowing the enlistment of men for general service instead of enlisting them for particular regiments. Under the present system every man had the right of enlisting into any regiment he might select, and there was no power of removing him into another against his will. Now, while he approved this arrangement, he never could see why that large number of recruits who had no preference for any particular regiment should not be enlisted for general service. The right hon. Gentleman had expressed his readiness to abolish the charge for barrack damages, thus removing a source of much irritation and ill-will. He felt a natural satisfaction at this proposal, and also at that to do away with the Ten Year's Enlistment Act, as both changes had been recommended by the Royal Commission over which he (Lord Hotham) presided. There was one other subject on which he wished to make a remark, and that was the military reserve funds. With the exception of the noble Lord opposite and his right hon. Friend, he believed that no one knew fully the meaning of that subject. It involved the receipt and expenditure of large sums of money, by whom or in what manner no other hon. Member knew than those to whom he alluded. When he called the attention of the House to the subject last year his right hon. Friend said it was one which ought to be inquired into by a Committee. If the Army Estimates had been brought forward this year under ordinary circumstances, he should have stated at length the reasons why he considered some inquiry necessary; but observing the position in which the House was now placed, he would content himself with asking his right hon. Friend whether, during the last eight months he had been at the War Office, he had seen any reason

CAPTAIN VIVIAN regretted the loss of the right hon. Gentleman, whom he supposed he must now call the late Secretary of State for War, at this particular moment; for, however great might be the abilities of his successor, it was impossible for him at once to make himself master of all the matters connected with military administration. When considerable reforms were required in that administration it was a misfortune that the right hon. Gentleman should have been removed to make room for a right hon. Gentleman who had all his work to learn. So far as he understood the plan which the right hon. Gentleman had propounded that evening, it contained a great deal that was good. The proposed addition of 2*d.* daily to the soldier's pay was a necessary consequence of the state of the labour market; but although this was doubtless a great improvement, it did not touch the main difficulty in regard to recruiting. A better class of recruits was required, as well as a larger number of them; for all the evidence adduced before the Royal Commission showed that the men from whom our troops were drawn were chiefly duffers or idlers, or persons who could find no other employment. He should like to know what thought was present in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman when he conceived the plan of giving 20*s.* to a soldier on furlough who brought home a recruit; but he believed he could pretty well guess what it was. The truth was the army was not popular, and in reality the greatest antagonist of the recruiting sergeant was the soldier on furlough, because he went home and described the irritating sores, as they had been called, from which the soldier suffered, and whose tongue might, perhaps, be to some extent stopped on the subject of his grievances if he were rewarded for obtaining a recruit. But the unpopularity of the army was chiefly owing to a want of proper regard for the comfort and happiness of the soldier; though even if everything possible were done in this respect, there would still be something wanting to make the army a profession which men in the lower ranks of life would willingly embrace. What they had to do was to take away his real grievances, make his life happier, and show him that entering into the army is not self-banishment—do that and he would be far more likely to bring back recruits than now, even with 20*s.* or 25*s.* a piece for them. For his own part, he thought a great error was made when the British and the Indian armies were united, and believed it would be politic to revert to the system of having two armies. There might, for instance, be an army for home service and another for colonial service—the terms for which the men enlisted in each being different. Above all, the present disgraceful system of recruiting ought to be done away with. It was called voluntary enlistment, when the fact was it was a system of kidnapping half-intoxicated youths and those out of work into the service. It was a shame to the country, and the recruiting sergeants themselves were not unfrequently ashamed of the part they had to play. The present scheme was of such magnitude that he felt assured the House would give it the best consideration; but he thought they should forbear expressing any opinion on it at the present moment. But he did not agree with the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, that after they passed the seven Votes they could do little to decrease the Estimates. With regard to the Estimates which had been laid before the House he might point out that the expenditure for the administration of the army exceeded by £5,000 the Vote of last year. It was, he thought, of the utmost importance that everything should be done to find, as far as possible, employment for the soldier which would bring him in money; and while, therefore, for the higher duties of the department it might be necessary to secure the services of well paid clerks, there were others which might very advantageously be discharged by private soldiers, who, instead of a fixed salary, would be content to receive 5*s.* or 6*s.* a day. In that way a considerable saving might be effected and a benefit conferred on the well-conducted soldier which he would appreciate. An auditor had, he might add, been lately appointed to check the accounts at the War Office, with a view to the establishment of a better system of financial control; but he unfortunately did not appear to have been very successful in the attainment of that object. The system on which our army accounts were conducted was one indeed so complicated as to render it utterly impossible to carry it out with any degree of efficiency in time of war. But without adverting further to that point he would ask his right hon. Friend, in conclusion, for some explanation of what he considered an item of unnecessary expenditure in connection with the A and B troops of Royal Engineers who were an offshoot of the Royal Engineers, and who were maintained in order simply to practice pontooning on special days at Aldershot, and included two officers, thirty non-commissioned officers, 474 men, and 307 horses at a cost of something like £35,000 a year. He could not see that that was a necessary expenditure. He trusted that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite would take these circumstances into his consideration.

COLONEL NORTH thought that the Committee was very much indebted to the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) for his useful remarks, and in none of those remarks was he (Colonel North) more inclined to agree than with those respecting the eternal stoppages—there was nothing more irritating to the soldier. His hon. Friend had mentioned the shell jacket, which was a serious consideration to the soldier. And here he might remark that there was nothing which so much intensified the dislike of soldiers to Aldershot as the constant wear and tear of clothing that occurred there. In garrison towns, too, there were many occasions, such as fires, in which the soldiers exerted themselves most beneficially, but where having injured their clothes they never afterwards received a farthing of compensation. He could not agree with his hon. Friend that soldiers on furlough created great obstacles to recruiting by the accounts they gave of the service; but he believed that great harm was done by the number of disabled soldiers who were scattered over the country, and who, perhaps, having been blinded, or completely broken down by trench work, received only 6d., 9d., or 1s. a day for a period of twelve months, after which they were left entirely to their own resources. He knew many such cases in his own neighbourhood; and he believed that nothing was so detrimental to recruiting than that these men should be left to roam about utterly ruined in health and purse. As to having two armies, a home and a colonial one, he did not see how it was practicable; we wanted to have our army in hand, so as to be able to send it, at short notice, to any part of the world. There was the Trent affair, for example, when we sent 10,000 men to Canada; we could hardly have done that if our army had been permanently cut in two. We had at best but a small army, and we should have it always ready in case of war. He was afraid he could not go the whole length with his noble Friend the Member for the East Riding (Lord Hotham) on the subject of barrack damages, as there were cases in which wilful damage took place and ought to be paid for; but stoppages under that head should be reduced as much as possible. In the case of men in hospital, who might have wives and families starving outside, he thought the stoppage of 10d. a day was monstrously unfair. The noble Lord the late Secretary for War had told them that, for the last few years, the deficiency in recruits had been met by a proportionate reduction of the army. That admission was most important, and the unpleasant inference was that if we persisted in that system the end would be the destruction of our army. In conclusion, he begged to join in the general regret at the retirement of his right hon. and gallant Friend on the Treasury Bench from the post of Minister for War.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, that if we had a reformed House of Commons, chosen by the great mass of the people, a far more efficient and cheaper method of defending the country would be hit upon than that which had been discovered, either by the Horse Guards or the Royal Commission. The Report of the Recruiting Commission had greatly disappointed him; and when he read the petty palliatives recommended in it—such as those relating to washing the sheets, barrack damages, and similar petty matters—he felt inclined to ask, what had the War Department, paid so highly for so many years, been about not to have seen to those things without the necessity for a number of able men sitting many days and examining many witnesses in order to produce such a Report? The subject of the military defences of the country should be dealt with in a more comprehensive spirit than had been shown or suggested by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread.) Our army costs the largest sum, and produced the smallest results. It ought to be ascertained how many recruits we really required. Were we not enlisting more than we wanted now? How far could we reduce our colonial military expenditure—for we had not tried that yet? Why had not the recommendations of the Committee which sat six years ago been carried out? A great mistake was made six years ago in amalgamating the English and Indian armies. The sooner our steps in that matter were retraced the better. When the colonial and Indian military expenditure was cut down as far as possible, then we should know the number of recruits that were absolutely wanted. The number of our distant fortresses, such as Gibraltar, Malta, and Bermuda, might be advantageously diminished. We ought to have the smallest possible army in time of peace, but with an establishment of such a nature that we could increase it to any amount in time of war. Why did we not take the same steps to improve our army by comparison with foreign armies that other countries did? From America, for instance, there was an officer dispatched to this country to inquire into the details of our army system, to see if the American system, which had already proved so efficient, could not be benefited thereby. We might gain considerable benefit to our own army system by inquiring into the systems which prevailed in France, Prussia, Switzerland, and Russia. He regretted that the Recruiting Commission had been a mere farce, and had entirely failed in its duty. It did not go into the matter thoroughly; and he was sorry to say that we now wanted another Committee or Commission so constituted as to be able to inquire into the whole subject. It was quite impossible for private Members of Parliament to inquire into the system pursued in other countries if the Public Departments would not do it. The scheme proposed by the Secretary for War might be a very good scheme; but he only saw that it greatly increased our expenditure, which had been creeping up from year to year, and which was always increasing, no matter whether Whigs or Tories were in office. At present, in our Public Departments it required six people to do the work of one. There were some vested interests so strong that they entirely overruled the will of any Secretary of State, who was placed in the hands of clerks to such an extent that he scarcely had a will of his own. He regretted that the Secretary for War was quitting office, not that he had introduced any great improvements, but because he had a will of his own. He hoped the House would have soon a general, thorough, and efficient debate upon the whole subject, such as was worthy of the House of Commons and of the country.

COLONEL WILSON-PATTEN thought that as the Secretary for War was quitting his office the best thing to be done was to appoint the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Seymour) to the vacancy, when he could put in practice that which he recommended. He did not think it right to pass over in entire silence the attack just made on the Recruiting Commission by the hon. Member, who also referred to the military systems of different Continental countries, and said that ours was inferior to that of every other country. Those systems were, it was true, wholly different from ours—we had no compulsory service such as existed in every other country in Europe; and as for America, to which the hon. Member likewise alluded, the House needed not to be told that the Americans, in the space of three years, spent £600,000,000 in getting up an army, chiefly because they were not, at the time of need, prepared with a properly-organized force. If all these questions were to be investigated again by a new Commission, all he wished was that the hon. Member himself might be made the Chairman of it. With respect to the scheme of the right hon. and gallant General the late Secretary of War, he must say that, with the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), he regretted that the suggestion of the Commission regarding the military training of boys had not met with some attention. All the witnesses who spoke respecting the training of boys for the navy testified to the advantage of that system, and said that, with a slight difference in practice, it might be applied with equal advantage to the army. No subject was brought before the Commission more forcibly than that relating to pensions, and the Commission had been criticized severely for recommending that the pension of a man who had served twenty-one years should only be raised from 8*d.* to 10*d.*; and the witnesses had been unanimous in describing the smallness of the pension as one of the greatest obstacles to re-enlisting. The Commission were unanimous in wishing that the soldier should have his pension with the money given to him for good conduct during his service in addition. The Commission did not hold it to be necessary that the rations of all the soldiers in the army should be increased from three-quarters of a pound to 1 lb., but only that the soldiers at home should have it so increased. The evidence on that point was strong. The Commissioners were told that in the Cavalry, the Artillery, and the Sappers and Miners corps, the soldiers were obliged to pay out of their own pocket in order to procure an additional allowance. That statement applied more especially to the Sappers and Miners, whom, it was stated, were obliged to spend in that way every farthing they could spare. The evidence was not so strong with regard to the infantry. Some of the witnesses gave it as their opinion that the infantry ought to have an increase of rations ; but there was very general unanimity indeed on the point as regarded the Cavalry, Artillery, and Sappers and Miners, the witnesses stating that an increase was positively necessary, in order to enable the men to perform their arduous duties. For the most part the Commission had to conduct their inquiry in London ; but they were told that, if they wanted to get at the truth, they ought to have some of the private soldiers before them. With that view the Commissioners went to Aldershot and the evidence they received there from the private soldiers was most valuable. More candour and independence could not be found in any witnesses. The Commissioners told them that their names would not be given in the Report, but they would be numbered. This course was taken in order that they might give their evidence with the greatest freedom. It would be seen from the printed evidence that those witnesses attached the greatest importance to what were generally known as "grievances"—to the deductions from the bounty, the shell-jacket question, and the deductions for extra clothing. Every one of them agreed in stating that, in no other quarters in the country, was there such wear and tear of clothing as at Aldershot, or where soldiers were subject to such deductions for clothing as they were there. None of them objected to soldiers being deprived of good-conduct pay for offences, but they were unanimous in suggesting that such deprivation should not take place without the approbation of the commanding officer. One of them said that some time ago, when in detachment, he was deprived of it by a subaltern who had not the same experience as his commanding officer of his former good conduct, and that, in consequence of his knowledge on the point, the latter would have found means of punishing him sufficiently without depriving him of his good-conduct pay. He thought his hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Henry Seymour) could neither have read the Report of the Commission nor heard much of the discussion that evening, or he would not have made some of the observations which he had just addressed to the House. The Commission had arrived at the conclusion that the time must come when these stoppages and other grievances complained of in the army must be dealt with ; and their recommendations were directed to doing away with some of these grievances. He submitted to the House that the Commission would scarcely have been justified in going into the reserve question more than they had done. The noble Lord the late Secretary of State for War, in moving the Commission, said, that the average annual deficiencies amounted to 4,500, and the number of recruits to 15,000 ; and the inquiries of the Commission were directed to ascertaining how the army could best be maintained at its requisite strength. He believed their recommendations would not have been found so expensive as his right hon. Friend seemed to think. The Commissioners never had lost sight of the question of expense to the country involved in any suggestions which they might make. He would not express his entire approbation of the scheme of his right hon. Friend, but he approved it generally, and would willingly give it his support.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON wished to say, by way of explanation, that, bearing in mind the alteration in public opinion, it was not to be wondered at that at the time the Royal Commission was appointed, special reference was not made in the Instructions to the subject of an army of reserve ; but, while he admitted that no Special Instructions on the point were given to the Commission, he could not admit that there was anything in the Instructions to prevent them from entering into that subject if they had thought it right to do so. On the contrary, he could not but think that when the question of period of service was before them, and when their attention was also called to the question whether it would be desirable to obtain a hold over the ten years' men, the question of an army of reserve might fairly have been deemed a fit subject for consideration by the Commission.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL thanked the right hon. and gallant General the Secretary of State for War for the boons he proposed to confer on the soldier. He thought these might justly be called necessary boons ; and he believed that the knowledge that something in the direction now indicated was going to be done had already had a good effect on men in the army as well as on men thinking of becoming recruits. He was able to bear testimony that recruiting had of late manifestly improved, from the prevailing notion that the condition of the soldier was about to be improved, and he knew of cases in which soldiers entitled to their discharge had held on because they believed that something for their benefit was about to be put in force. The outline of the scheme which had been propounded would do much to popularise the Service; but of the various benefits which the scheme would confer on the soldier, one had not been referred to in the debate—that was the finding him remunerative employment. It was not only proposed to employ the troops, but to permit them to effect barrack repairs, which at present constituted a very heavy and irksome charge. The charge for repairing a barrack was upon the average £50 per month, and this was an important sum if expended amongst the men of a regiment; and if they permitted the soldier to earn that money by his own industrious labour, they would confer on him one of the greatest boons. A gallant General, at present commanding a district in the South of England, had told him that since he had been permitted to employ a certain number of men in useful labour, paying them properly for it, there had not only been a great improvement in the conduct of the men, but the greatest punishment was debarring them from being placed on the list to be so employed. He really believed if the scheme of the right hon. and gallant General were carried out it would do more to ameliorate the condition of the soldier than at the first blush might appear. It was quite a mistake to suppose that the men would spend the additional money they received in drink. From inquiries he had himself made, he found that not more than one-third of the consumption at the canteen was in drink, two-thirds being spent in bread, cheese, and eating. He believed that by usefully and productively employing the men as much would be done to improve their condition as by the additional 2*d.* a day, which, he was glad to think, was to be given to them. In the French army this system was most successfully carried out, and the men were employed in works useful to themselves and to the nation; indeed, some of the fortifications for Paris had been constructed by the military, at one-third less cost than the lowest estimate. He was sorry, however, to find that a jealousy existed lest the soldiers' labour should be brought into competition with civil labour. As an instance, he might state that when Chelsea barracks were building the men connected with the works struck, and as it was very desirable that the edifice should be finished without delay, two companies of soldiers were employed for the purpose. They commenced their labours; but, it being considered that this was putting military and civil labour in competition with each other, the subject was animadverted on in that House, the soldiers were removed, and the strike continued. He thought such a state of matters was to be regretted. In the ranks of the army were to be found men skilled in every conceivable trade, even in that of silvering the backs of mirrors, and he thought it was a pity that such an amount of skilled labour should not be more taken advantage of. If the scheme of the right hon. and gallant General cost the country £500,000, he was satisfied the good it would effect would be cheaply purchased.

COLONEL SYKES said, they had had a long discussion, but not a single word had been uttered about economy until the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) rose. The office of an economist in that House was undoubtedly a thankless one; and he could say from experience that nothing short of a miracle could reduce an Estimate. He had been in Parliament ten years, and during the whole of that time the only reduction that had been made in the Estimates as brought forward was a sum of £400 on one of the items connected with the palace of our Ambassador at Constantinople; and on that occasion the Government were taken by surprise and defeated, and an infinitesimal miracle was worked. In 1848 the Army Estimates were £9,723,000; in 1849, £8,881,000; in 1850, £8,900,000; while this year they amounted to £14,700,000. The number of men had been decreased, but the expenditure had increased. The cost for pay and allowances to each man in the British army was £33 15*s.* 3*d.*; but it was only £16 for each man in the French army. This related to pay only; but the Estimates showed that the total cost exceeded £100. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had said the increase in the Indian depôts could not be helped; increasing, therefore, the pressure upon the Indian taxpayer. But he (Colonel Sykes) would wish to know why 65,000 were required in India at present when 43,000 had been found sufficient to break the neck of the Mutiny and take Delhi before a single company of reinforcements had arrived from Europe. One reason adduced for the increase in the Estimates was the advance in the price of provisions. This was singular; because last year, owing to the great compulsory slaughter of cattle, the markets were glutted, and meat was lower in price than it was the year before. ["No, no!"] Gentlemen said "No, no!" but he referred them to the Leadenhall Market Reports. If this argument was worth anything, it should also hold good in the case of the navy; but this was not the case to a proportionate extent. With regard to the question of recruiting, his own opinion was that the soldier's first term of service should be twelve years; that he should be allowed to marry after that period to induce him to remain in the army; and that at the end of twenty years he should receive his pension, or get a bonus to enable him to set up in trade. The sons of such soldiers, brought up and educated in their father's regiment, would naturally follow their father's footsteps, and also become soldiers. He would suggest that every recruit on entering the army should be induced to put his bounty money into a savings bank, so that at the expiration of his period of service something might be standing to his account. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman said that a regiment coming from abroad 900 strong would be reduced to 600, and that the 300 men who were taken off might be induced to enter the reserve. But he seemed to forget that the regiment so reduced must in turn go abroad again, and for this purpose would require to be advanced to its original strength of 900. The one operation would therefore necessarily balance the other.

MR. CHILDERS expressed his satisfaction with the statement which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had made, and his regret that it was the last occasion on which he would make such a statement. He desired to ask the right hon. and gallant Gentleman whether he saw his way to adopt the recommendation made last year by a joint Committee from the Treasury, War Office, and Horse Guards, under which the stoppage of pay to the soldiers would be made uniform, whether he was on furlough, in hospital, or on active duty at home or abroad; and also whether uniformity would be adopted in the issuing of rations? The right hon. and gallant Gentleman omitted to refer to one item of considerable increase—namely, the Vote for half-pay and military allowance to reduced and retired officers of the army. There was a very considerable increase in the amount for the retirement of the officers of the Royal Artillery and the Royal Engineers. This year it was £55,900, whereas last year it was only £48,000. He wished to know whether the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had had under his consideration the system of retirement in the artillery and engineers; and whether he would be prepared to enter into any details as to the future system under which such retirement would be regulated? As to the Engineering train, he (Mr. Childers) was inclined to think, so far from its being an expensive corps, it was a very economical one, and that its maintenance on the present small scale was most necessary.

GENERAL PEEL said, the noble Lord opposite the late Secretary for War had asked him why he had separated the Supplementary Estimate from the ordinary Estimates; now he (General Peel) thought the debate that evening afforded the best justification of the course adopted. It was done for the express purpose of placing before the House the new proposition which he had the honour of submitting, and it would be far more convenient to discuss that proposal apart from the ordinary service of the year. If the details connected with this additional 2*d.* had been mixed up with the ordinary Estimates, they would only have deceived the House instead of affording an opportunity for full consideration. It was quite possible that when the Supplemental Estimate came forward for discussion some better method of applying the money might be suggested in the course of debate, and an opportunity would thus be afforded of doing so. He had been asked why the soldiers were not now employed in the different trades with which they were acquainted. In reply to his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Captain Vivian) he was happy to say that soldiers were being largely employed as clerks, and the system had been found perfectly successful. He had not appointed a single clerk who was not a soldier, and he was happy to say that they fulfilled their duties very satisfactorily. All the messengers in the lower part of the office were also soldiers. He had listened with the greatest possible attention to all the remarks offered that night, and he was only sorry that he was not in a position to act upon any of them. He believed the employment of the A and B troop of engineers in the way alluded to was both beneficial and economical. Then lest any false impression should exist, he felt bound to say, on the subject of barrack damages, that what the Government proposed was, if possible, to employ soldiers to repair their own barrack damages, not to do away with those damages altogether. He was glad to say, in answer to one question that had been raised, that new musketry instructions had been issued, which would tend greatly to reduce the drill of old practised soldiers. The suggestion made with reference to good-conduct pay was more for the consideration of the Horse Guards than the War Office; but he might say that the Commander-in-Chief had approved the Commissioners' recommendation upon the matter. In regard to the Army Reserved Fund, the Vote appeared to be dying a natural death. He agreed with his noble Friend in thinking that that was a question which deserved the attention of the Government and that House, because it affected very materially the system of purchase in the army. The more commissions they had to give away at Sandhurst the more they would be promoting the interests of the army. The price of the old cavalry commissions, which was higher than that of the infantry commissions, was now put upon the same footing, and the difference paid out of the Reserve Fund, which might render it necessary to retain it. The Commissioners' Report on Recruiting had been subjected to much adverse comment during the debate; but he thought the Commissioners deserved great praise for the way in which they had conducted their inquiries, and also for the value of their suggestions. He had listened, however, with great attention to all the remarks which had been made during the discussion, and promised to impress upon his successor the necessity for considering, and, if possible, carrying out the many suggestions which had been made.

MR. AYRTON said, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman had omitted to answer the question whether the plan he proposed would have the effect of altering the law relating to the militia or the other law for the organization of the army; and, if so, whether the Bill for the plan would be laid before the House before the proposal was considered?

GENERAL PEEL: Certainly; any Bill to carry out the recommendations I propose in regard to the reserve force will be laid before the House previous to the subject being discussed.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow ;

METROPOLITAN POOR BILL—[BILL 9.]

(Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Earle.)

Order for Committee read.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in moving that the House should go into Committee upon the Bill, said, that at that late hour he would not proceed with the discussion of the clauses. He only asked that they should go into Committee pro forma, in order that the Bill with the Amendments on the paper might be re-printed. In respect to the buildings and works to be raised under the Bill, it was desirable the House should come to a conclusion upon it as speedily as possible. He hoped, then, that the House would be prepared to proceed with it to-morrow.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked the noble Lord at the head of the Government for any information he might have received from Ireland.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I have not received anything from Ireland this morning; but I requested the Secretary of State for the Home Department to send to me here the latest information he might have received, and I have this instant received from him this telegram—

"No important event reported, except at Killeely, eight miles from Limerick Junction, where a number of men are assembled. Troops have gone to the place. Some farmhouses and barns have been robbed in the neighbourhood of Abbeyfeale. The neighbourhood of Dublin, including Drogheda, tranquil."

The telegram is without date.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in rising to move for a Copy of a Note addressed to the Porte by the Three Powers, Great Britain, France, and Russia, on the 8th of April, 1830; and to call the attention of the House to the Papers (presented to Parliament by Her Majesty's command) respecting the late Insurrection in the Island of Crete, said: My Lords, having read with very close attention the Papers which have been laid upon the table of your Lordships' House, I confess I am compelled to question the propriety of the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government upon one point, but upon one point only. The advice given by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of the Porte has on all occasions been timely, just, and humane; and I think I may add that as regards the suggestion made by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office for the settlement of the Cretan question—as far, at least, as the question can be settled under present circumstances—I really do not know that any better suggestion could have been made. My objection to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government has reference, as I have already stated, to one point alone; but that point appears to me to be of so great importance, not only in itself, but also as regards the principles connected with it, that I felt it incumbent upon me to bring it under the consideration of your Lordships; and I think I shall best do so first by giving to your Lordships a short narrative of events, not necessarily in the order in which they occurred, but in the order in which they became known to Her Majesty's Government; and secondly, by directing the attention of your Lordships to the general principles to be applied to those events. But, before doing so, there are one or two observations of a general character which I trust I may be allowed to make upon this question. We all know that the Christian provinces of Turkey are in a state of chronic disaffection and of occasional insurrection; nor need I explain to the House what the causes of that disaffection are. First of all, there is the fact which is alluded to and dwelt upon by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office in these despatches—namely, that in these provinces there is a large majority of Christians, having no share whatever in the government, but ruled over by a Mussulman minority. Secondly, there is the fact that in these provinces there are generally great and real and practical grievances suffered by the people. And lastly, there is the fact of a free Greece, which, however ill-governed it may be—and I believe that next to Turkey it is perhaps the worst-governed country in Europe—is in close proximity to those provinces; while such is human nature that men prefer almost any grievances to the state of subjection in which these provinces are now placed. Whenever an insurrection occurs in the Christian provinces of Turkey we are always told by the partisans of Greece that the inhabitants are groaning under innumerable practical grievances; and, on the other hand, we are always told by the partisans of Turkey that the people had no grievances whatever to complain of, but that the insurrection has been entirely raised by the Greek nation. Now, I believe the truth lies between these two statements. You cannot separate the exclusive dominion of a Mussulman majority, the practical grievances which the Christian inhabitants labour under, and the example of free Greece. These causes act and re-act, and you cannot separate them, because each one of them has had some share in producing the insurrections which have taken place from time to time. Now, as to the grievances complained of, let me, in passing, make one remark. Even in those cases where the Turkish Government means to act fairly the administration under that Government is generally so bad and corrupt as to perpetuate those grievances rather than redress them. I need not state to you in detail the nature of those grievances, because they are stated in this blue book; and the very same grievances have uniformly been complained of by the inhabitants of all the Christian provinces in Turkey. The principal are excessive taxation of farmings of the revenue of compulsory ports of export, to which there were bad roads; but, above all, there is a universal allegation that the promise made to the Christian population in 1856, in the face of all Europe, in reference to the perfect equality before the law of Christian and Mussulman, is a promise which has not been kept. Under these circumstances, I fear we must look for frequent insurrections. And now let me say one word with regard to the spirit and temper with which we ought to regard such insurrections when they do arise. I will venture to say that every Government in this country must desire to stave off as far as it can what is called the Eastern question. But every one of these insurrections is calculated to raise the question which every statesman in this country must be desirous to postpone. This is a natural feeling on the part of every Foreign Minister, and to a certain extent it is legitimate. All I say is that when insurrections do take place, as they will do in the Christian provinces of Turkey, we should remember the high probability that they are justified by the grievances which the Christian populations have to endure. Indeed, we know that under the Turkish Government such grievances must exist. If we had to endure even a thousandth part of those grievances we should be rising against the governing power, and therefore we ought always to look upon these insurrections as only a natural attempt on the part of the people to throw off a government which to them is certainly odious, and to a large extent really oppressive. Therefore, we ought not to regard these insurrections solely in a selfish spirit, or merely as injuries to ourselves because of their inconvenience. It must necessarily be inconvenient to have the Eastern question raised; but still, when these insurrections occur we are bound to look that question in the face and to perform our duty, whatever it may be, after due consideration and reflection. My Lords, I do not make this remark in reference to any despatch which has proceeded from the British Government. Indeed, the tone of those despatches has been uniformly gentle, considerate, and humane. But I regret to find in the blue book some remarks of a French diplomatist which do not appear to me to be deserving the same praise. Having said thus much, I will narrate to the House the circumstances respecting this Cretan insurrection. The disaffection and the discontent of the people of Crete have been, as your Lordships are aware, of long standing. I think that, since the year 1830, there have been two or three insurrections, and several assemblages of people which almost amounted to insurrections, and which compelled the Turkish Government to make some concessions. Very early in 1866 these feelings of discontent seem to have reached a head, and in the month of May, I believe, the Christian inhabitants assembled, as they are accustomed to do in Crete, in large bodies, and addressed to the Sultan a petition complaining of their grievances, and, in perfectly respectful language, asking for redress. Now, as far as I can learn, the allegations contained in that petition have never been contradicted. Well, no answer was given to that petition by the Government at Constantinople for a period of between two and three months; and when at last the reply did come, it was in the shape of an order to the inhabitants to disperse and lay down their arms—for I ought to have mentioned, that the Cretans always go armed—but no promise was given that any of the grievances complained of should be redressed. On this point I will read the opinion of Lord Lyons, our Minister at Constantinople—and certainly Lord Lyons was not the man to overstate the matter. On the contrary, he would be likely to mean a little more than he said. His words were—

“The instruction contains a peremptory summons to the Christians to disperse, but they do not hold out much hope that the grievances alleged in the Memorial will be seriously examined or redressed.”—p. 27.

Well, when that answer arrived in Crete the assembly broke up, took up arms, and betook themselves to the mountains, where a few days afterwards they expressed their determination to fight for their own independence and their annexation to the kingdom of Greece. That happened in the beginning of September. Here, however, I wish to remark—what ought always to be borne in mind—that all these wars in the Christian provinces of Turkey assume an internecine character. They are emphatically savage wars, embittered by the antagonism of race against race, and religion against religion, and the most terrible brutalities are committed on both sides. There is always one special circumstance which aggravates very much the horrors of war, and that on the side of the Turks. In putting down such insurrections the Turkish Government employs not only their regular troops, but also Albanians, Circassians, and other semi-savage hordes, whose brutality very far exceeds that of the regular soldiers. This aggravation of the horrors of war does not exist on the part of the native population. So far as I can see in the papers before your Lordships' House, the intentions of the Turkish Government—by that I mean of the few enlightened Turks who form the Government at Constantinople—are, on the whole, humane. In the blue book there is repeated mention of instances in which volunteers from Greece, who, having been interfering in the war and having been caught by the Turkish troops, were treated in a most humane manner by Mustapha Pasha; and I find cases too, I rejoice to say, in which Egyptian officers who had been interfering, as the Cretans had a right to think unduly, were treated by the Christian population in the most humane and handsome manner, after the latter had captured them and thus got them into their power. It appears that it was on the 22nd of September Her Majesty's Government first heard that the insurrection had assumed the character of a civil war. Instructions were at once issued by the Foreign Office, in which it was laid down that we should pursue a course of complete neutrality between the two parties. On the 29th of September our Government heard that the Turkish Government had landed in Crete between 5,000 and 6,000 of those mercenary troops to which I have referred. On the 2nd of October Her Majesty's Government heard from Consul Dickson at Crete that murder and rapine prevailed over the island, and that there was a general flight from all the villages of such of the Christian families as could escape to the neighbouring country of Greece. On the 9th of October Her Majesty's Government heard that 1,200 more Albanian mercenaries were to be hired by the Turkish Government, and let loose on the Christian population of Crete. On the 12th of October they received from our Minister at Athens a despatch which I think must have opened their eyes to the spirit in which this war was too likely to be conducted. Mr. Erskine writes—

“I am informed by the French flag-captain on this station that there is so much ill-feeling towards all Christians, on the part of the Egyptian troops in Crete, that even the commander of the French gunboat Biche was insulted by some of these men, when on shore in Suda Bay; and that to avoid the repetition of such conduct, the Turkish Admiral has undertaken to send off water to the Biche, and thus prevent the necessity for the landing of her crew. If such be the conduct of the Egyptians towards the French sailors, it is quite conceivable that they may have been guilty of any of the excesses against native Christians, which have been laid to their charge."—p. 52.

My Lords, on the 20th of October the Government heard of another most significant fact. Your Lordships are probably aware that about one-fourth of the inhabitants of the island of Crete are Mussulmans. In consequence of what was actually going on, and of what was coming, the Mussulman authorities were taking care that the Mussulman women and children should be put out of reach of the war. Of this the Government were informed by Lord Lyons in his despatch of that date. On the 26th they were informed by Mr. Erskine that Consul General Saunders had reported to the Government that mercenaries were being shipped from Albania for the purpose of carrying on the war against Crete; and he added, that the Porte would do well to reflect before having recourse to the assistance of these reckless, sanguinary mercenaries; that even any momentary success obtained through their agency might be dearly purchased by the additional exasperation which could not fail to be imported into the conflict by the use of such allies. On the same day the Government heard from Lord Lyons his opinion, that the contest was being carried on with an animosity on both sides productive of most deplorable consequences. On the same day the Government received the first petition from the Cretans, praying that Her Majesty's ships might be allowed to remove from Crete any Christian women and children who might escape to the shore and find refuge on board ship. Three days after that petition was received the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary—of course, after consultation with the Government—despatched his first refusal to allow Her Majesty's ships to remove those women and children. The noble Lord's refusal was founded on the ground that to do so would be virtually a violation of the principle of neutrality. I think it only fair to say, with reference to the course taken by Her Majesty's Government, that the request had come through a channel that was most objectionable. The Cretan people petitioned, through the King of Greece, asking His Majesty to use his influence with the protecting Powers to send ships for the purpose to which I have alluded. Again, up to that time—whatever might be the probabilities of the future—Her Majesty's Government had not heard of any fact showing that any attack had been made, or was intended to be made, on the women and children. Therefore, though I cannot agree in the conclusion at which they arrived, I can understand the principle upon which they acted. But, my Lords, whilst this direct refusal to comply with the prayer of the petition was sent to Greece, no discretion was given to our local authorities on the spot—no instructions were given to Lord Lyons to the effect that he might exercise his own discretion in extreme cases; no directions were given to Consul Dickson, a person of the highest character, that under circumstances of an urgent character he might exercise his own judgment in respect of those unfortunate people. No such direction was given to our local authorities, but a simple blank refusal was returned to the petition. On the 31st of October Her Majesty's Government heard from Consul Dickson that whole villages were being destroyed, and of specific acts of atrocity with which he would not trouble the House. On the 6th of November there was an account of the wholesale burning of, I think, ten or twelve Christian villages; and on the 9th of November Her Majesty's Government heard from Lord Lyons that he had remonstrated with the Porte against the employment of those sanguinary mercenaries. On the 11th of November they received this news from Mr. Erskine—

"M. Manos, an officer in the Greek artillery, who was taken prisoner in the redoubt at Vrysses, has written to his family to say that he has been most humanely, and even generously, treated by Mustapha Pasha, to whom he stated that, for three days before the engagement, neither he nor his companions had tasted food. Another officer, Colonel Zimbrakaki, writes that, in the mountains, the unfortunate women and children are dying by scores every night from want and exposure, many of the poor creatures being literally without covering of any sort. Another, a German volunteer, endeavours to comfort his friends by the assurance that there is but little danger of his being shot, as the insurgents are careful to keep at a respectful distance from the enemy. On the other hand, I have seen letters from three different persons in Candia, all foreigners, who speak of the conduct of the Turkish and Egyptian troops as simply atrocious. One gentleman describes the massacre of 200 persons, chiefly old men, women, and children, and the barbarities committed by the troops as beyond all belief. Another states that the Turks refused all quarter to the Christians, and mercilessly chopped off the heads of the unfortunate wounded as well as dead, a reward of 100 lira having been offered for each head thus brought to the camp. The writer of this letter adds, it is true, that similar barbarities are committed by the Christians. If these statements at all resemble the truth, it may be conceived how difficult it will be ever to reconcile the Christians to the Turkish rule, or to persuade them to live harmoniously with native Mussulmans whom they accuse of such horrors."—p. 193.

On the 14th of November the Government heard from Consul Dickson of the severe privations which the poor Christian families were suffering in the mountains. On the 17th of November Consul Lloyd reported to the same effect from Syra. Now, on the same day, 17th November, the Government, in a despatch from Lord Lyons, heard what course he was disposed to take under the circumstances of the case. Lord Lyons had been informed of the nature of the petition sent to England, and he says—

"The original of Mr. Erskine's despatch must have been in your Lordships' hands before the copy of it reached me; and had this been otherwise it would have been beyond my province to decide upon the prayer of the petition, and out of my power to give effect to it. I have, however, lost no opportunity of pressing upon the Porte the importance of taking thought for the families deprived of food and shelter, and I have sent instructions to Her Majesty's Consul in Crete to urge the Ottoman authorities to take, and to take himself, every feasible and proper measure to save the women and children not only from insult or injury, but also from hunger and cold."—p. 97.

Now, my Lords, it appears from that despatch that on receipt of the petition at Constantinople Lord Lyons, knowing the character of those mercenary troops who had been let loose, had not contented himself with making representations to the Porte, but had sent those instructions to the Consul at Crete, which left him a wide discretion, and gave him powers of independent action. On the 6th of December, a fortnight after the last despatch, the Government heard that Consul Dickson, acting under the orders of Lord Lyons, had placed himself in immediate communication with the commander of one of the gunboats on the station, with a view to relieve persons upon the coast; but he had hardly done so when the order from home arrived that perfect neutrality was to be maintained, and the interpretation put upon that was that no such step should be taken. Consul Dickson also, on receipt of the order, and finding that there were at the moment no specific applications from families wishing to be taken off, cancelled the orders which he had given. Six days afterwards, however, the Government heard from Consul

Dickson that he had determined to disobey the orders which he had received from them. I wish to direct your Lordships' attention to the remarkable despatch in which he explains the reasons for his conduct. He says—

"During the brief stay here of the Imperial Commissioner and the Commander of the Egyptian contingent, I ventured to make a few remarks officiously to their Excellencies. I stated that the insurrection must have, by this time, attracted the notice of Europe, and every incident connected therewith, whether good or evil, would surely sooner or later be divulged. That although I entertained no doubt of the strict orders issued by the commanders in regard to the maintenance of discipline, and that humanity should not be outraged in any way, there might be instances in which such orders would be disregarded. I alluded more particularly to the treatment of Christians wounded on the field, and when made prisoners, including women and children. That the presence of Bashi-Bazouks with the army appeared to me to be all the more uncalled for, that their unfitness in legitimate warfare had been acknowledged, and the misdeeds they so often committed might reflect seriously on the conduct of the present war."—p. 124.

"The refectory hall, with its tables and benches, was found intact, but the floor was strewn over with the mangled bodies of Christians, all stripped naked. It is said that the Bashi-Bazouks signally distinguished themselves in that particular act of butchery and plunder. Some women and children have also been massacred."—p. 124.

Another paragraph says—

"All the strict orders and humane exhortations issued by the Imperial Commissioner and his son Salih Pasha have been in many instances unavailing to restrain the infuriated soldiery from acts of barbarism. In the church at Therisso, during the engagement, a priest and a woman were hacked to pieces, and there burnt, the murderers observing at the time that they were only roasting pigs."—p. 125.

He goes on to say—

"In my anxiety to save the lives of some at least of these misguided men, now that the Imperial troops are about to encounter them in their last strongholds at Kissamos and Selino, I have ventured to transgress the instructions conveyed to me by Captain Hillyar (as per my despatch of the 17th ult.), and have now addressed a letter to the commander of Her Majesty's ship Assurance. Your Lordship will perceive thereby that the circumstance is one of extreme urgency, and I therefore hope that my conduct may be pardoned."—p. 126.

I have now to direct your Lordships' attention to the report of Commander Pym, acting under orders of Consul Dickson, showing what horrors were prevented, but would have taken place had the instructions from the Home Govern-

"At the request of Her Majesty's Consul he proceeded on a cruise to the western and south-western coast of Crete, for the purpose of affording shelter to any person whose life might be endangered by the part he had taken in the civil war now raging in that island; that, on his anchoring at Selino Castelli on the 10th inst., he was requested to take off a number of women and children and wounded men, who were living in caves and grottoes in the mountains, and whose lives would certainly be forfeited in the event of Mustapha Pasha defeating the body of insurgents now defending the mountain passes of Selino, only two hours off. Commander Pym felt so persuaded that these unfortunate persons would either perish from exposure or would be massacred by the Turks, that he consented to carry off as many as his vessel could contain, and he eventually embarked 25 men (all wounded or maimed), 160 women, and the rest children. Many more would have come if there had been room for them, and, in fact, about 1,000 more are now waiting at Suja, in the hope that the Assurance will go back and rescue them."

In consequence of the instructions given by Consul Dickson, and carried out by Commander Pym, we find that between 300 and 400 persons were thus providentially rescued by the agency of that British vessel. In a few days afterwards the Government were informed by Mr. Erskine of their arrival at Athens in a state of extreme destitution. It is worthy of remark that at that time the Turks spoke of the removal as a proceeding to which they had no objection. They entered no protest whatever against it, believing that Consul Dickson was simply acting on a principle of humanity, and knowing that instructions in that sense had been sent to him some time before by Lord Lyons. But as soon as they heard of the counter instructions from the Government at home to Lord Lyons and our Consuls, they of course began to express objections to the course that had been pursued. On the 29th of December a second request to sanction the removal of some of these people reached the Government, this time from Lord John Hay, who was connected with a charitable fund for their relief. Addressing the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, he said—

"If you could send a ship, or let one call round the coast with, if necessary, a Turkish official on board, in order to carry off these people, the last difficulty would have been disposed of."
—p. 134.

The people referred to in that letter were about 1,000 women and children, who were anxiously awaiting the return of Her Majesty's ship Assurance at Selino. On the 2nd of January the Government again refused, and on the same grounds. On the 4th of January the Government again received from Lord Lyons the expression of his opinion as to the inhumanity with which the war was characterized. On the 7th of January, Consul Dickson's defence of his own conduct and account of the grounds upon which he had acted was received. That gentleman referred to the attitude and language of the Turkish Government, and then proceeded to say—

• All the above-stated considerations, however serious they might be, had no weight on my conscience when I felt the cries of humanity were at stake. After the heartrending accounts that reached me of the tragic affair at Arkadi, and seeing despite my remonstrances, and contrary to the wishes even of Mustapha Pasha, that a host of Bashi-Bazouks (with a strong sprinkling of Selinotes burning with the desire to expel from their homes the Giaour intruders) was swelling the expeditionary force as it marched on to Selino; these appeared to me cogent reasons for despatching the Assurance on Her Majesty's service. The Imperial Government, and I trust your Lordship likewise, are sufficiently satisfied with the conduct I have observed hitherto, and even long before the insurrection broke out to need any further protestations of loyalty on my part. For while I have always deemed it a duty to uphold the legitimate authority of the Sultan, I equally desire to see the general system in operation make way for a more enlightened Turkish Administration in Crete, conducted on Christian principles."—p. 144.

I cannot, my Lords, offer these observations without expressing my sincere admiration of the conduct of Consul Dickson under these circumstances. His conduct did him the highest honour, and showed an amount of moral courage of which few men would have been capable. There were many men who would face any danger in war who would not have done what Consul Dickson has done. For myself, I admire the act of Consul Dickson more than I do the act of Nelson, when before the batteries of Copenhagen he refused to see the signal of recall. On the 8th of January Lord Stanley answered the letter of Consul Dickson, saying, as to the removal of the wounded men and women, and children, desirous of leaving the island—

"I had been under the impression that this operation took place with the entire sanction of the Turkish authority, but, from the enclosures in your letter, there seems some doubt in the matter. But, be that as it may, I am willing to make every allowance for the motives by which you were actuated; and, although the proceeding was perhaps in strictness open to objection as being not altogether consistent with the neutrality of the British Government in regard to the contest in Crete, yet, looking to all the circumstances of the case, and to the difficulty of your position, I will not disapprove your conduct."—p. 150.

The circumstances of the case! But were not those circumstances precisely such as the Government knew Consul Dickson would certainly, or at least in all probability be placed? It appears to me that if, under those circumstances, the conduct of Consul Dickson was held to be justifiable, acting, as he did, in direct opposition to the orders of the Government, it is a clear proof that those orders had been wrong—or at least too stringent. They ought at least to have vested in him all the discretionary power compatible with the circumstances of the case. Lord Stanley goes on to say—

"I will only further express my hope that you will carefully avoid being led into any course of action incompatible with the neutral character which it is incumbent on you to uphold."—p. 150.

Now, considering that it was known that other women and children were hoping that they would be carried away as their companions had been, I maintain that some more definite instructions than these should have been sent to Consul Dickson with reference to them. No instruction whatever was sent to him; he was simply given a general order to maintain neutrality. This was placing Consul Dickson in a position hardly fair to a public servant; because, although he knew that the Government had at first deemed the removal of women and children a violation of neutrality, he also knew that when they came to know what he had done they declined to disapprove his conduct. He was therefore left in a most embarrassing position, with most ambiguous instructions, and the whole circumstances of his situation were trying in the extreme. On the 14th January the Government heard from Lord Lyons certain information which proves that the English Government was in the whole of this matter far more Turkish than the Government at Constantinople. In the last paragraph I read—

"Aali Pasha has not made any remonstrance to me against the proceeding of Her Majesty's ship Assurance, and I have not been desirous of bringing on a discussion of the subject with him. I contented myself yesterday with observing that if, in fact, the insurrection was completely suppressed, the removal of dangerous characters and of destitute women and children must be a benefit to all parties."—p. 152.

This is dated the 2nd of January, so that at that time the Turkish Government knew what Consul Dickson had done, and that the Russian Government was about to follow the example he had set; this knowledge, however, led to no remonstrance whatever, and it appears to me that if, instead of acting against the instructions of his Government, Consul Dickson had acted with them, the Turkish Government would have had quite as little ground to consider what actually occurred as a violation of neutrality. Immediately afterwards the Government heard that the action of Her Majesty's ship Assurance had very naturally drawn to the shore a number of women and children, scantily dressed, and half starved, in the hope they would be afforded protection in the same way as the others. In the mountains whence they had come they were able to secure a scanty maintenance; but on the shore they had absolutely nothing. Thus they were entrapped into a worse position than before, simply because no further instructions had been sent out to the Consul. These unfortunate women were left to their fate. On the 21st of January the Government received another petition, making the same prayer as its predecessors, and two days afterwards was made the final answer of the Government, which I will read. Lord Stanley writes—

"In reply, I have to acquaint you that, even if Her Majesty's Government had seen reason to alter the decision which has already been communicated to you in regard to the removing of refugees from Greece, the necessity for their doing so would now appear to be much less required, inasmuch as they learn from Lord Lyons that the Greek Minister at Constantinople has been informed by the United States Minister that all refugees who may present themselves will be received on board the ships of the American squadron, which has been ordered to Candia for that purpose."—p. 167.

Thus we have official record of the fact that those offices of common humanity which were refused by the British Government were willingly undertaken by the fleet and the Consul of the United States.

Having concluded my narrative of the facts, I now address myself to the principles which appear to me to be applicable to the events which I have related. I confess that when I read this account I was afraid that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office had committed himself in some extraordinary manner to the purest abstract doctrines of non-intervention, which were at one time, I believe, erroneously attributed to him. I rejoice, however, to find that this reproach is wholly undeserved by the noble Lord. On reading the despatches I find that nothing can be more reasonable and more free than his correspondence from any abstract theory of non-intervention, which, in my opinion, is most unwise and unstatesmanlike. All such cases as these should be judged upon their own merits, and not upon any abstract doctrine. The noble Lord, I am glad to say, has been most reasonable as far as statements of principle are concerned. I find, at page 33 of the blue book, that the French Government wished their suggestion to the Porte, with a view to procure inquiry into the grievances of the Christians, to be endorsed by Her Majesty's Government. Upon this Lord Stanley wrote to Lord Cowley, giving an account of his reply to the French Minister here. He said—

"I was as yet scarcely in a position to judge satisfactorily of the sufficiency of the causes which had led to the insurrectionary movements in Crete, but that I thought the proposition of the French Government one which, in its nature, was not open to serious objection, while it indicated the interest taken by the protecting Powers in the well-being of the subjects of the Porte."—p. 33.

I see no allusion there to the abstract doctrine of non-intervention. Lord Stanley did not meet the French Government by saying, "We have adopted a new policy in this country, and propose in future to have nothing whatever to do with the affairs of other nations." That was not the line he took, and I rejoice that I can say so. But I find a remarkable despatch on page 39, in reference to a proposition made to him by Baron Brunow, the Russian Minister in London. Baron Brunow, in his remarks to Lord Stanley, uses the well-worn arguments of the Russian Government in reference to the East. He repeats the arguments used by the Russian Government in the case of the disturbances in the Christian provinces in Turkey; he lays down the principle that "the point of departure should be the engagements contracted in 1830;" and then he lays down the principle—which, as it appears to me, is just up to a certain extent—that in the face of the obligations which were contracted by the Turkish Government before Europe in 1857, the European Powers have a right, I will not say of intervention, but of interest, in all those questions which entitle them to be heard if they choose to speak. What, then, is the answer which Lord Stanley makes to this? He says—

"I agreed with him in principle as to the expediency of joint action among the three Powers in the event of necessity for such action arising."

And, at the close of the despatch, he adds—

"It is far better that whatever is done should be done by the Porte itself, whose authority will be weakened rather than strengthened by foreign intervention. That intervention, however, will not be refused should circumstances appear imperatively to demand it."—p. 39.

I rejoice to find in these despatches an emphatic though implied contradiction of a dogma which has been commonly laid down of late years—that England should pursue a policy of total abstention from the affairs of the East; and that our relations with Turkey are of such a nature as to place our obligations and our duty of neutrality towards her precisely in the same position as that in which we should stand to any of the more civilized Powers of Europe. Your Lordships will observe that Lord Stanley speaks of such intervention as the French and Russian Governments at one time contemplated as, under certain circumstances, justifiable—that is, if the necessity should arise. I accordingly asked myself what were the circumstances which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, would justify intervention with the internal affairs of Turkey; and I found an answer, with which I perfectly agree, in a despatch from Lord Stanley to Lord Lyons. The noble Lord says—

"I could not deny the possibility of such occurrences, but said that it did not seem to me possible to refuse to the Porte the right which every State possessed of putting down insurrection by armed force, provided the use of force did not degenerate into mere brutality, and that the recognised customs of war were observed."

This is precisely the point; I assent to every word of this passage:—but, I ask, when the despatches I have quoted clearly show that Bashi-Bazouks, Circassians, and Albanians were let loose upon the Christian population of Crete, and were proved by eye-witnesses to be in the habit of murdering the wounded, the women, and children, whether the war was conducted on principles of civilized warfare, and whether Her Majesty's Government were not fully justified—nay, even compelled, as a public duty—to interfere in such a case?

But now I come to another ground. I have pleaded the cause of those women and children upon the grounds of humanity only; but I am also prepared to maintain that there are other grounds, and that there are other reasons, which ought to have induced Her Majesty's Government to have, at the very least, given a certain discretion to our authorities upon the spot.

I cannot deny, nor do I see how it can be denied, that there is some force in the appeals which the Cretans made to the transactions of 1830. Your Lordships will probably remember that in 1830 the Cretan population had very nearly achieved their independence. They had obtained possession of the whole country, with the exception of a few fortresses, which were occupied by Turkish troops. It was at that time in the contemplation of the three Powers to have included Crete among the islands which were made free. Very much, however, against the opinion of Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, and other statesmen of the time, it was determined that this course should not be adopted; and I fully admit that there were special circumstances connected with Crete, especially the fact that the population was to the extent of nearly a quarter composed of Mussulmans, which justified the course that was adopted. But that course was not determined upon without serious remonstrance on the part of the Cretans; and the three Powers agreed to address to the Porte a collective Note, for a copy of which I have moved to-night—a Motion which, as your Lordships are aware, is merely formal, inasmuch as the document is to be found in the Library. The Protocol of the 8th April, 1830, constituted a considerable claim on the part of the Cretan population to the protection of the European Powers.

THE EARL OF DERBY begged to remind the noble Duke of a passage in that Protocol, which he seemed to have overlooked.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: I am aware of the language referred to; but it is not upon those words I wish to dwell. I am perfectly prepared to admit, what the noble Earl seems to imply by his interruption, that the main object of that Note was to secure to the Cretan population protection against the repetition of the occurrences which had recently taken place; but I think that the language of the Note goes beyond that, and holds out an expectation—for I will use no stronger term—to the people of Crete that their interest and welfare should in future be a matter of benevolent consideration to the Western Powers. I am not, however, going to dwell upon this point, because I put the duty of the Western Powers upon, as I think, a much stronger basis. I ask you to consider the connection between this question and the policy which was secured in Europe by the Treaty of Paris in 1856. It is now between eleven and twelve years since the termination of the Crimean War—eleven years and a half since the last grave was closed upon those melancholy hills where so many of our friends fought and fell. Twelve years form a very short period in a nation's life, still shorter in the history of Europe; but so many and so great have been the changes which have taken place, not only in the old world, but also in the new, during the time, that we seem to be separated from that period by a great length, and, indeed, almost an age of time. I have often tried to look back upon the contest and agitation of that time, and have endeavoured to judge of it as I think it will be judged in the light of history. I am not insensible to the strength of some of the arguments used by the noble Earl near me (Earl Grey), and by other eminent statesmen, against the Crimean war; but this I will say, that a very large proportion of these arguments are founded upon a total misapprehension as to what the objects of that war really were. I am bound to say, too, that the language of diplomacy and of diplomatists has only tended—in this case as in so many others—to hide and to obscure the truth. I cannot but remember that the object for which we were always said to be fighting was the integrity and independence of the Turkish Empire. Now, my Lords, we all of us know—those at least of us who have any knowledge of the affairs of Europe—that the words “integrity” and “independence,” as applied to Turkey, have not the same meaning as the words would have if applied to any other country. Its integrity is not the same; its independence never can be the same; and yet many of us who were Members of that Government, forced into the war by circumstances over which we had no control, were held to be fanatics in the belief that there was such a thing possible in the world as the regeneration of Turkey. For myself, I will say that I did not then believe, and I do not now believe, in the regeneration of Turkey. If the signs of decay and death were ever depicted upon a human countenance, if they were ever perceptible in any political society, their mark is now to be found upon the face of the Turkish Empire. But what had that to do with the Crimean war? Our object was not to preserve Turkey, except as a means to other things; our object was to resist the encroachments of Russia—to prevent Russia from serving herself heir by force and fraud to the rich and splendid inheritance of the East. And, in spite of the eloquence and logic of my noble Friend near me (Earl Grey), I am still unpersuaded that it was a matter of indifference to Europe that by force and by fraud an Empire should be established stretching from the Bosphorus to the Arctic Sea. But I never can forget, and do not now forget, that in conducting that contest and, in concert with France, in leading it to a triumphant issue, we were at the same time running counter to the natural tendencies and natural rights of a portion of the Turkish people. It is not for nothing that by the providence of God so vast a proportion of the population of the world shares in one common religious faith. And I, for one, admit that as in human affairs it is natural that certain sympathies should be established, it is still more natural that a general sympathy should always exist between persons who profess the same faith, and are members of the same church. And what have we done? The result of that war—right as I maintain it to have been for the purpose for which we entered upon it—has driven Russia from that protectorate of the Christian people in the East, to which, from the sympathies and the religion of the people, she was naturally entitled. And now, having so driven back Russia, we, the Western Nations of Europe, occupy her place to a certain extent, and to a certain extent, too, are bound to fulfil her obligations. I must confess I think it is an intolerable thing that the Western Nations of Europe, out of the jealousy which they bear to Russia, and perhaps out of the jealousy which they bear to each other, should deprive the Eastern Christians of their natural protectorate, and that they themselves should refuse to touch it with one of their fingers. I think it an intolerable thing that the Christians of the East should be left, under the pretext of neutrality, to be murdered by Bashi-Bazouks and Albanians. Every one of us must see that the dominion of Turkey has been maintained by our means, by our jealousies, by our advice, and by our determination that Russia should not exercise the protectorate which was natural under the circumstances of the case. Upon these grounds, and looking at the transactions which have taken place, and those in which we took part, supported as they were by all parties in this country—because although there was a difference of opinion whether we should go to war or not, there was no difference of opinion, except on the part of a small minority, that we were bound to resist the aggressions of Russia—under these circumstances, we are bound to consider such claims as I have brought before you with more than mere humane feelings for the sufferings which on such occasions are endured.

But before I sit down there is another point to which I feel bound to call your Lordships' attention. No doubt an impression prevails at the present day—not merely in respect of one particular Government or of one Foreign Minister—that the Foreign Office of this country has during the past half century been somewhat too active in its interference with foreign affairs. I feel no interest in opposing this current of public feeling, and, indeed, to some extent I go along with it; but I could not help being amused by the serious air with which a very eminent foreign diplomatist informed me lately that in the 500 or 600 pages of diplomatic matter which he had to go through in the course of the past year, the name of England had not occurred once. I confess I heard that statement with the greatest indifference. Where neither the interests nor the honour of England are concerned, I do not see why her opinion should be given, or her action required; but I trust that the Foreign Office will never shrink from defending to the utmost her honour and her interest where they are in any way imperilled. Let us not forget what we are going to do. We are about to bring the House of Commons into much closer relations with the great mass of the people. Ignorant and prejudiced men are in the habit of telling the people of this country that the past wars in which we have been engaged were the work of the aristocracy and of the upper classes—my Lords, there is not one of the wars, not even the most foolish or wicked in which this country has been engaged, which has not been at the time thoroughly popular. We are about to bring the House of Commons into closer connection with the masses, whose feelings are quicker, whose sympathies are warmer, and, shall I add—yes, I will add—and whose instincts sometimes are truer than those of the classes immediately above them. I shall be much mistaken and I shall be much disappointed if the change which we are about to undergo in the direction of democracy is to inaugurate a foreign policy founded upon pure selfishness. I believe, on the contrary, that you will find the masses of the people of this country quicker in both their anger and their sympathies than the class above them; and this I do say, that if you are to found the doctrine of non-intervention upon secure grounds, and to guard it against the reaction which is sure to come, you must take care that your conduct shall not represent that policy as sacrificing the rights of others, and doing violence to the consciences and to the hearts of men.

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of a Note addressed to the Porte by the Three Powers Great Britain, France, and Russia on the 8th April, 1830.—(The Duke of Argyll.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords—The noble Duke has moved for papers which he plainly confesses are not of the slightest importance, as they are already in the Library of your Lordships' House, and can be referred to, and which fully record the transactions of the period, and all the events to which the noble Duke has referred. But I must confess that I was not prepared by the Notice which the noble Duke gave for the very discursive, though very able, address that he has just offered to your Lordships, and which it appears to me goes far beyond the question under immediate consideration—the affairs of Crete. The noble Duke has stated that it is his earnest desire to postpone, as far as possible, the agitation of the Eastern question; but if that be his desire he has not acted strictly up to his intentions, for I cannot conceive that any speech by a person holding the high position of the noble Duke would have a more direct effect in stimulating discussion of the Eastern question, and of forcing on and of rousing the passions of all parties, and creating a more hopeless antagonism, than the speech which the noble Duke has thought fit to address to you this evening upon the subject of the affairs of Eastern Europe. When the noble Duke so freely commented upon the course that Her Majesty's Government had pursued, I was in hopes that he was about to tell us what course he would recommend as to the affairs of Crete. So far as I can understand the noble Duke, he considers the obligations of the Great Powers are precisely contrary to what I consider them to be. He considers that the obligations of the Great Powers go to encourage the aspirations of nationalities and insurrections in all parts of the Turkish Empire. The noble Duke tells us that the Turkish Empire is falling into a state of decadence. It is possible it may be; but it is not the duty of the British Government to lend a hand to overthrow or precipitate its fall; it is, on the contrary, rather the duty of the British Government, if that fall is to take place, to make it as easy and gradual as possible; and perhaps the very last thing to be done is to point out in the British Parliament the defects of the Turkish Government, and thus to aggravate any instances of misgovernment on the part of the Turkish authorities, and to show unbounded sympathy for those who are in open revolt against the constituted authority of the country. The noble Duke should remember that one of the conditions upon which the kingdom of Greece was established as an independent State was this—that while every protection was to be given against re-action on the part of Turkey, in consequence of the transactions that had occurred, it was also laid down as a fundamental principle that the Great Powers of Europe would not tolerate for a moment any attack or invasion on the dominions of Turkey. They settled by the Act of 1830 that it was their determination not to tolerate any such attack or aggression? Now, what is this insurrection in Candia? I am not going to defend all the acts of the Turkish Government. I do not say that there has not been much oppression and much hardship sustained by the Cretan population; but this I am bound to say—that every report that we have had from the days of Consul Longworth down to the present time has declared and shown that the complaints of the Christian population have been greatly exaggerated, that many of them, as regards taxation, are without foundation, and that, in point of fact, Crete is the least heavily taxed portion of the Turkish dominions, and that if they have no roads it is because they object to pay a tax for the making of roads. I find that among the number of complaints in the petition addressed to the Sultan in May last—and no doubt there was some foundation for some of them—that there was injustice on the part of the Pashas. No doubt there were many acts of oppression committed by the Pashas; yet I venture to say that these things were done without the authority and against the will of the Turkish Government, and that moreover even these were greatly exaggerated. But does the noble Duke mean to tell me that the removal of the grounds of these complaints is the real motive of the insurrection? No; at the very time when with all professions of loyalty to the Sovereign, they were praying humbly for the removal of these grievances; at that very time they were through other agents, addressing other Powers, and saying, "In these petitions we mean nothing; nothing will satisfy us but annexation to Greece—without that everything will be illusory." That was the real object of the Cretan population; nothing less would satisfy them than the dissolution of the ties that bind them to Turkey and annexation to Greece. The noble Duke did not confine himself to Crete; he talked of other provinces of Turkey, and the oppressions under which they were suffering. He has put himself forward as the friend of the injured, who, instead of appealing to the Government, or to the friendly offices of the Great Powers, have appealed to arms for the establishment of a Greek kingdom, and the Greeks all over the world are doing their best to light a flame throughout the Turkish dominions. What was the course of the Turkish Government on receiving that petition? The noble Duke says that for three months that petition was not answered. But when it was answered it was answered by sending over to Crete, with a message of peace and reconciliation, a man of singularly mild character, a man perfectly well known to the Cretans and who was very much attached to the population, over whom he had ruled for about thirty years. He went with his message of conciliation; he hoped that they would send in their grievances, and he promised to attend to them. He sent this message to those who were at that moment in arms, and by two chiefs who were prisoners of war, and whom he released for that purpose; but he accompanied it with a statement that so long as they remained in arms against the authority of their Sovereign it would be his imperative duty to put down rebellion with the strong hand, although at the same time he was perfectly ready to give a fair consideration to their complaints. That message was treated as a mockery; and the people in arms, instead of stating their grievances, betook themselves to the hills, and then defied the Governor of the country. What was he to do? Was he to abstain from putting down this revolt? It was his duty to assert the powers intrusted to him, and to use them as far as he could with moderation and humanity. I must say that in the whole of these papers there is nothing to prove any allegation that he acted in any other manner, but everything to disprove any barbarity on the part of superior officers. The instances are numerous in which it is shown that prisoners were treated with the greatest possible kindness, and that the noble Duke fairly admits. It was no doubt a great misfortune that the Turkish Government did not confine themselves to the employment of Turkish regular troops instead of introducing into the island bands of irregulars—Albanians and Egyptians. I certainly believe that great atrocities were occasionally committed by them upon the Cretans; and, on the other hand, there is evidence equally strong of atrocities on the part of the Cretans against the Mussulmans, the similarity of which to those committed by the Turkish irregulars seems to suggest something like rivalry in outrage. During the progress of this insurrection nothing could be more difficult than to obtain accurate information as to the real facts of the case. It was almost impossible that any accounts could be more dissimilar and contradictory than those that were received day by day from Turkish and Greek sources, and those received from the Greek friends of the insurgents are greatly exaggerated. It is perfectly well known that the support of this Cretan insurrection came from Athens and Greece. It was thence that inflammatory papers were put forth; it was thence that lying statements were issued of splendid successes which were without foundation in fact; it was thence that supplies of ammunition, arms, volunteers, and every description of military provision were sent. I think it was unfortunate that the blockade by the Porte was so inefficient that it is notorious the Panhellion made I do not know how many trips, and over and over again landed volunteers, arms, and ammunition; and when the insurrection was on the point of being suppressed, with less cruelty and more humanity, perhaps, than any revolution ever was, the fresh arrivals of these volunteers gave fresh encouragement to the insurgents. This constant stream was poured in from Greece with the connivance of the Ministers—I do not say the King, for I must do him the justice to say that he endeavoured to do a painful and difficult task with the utmost good faith and fidelity; but it is notorious that the leading men in the Greek Ministry were among the most active agents in forwarding of supplies. But for these constant supplies, and I am afraid I must say, but for language such as the noble Duke has made use of to-night, the insurrection would long since have been put an end to; and it is to them that is to be attributed in a great degree a large portion of the miseries that have befallen an unoffending population; it is owing to them that peace has not long since been restored to Candia, and that the Porte has not had an opportunity of carrying into effect those wise and judicious measures of pacification which have been pressed upon it by Her Majesty's Government in every despatch it has sent. In every one conciliation and moderate measures have been urged on the Porte; in every despatch to us the Porte has intimated its readiness and anxiety to fall in with our views as soon as it could put down armed insurrection. The very last paper in this book is a communication from Aali Pasha of the last firman, in which it is intimated that Server Effendi has been sent to Crete on a special mission; that he is instructed to make a faithful report on the actual condition of the island; that he is charged with conciliatory proposals to the inhabitants; and in particular with an invitation to them to send delegates to Constantinople to represent their wishes, wants, and grievances to the Porte. I do believe that it is the earnest desire of the Porte to deal equitably and impartially between the Mussulman and the Christian populations in Crete; but the fanaticism on the one side and the other, the feelings of mutual hostility and exasperation, render it extremely difficult for the most popular and benevolent Governor in Candia not only to keep down revolts of the Christians, but also to curb the fanaticism of the Mahomedans; and your Lordships may depend upon it that if you attempt to give encouragement and support in any form to the separation of Crete from the Turkish Empire, you encourage that which cannot take place without a war more sanguinary and envenomed than the Christian world has ever yet known. Scattered over the face of the island, there is a Christian population three times the number of the Mussulman population and, on the other hand, you have the Turks, proud of their superiority of race, possessed of all the important posts of the island, united in themselves, armed and warlike. Do you believe that if all Europe were leagued against the Turks they would tamely submit to be expelled as a governing class from the island of Crete and subjected to the dominion of the King of Greece? The idea is preposterous. Does the noble Duke think it is our duty, does he think it is consistent with our obligations, to favour and support the separation of Candia from Turkey against the will of the Turkish Government? [The Duke of ARGYLL: No!] Well, I should like to know what is the course the noble Duke desires to recommend. He says he does not complain of the despatches nor of the course pursued; on the contrary, he says these are deserving of credit; he does not complain of the wishes and desires of the Turkish Government; he says they have displayed a spirit of humanity and conciliation, but he says that in a civil war some portion of the troops — the irregular troops — have committed atrocities which every human being would say are deeply to be deplored. Well, what is the issue? What have we recommended? We have given our advice to the Turkish Government, and have left the Turkish Government to deal with it as it may think fit. We have suggested such an autonomy in Candia as exists in Samos and Albania. But there is this distinction. In Samos the population is almost wholly Christian; in Crete it is mixed, in the proportion of three-fourths Christians and one-fourth Turks, which is a difficulty in the way of introducing an autonomy. We have suggested to the Turkish Government an autonomy as the means of restoring peace and order in Candia; but we have not thought ourselves at liberty to say to the Turkish Government that they shall act on our suggestion. We have offered them our advice as friends, but we do not feel ourselves justified in judging the internal regulations and government of Turkey. If we did, we should impose upon ourselves a hopeless task, and we should contravene the principles of International Law, and take a course inconsistent with the independence of Turkey. I do not say that Turkey is in the same position as many other countries. As European Powers we may have a right to offer advice, and, if necessary, even more than advice with regard to the treatment of some of the Christian subjects of the Porte; but to endeavour to persuade the Porte to sacrifice, to amputate from its Empire, a large and important colony, is to press upon him that which Turkey will resist as long as she has a man to spare or breath to resist. If the noble Duke is desirous of raising that issue, he is raising the issue he professes to avoid—namely, the immediate and bloody renewal of the whole Eastern question. The only point on which the noble Duke found serious fault was the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government in refusing to give assistance to fugitives from Crete. As regards the action of the Foreign Office, I am sure no man ever came with deeper reluctance or greater pain to the discharge of that which he considered to be a duty imposed upon him by strict neutrality than did my noble Relative to the conclusion that he could not give aid to those fugitives. But, my Lords, he was bound to consider, and Her Majesty's Government was bound to consider, not only the sufferings of those fugitives, but what would be the effect of such interference as would be involved in giving them assistance. It was, as I have said, from Athens that this war was chiefly maintained. One of Her Majesty's ships conveyed from the coast of Crete a large body of persons, including some wounded men, but no doubt a majority of women and children; and had she continued taking fugitives to Athens and returning for fresh cargoes, in the excitement of Greece it would have been instantly said, "Here is intervention in favour of the Cretans," and we should have had the whole of Europe joining in a protest against intervention. The effect of any such encouragement given to the Cretans would have been that they would have said, "We will not for a moment relax our efforts. We see the prospect of ultimate success; we will persevere, notwithstanding all the miseries we inflict, with the satisfactory consciousness that these miseries, notwithstanding our prolongation of the war, are certain to be relieved and alleviated, and that the withdrawal of the non-combatants will leave the combatants in a better position than they were in before?" It was upon these considerations that my noble Relative felt himself bound to discharge the painful duty of disregarding the appeals that were made, and of refusing to put in the scale the sufferings of a certain number of individuals, and as against the serious consequences which would have arisen, and the evils which might have resulted to this country had he in the slightest degree taken such a part as would have been construed into actual support of the insurrection. It was a painful alternative to have to choose. I do not blame Lord Lyons for giving way to natural and humane instincts in assuming the responsibility of sending the Assurance to remove some fugitives; but my noble Relative was bound to act upon other considerations, and to see that nothing was done which could be regarded as an infringement of our neutrality; and, therefore, while he did not disapprove Lord Lyons' course of action under the circumstances, he sent out instructions against the renewal of proceedings which, however laudable and humane in their object, were calculated to create false hopes and expectations. I do not think that there can be any difficulty or embarrassment as to how we should act in the future. My noble Relative said—"The course you adopted has been considered an infringement of neutrality. We admit the difficulties in which you were placed, and, making all allowance for them, we do not disapprove your conduct in the present instance, but take care that it is not continued, because it may tend to increase the horrors and asperities of the war." Now, I do not wish to follow the noble Duke through the whole of the examination, which, with great labour, he has made of these despatches; and, indeed, I should not be competent to do so, unless called upon by your Lordships, because the noble Duke has admitted that the general course pursued by Her Majesty's Government has met with his approval, and that the advice we have given to Turkey is, on the whole, sound and humane; that we have not unduly interfered with the independence of the Turkish Empire, while we have not failed to press upon it the necessity of conciliatory measures towards those whose armed resistance they had put down. The noble Duke does not say that the Turkish Government has shown any indisposition to act upon that advice; and I confess that, such being the case, I think I am absolved from entering upon any laboured examination of the various points which have been dwelt upon by the noble Duke. While I regret that the noble Duke finds it necessary to disapprove one particular part of the course we took after full consideration of the subject, under a most painful sense of duty, yet I rejoice that as regards the general course we pursued we have been happy enough to meet with the noble Duke's approval. And now one word as to the course pursued by the Turkish Government. I have already stated that a great number of the atrocities reported to have been committed were grossly exaggerated, while many rumoured cases of cruelty were totally without foundation. There was one story, for instance, about 500 women being destroyed. Why, there was not a vestige of foundation for such a charge. [The Duke of ARGYLL: I did not mention that.] No; the noble Duke did not mention it, but it is stated in the blue book, and the noble Duke's remarks would lead your Lordships to believe that the stories contained in this book, instead of being—at least some of them—a tissue of lies, are really entitled to the utmost credence. In mentioning one particular case the noble Duke laid very little stress upon it, but went on with the significant remark, "If these remarks are anything like the truth." Now, my Lords, many of them are nothing like the truth. That there have been excesses committed on both sides I do not deny, but they were committed against the wishes of the Turkish Government. And what has been the conduct of the Turkish Government? I should like to know whether there is an instance in history where an insurrection was put down with less loss of life, except in actual conflicts? Is there any other instance of the conquerors furnishing the vanquished with food, shelter, and raiment? The Turkish Government even sent away to their own country persons who, not being connected with Crete, had gone there for the purpose of promoting the insurrection; more than that, they sent their baggage with them. What other country in the world would have acted so? I am sure that this country would not; and I do not believe that any country except Turkey would send back to their own country volunteers who had gone to assist the rebellion in Crete—would send them back with their arms and baggage and under the protection of Turkish troops. Then a general amnesty has been promised. Deputies have been invited to go to Constantinople, and lay before the Committee there the wrongs and the grievances of Crete. They will be listened to patiently, and I hope they will be dealt with kindly. It is our duty, as friends of Turkey, to encourage her and advise her, and to lose no opportunity of pressing on her how much it is for her own interest that she should pursue a conciliatory course. It is no part of our duty, and shall be no part of our policy, so long as I have a voice in the direction of it, by means of exciting speeches, or by strong expressions of sympathy, or by coloured representations of the wrongs of the Christian populations in all the provinces of Turkey—in the Epirus, in Thessaly, and in the immediate neighbourhood of Greece—to encourage exaggerated hopes and expectations; and thereby to accelerate that which it may not be possible finally to avert—namely, the ruin of the Turkish Empire; for, if that is to happen, it is our duty to see that it takes place as gradually and as safely as possible.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, the question raised by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) involved considerations of foreign policy so important that he wished to make some remarks on the subject. The history of this Cretan affair might, in his opinion, be summed up very shortly. The Cretans were in much the same position as the Christians in the other Turkish provinces. Now, they not only addressed a petition of grievances to the Ottoman Government, but they likewise addressed a letter to the three protecting Powers, stating that their object was to redress their grievances by means of separation from Turkey and annexation to Greece. That was the state of things which the Turkish Government had to deal with. Of course, it was impossible that a Christian Power should not feel a natural sympathy with the Christians in the Turkish dominions; but he maintained that the course to be taken by Her Majesty's Government could not be decided merely by considerations of sympathy, but by grave considerations of policy; and he could not help thinking that his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) had been to some extent carried away by his feelings when he spoke of the struggles by which the Greeks had achieved their independence. But if the noble Duke wished to persuade the House that the Government had not interfered sufficiently, there were other arguments which he was bound to bring forward. His noble Friend had referred to the Crimean war. He (the Earl of Kimberley) must say that we undertook that war in order that Turkey might be relieved of the undue pressure put upon her by Russia. In 1856 we obtained from the Porte distinct promises that it would treat its Christian subjects in a better manner than it had hitherto done, and it must be admitted that the Powers who signed the treaty had acquired a special right to remonstrate with the Porte on that subject, and were justified in insisting that the treatment of those subjects should be consistent with the promises then made. But the case now under consideration was of a totally different kind. If we had interfered in this matter at all, we must have interfered between a Sovereign Power and its revolted subjects. In one of his despatches, Lord Stanley had distinctly stated that if there was one sovereign right more paramount than another it was that of asserting its power over its own subjects. There might be exceptions to that rule, but the Cretan insurrection was not one of them. The voice of humanity should be heard, but true humanity dictated that no expectations of assistance should be held out when it was impossible it could be given. It would have lowered the character of this country if such a course had been pursued. The course taken by the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office in this question had been, in his opinion, a wise and considerate course. If anything were needed to show that it would have been neither wise nor judicious to allow British ships to convey women and children from Crete it was furnished by the papers before them; for it was clear that such a permission would have been regarded as a promise of active interference. In one of them it was stated that when an English vessel of war was sent to take the insurgents from the Island of Crete, ovations were given to our Consuls in Greece, and the people there would not be convinced that it was not a step in the direction of intervention on the part of England. We must not only consider what we meant ourselves in such cases, but also what other persons would suppose that we meant. He must say he thought the conduct of Consul Dickson was natural as far as it was directed to the protection of the women and children; but he was bound to add that he thought that Consul Dickson was imprudent in referring, as he had done in his letter to Commander Pym, to the case of the foreign insurgents. He would ask his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll), what would be the feeling of the people of England if the United States sent ships at this moment to the coasts of Ireland to remove any foreign insurgent volunteers who might be found there. We ought to apply to others the rule that we desired should be applied to ourselves. On looking at the circumstances impartially, he thought one must come to the conclusion that the course adopted by Her Majesty's Government was the right one. With respect to our general policy in the East, he would observe that he believed the future was extremely dark. He thought no one could venture to say what would be the end of the troubles which from time to time were arising in that part of the world. It might be that the fall of the Ottoman Empire was approaching; or it might be that we should see what he should prefer to the sudden fall of so great an Empire, which, in all probability, would not occur without a bloody war throughout Europe—he meant the progress in civilization and independence of Christian populations, such as those of Roumania and Servia, so that they would be able to take a place by the side of Turkey. Either of those results might occur; but, in any event, he held it to be the duty of this country, while adhering to any engagements into which she had entered, not to take any steps which would prevent her in any emergency from adopting that course which might be best for her own interests and those of Europe.

EARL GREY said, that he thought the noble Earl who had just spoken and the noble Earl at the head of the Government had been so successful in showing that there was no ground for finding fault with the Government for the course it had pursued that there was no occasion for his adding anything to what they had said on this point:—and painful as it must have been to refuse our assistance in conveying those women and children from the coast, he (Earl Grey) thought the Government had acted rightly in the matter. But he could not help expressing his opinion that though his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) had failed in showing the Government to have been wrong in this matter, he had yet succeeded in proving very satisfactorily that the policy now acted upon was not very consistent with that which had been pursued at the time of the Crimean war. They had been then told that we entered into the Crimean war to maintain the independence and integrity of the Turkish Empire; but that in doing so we took upon ourselves to protect the Christian populations from misgovernment at the hands of the Porte. He was glad to hear now on the high authority of his noble Friend (the Duke of Argyll) that our professing to maintain the "independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire" was a mere diplomatic phrase, which was not to be understood in the ordinary sense of the word; because he had ventured from the first to say that in attempting to maintain the Ottoman Empire, and at the same time to prevent the oppression of its Christian subjects, we were undertaking a task beyond our strength. He believed with his noble Friend that the Empire of Turkey bore on its face the unmistakable signs of approaching dissolution, and that no efforts which we could make would be effective in keeping it together for any long time. He hoped they would not be. It ought not to be the policy of this country to keep alive such a government. He avowed his regret at seeing one of the fairest portions of Europe subjected to the barbarous government of the Turks; for wherever that Government prevailed civilization and the happiness of the people disappeared under its influence. On the other hand, it was not their business to interfere to regulate its affairs so far as its Christian subjects were concerned. These subjects were in a semi-barbarous state, and the whole question was so complicated that if this country were to interfere it would only be undertaking a task beyond its power to accomplish. In his opinion if we had acted less on feeling and more on calm consideration of what our policy ought to be it would have been better for ourselves and for Turkey, and for the Christian populations now ruled by the Porte. From the battle of Navarino down to the present time there had been too much interference in Turkish affairs. What had resulted from the Crimean war, in which we spent £100,000,000, which had cost the lives of 500,000 men, and which had produced an amount of distress in families which it was frightful to contemplate? That war, of which the professed object was the maintenance of the Turkish Empire, had by its results advanced probably by many years the inevitable day of its destruction. It had crippled the resources of Turkey, and every one admitted that since that war the Ottoman Empire had made gigantic strides to dissolution. What had we fought for? We were afraid of the preponderance of Russian rule. Well, he thought that if Russia had been let alone she might have made Turkey treat her Christian subjects better, but that there had existed any danger to us from Russia he utterly denied. But if there was we had only increased it by the policy we had pursued, for he could not doubt that by the Crimean war we had increased Russian influence in the East, because that war had made the Christian populations—the advancing races—look upon Russia as their friend, and the Western Powers as their enemies. When he said that we had interfered too much in the East, and that our interference there had done harm instead of good, he did not wish to be understood to approve of that policy of mere selfishness on which it was now the fashion to insist under the name of "non-intervention." Far be it from him to say that we never should use our power for the protection of the weak against the strong. On the contrary, he regarded the great power we possessed as carrying with it great responsibilities. It was the interest of this country also as well as its duty to endeavour as far as possible to prevent the oppression of weak States and to maintain the cause of justice in Europe. We neglected to do that three years ago when we might have done it; and perhaps the youngest man among us would not live to see the last of the misfortunes which our policy on that occasion would produce.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in reply, said, his opinion was that a friendly communication might have been made by this country, through Lord Lyons, to the Porte, on the subject of the women and children whom we were asked to carry off the coast. He believed, if that had been done, no objection would have been made at Constantinople. He concurred with his noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) in thinking Consul Dickson had gone too far in interfering for the insurgent volunteers; but he could not admit that the case of a ship of the United States Government carrying away foreigners from Ireland was at all in point. There was no analogy between what was being done by this country in Ireland and what the Turks had been doing in Crete. Women and children were not in need of conveyance from the shores of Ireland. No one suspected that Irish women and children would be ill-treated by our troops. There was no argument so false as that founded on false analogy.

Motion (by Leave of the House) withdrawn).

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, who had given notice

"To inquire whether a Reply has been received from the Spanish Government to the Despatch of Her Majesty's Secretary of State, dated 8th February, relating to the Tornado and her Crew; and to move for further Papers upon the Case of that ship," said, he desired to postpone the Motion, and hoped that, on the day to which the matter would stand adjourned, the noble Earl at the head of the Government would not object to produce any fresh correspondence which might have taken place.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that in anticipation of a debate on this subject, he had brought down to their Lordships' House some further papers. He feared, however, it would not be possible to produce all the Correspondence up to the present, matters in Spain being in a state of such complete uncertainty. As soon as anything like a termination, or even a stopping point, was reached, he should be happy to do so.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that whether the papers were produced or not, he certainly should feel it his duty to go into the discussion on the subject. He very much approved the mode in which the Correspondence had been conducted by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, but he thought the time had now arrived for something else.

THE MILITIA.—QUESTION.

EARL COWPER, in asking, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to increase the Period during which the Militia shall be assembled this Year for the annual Training, said, the subject was one which, in the face of the efforts making by all Continental nations, deserved and would receive a large share of the attention of the country, were this not concentrated on one all-absorbing topic. The question was coming on, and would have to be answered, how long England would be able to hold her own with her present military system. Everybody seemed to be agreed that the safeguard must be looked for in the militia. The Volunteers, although an admirable force, and useful in its way, never could be permanently embodied, because the men composing the force were men of daily avocations. He was glad to perceive that among the high authorities who had declared the necessity of maintaining and strengthening the militia force General Peel was included. The country, he was persuaded, would not grudge any expenditure which might be necessary for the purpose. One of the greatest difficulties which he experienced, and he believed it was the case with many lords-lieutenant of counties, was in officering the force. Sons of country gentlemen could not be procured in sufficient numbers, and a man who accepted a commission in a county with which he had nothing to do must be hard up for occupation. With a militia command there was too much to do to make it a pleasant occupation, like the Yeomanry, and too little to do to make it a permanent employment, like the army. The extension of time from the present limit of a month to six weeks would very greatly add to the efficiency of the force. No doubt men could badly spare the extra time; but if they could afford six weeks in the year that they were recruits, he did not see why they could not manage to be equally long under arms in other years.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD agreed that it was the duty of all concerned to promote by every means in their power the efficiency of the militia, and hoped the noble Earl would soon receive from competent gentlemen applications for the vacant commissions. He could only reply that the Estimates this year had been framed upon the usual plan, and there was no intention of extending the time of the annual training of the militia.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

—(The Earl of Derby.)

EARL MORLEY expressed his regret that the Bill as it left this House should contain the restriction introduced last year. Governing bodies, they knew, whether educational or ecclesiastical, governors or trustees, were always unwilling to reform themselves; and yet the circumstances of the time being wholly different to those existing when these governing bodies were first appointed rendered some modifications absolutely necessary. The restriction, he believed, was calculated to impair the efficiency of the Commission itself, and very greatly calculated to neutralize the good effects of the other provisions of the Bill.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that he had last year been instrumental in introducing the restriction complained of, and thought it inexpedient that the House of Lords should this year reverse its decision. At the same time, if a different view were taken in the House of Commons, he had no wish to make this a Government question, and if expunged in that assembly he should not feel it necessary to reinstate the clause, though he still believed it to be an improvement.

EARL GRANVILLE accepted with very great satisfaction the statement of the noble Earl. Very strong opinions had been expressed with regard to this restriction, and by no one more so than by his noble Friend the Earl of Clarendon, who originally introduced the Bill. It was the hope and expectation of the clause being expunged in the House of Commons that mainly led to its passing sub silentio through their Lordships' House. The very candid statement just made by the noble Earl would be of great use in discussing this matter elsewhere.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 3^a and passed, and sent to the Commons.

QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any and what instructions have been given to Her Majesty's Minister in Mexico relative to the non-receipt, monthly, by the Agent of the Mexican Bondholders there since the 1st of January 1866, of the Twenty-five per Cent of the Custom House Duties specially hypothecated to them under the Dunlop and Aldham Conventions, and which are known by Official Returns to have produced more than the sum of Three Hundred Thousand Pounds yearly, required to pay the annual interest of Three per Cent on the Ten Millions Mexican Bonds?

LORD STANLEY: So late, Sir, as the 10th of January in the present year instructions were sent out to the British representative to support the claims of the bondholders.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—LANCASTER, REIGATE, TOTNES, YARMOUTH.—QUESTION.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will bring in a separate Bill to disfranchise the Boroughs of Lancaster, Reigate, Totnes, and Yarmouth, and how he proposes to deal with the present Members of those Boroughs who still retain their Seats in this House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: There is, Sir, no intention to bring in a separate Bill for the object to which the hon. and learned Gentleman refers. With regard to the present Members for the Borough of Yarmouth, I am very glad they have seats in this House, because I think they are very useful Members of the House of Commons.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that there is another Member of the House besides the two Members for the Borough of Yarmouth—["Order, order!"]

DISTURBANCES IN IRELAND—THE FENIAN CONSPIRACY.—QUESTION.

MR. H. HERBERT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether Government have reconsidered their policy with reference to those implicated with the Fenian movement and those taken in arms, and if they have determined to change this policy, whether it would not be expedient to make it immediately known, in order to prevent others joining in the outbreak; and, whether Martial Law will be proclaimed in those districts where outbreaks occur?

MR. WALPOLE: I believe, Sir, that all the districts where outbreaks have occurred have been proclaimed; but I hardly know to what the hon. Gentleman refers when he asks whether the Government have reconsidered their policy in dealing with the Fenians?

MR. H. HERBERT said, he was aware that districts had been proclaimed, but understood that they had not been put under martial law.

MR. WALPOLE: No, certainly not.

MR. H. HERBERT said, he wished to know whether the Government intend to proclaim martial law?

MR. WALPOLE: That is a question which the Government must determine, and I am not now prepared to give an answer.

INDIA—ENGLISH RESIDENT AT LEH.

QUESTION.

LORD WILLIAM HAY said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Indian Government have appointed an English officer to reside at Leh, the capital of Ladâk, in the dominions of the Maharajah of Cashmer; if so, in what capacity, and whether the appointment has been made with the approval of the Maharajah; and, whether the Indian Government have decided to despatch a commercial mission to Turkistan and Thibet?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON: Sir, a statement has appeared in the papers, but no intelligence has been received by the Secretary of State as to the appointment of such an officer; nor is it known to the Secretary of State that the Governor General of India has any intention to send a Commercial Mission to Turkistan.

EGYPT—SUEZ CANAL.—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY RAWLINSON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he has received any Report from Lord Clarence Paget respecting his recent visit to the Suez Canal; and, if so, whether he will lay such Report upon the table of the House?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, I have not received any such Report as that alluded to by the hon. Member, and I may add, that as a Naval officer Lord Clarence Paget would address it to the Admiralty, and not to the Foreign Office.

METROPOLIS—ORNAMENTAL WATER IN REGENT'S PARK.—QUESTION.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, When the works at the Ornamental Water in the Regent's Park are to be commenced, and how long they will occupy?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: It is proposed to commence the works in the autumn, and it is calculated that they will occupy about six months.

QUESTION.

MAJOR STUART KNOX said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received any intelligence respecting the Fenian disturbances in Ireland that day?

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, the only telegram I have received from Ireland to-day is the following:—

"No important event reported except at Killybegs, eight miles from Limerick Junction, where a number of men have assembled. Troops are gone to the place. Farmhouses robbed of arms in the neighbourhood of Abbeyfeale. The neighbourhood of Dublin, including Drogheda, tranquil."

MAJOR STUART KNOX: Can you state the hour at which the telegram was despatched?

MR. WALPOLE: The hour is not stated.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the uncertainty as to the position of the Volunteers, as to whether they could or could not be called upon to aid the Civil Force in the repression of disturbances; and to ask the Government what steps, if any, they intend to take to remove this uncertainty. There was much doubt in the country with regard to the position of Volunteers in the event of disturbances, and to what extent they were liable to be called upon to aid the civil power upon such emergencies; and it was obviously necessary that those doubts should be removed. The doubt had arisen in consequence of what passed at Chester on a recent occasion; but before referring to this he desired briefly to explain the position of the Volunteer force according to the Act under which they were enrolled. The Volunteer Bill of 1863 originally contained the following clause:—

“Whenever a Volunteer corps, with the approval of one of Her Majesty’s Principal Secretaries of State, voluntarily assembles on being called upon by the Lieutenant of the county to which the corps belongs to act within that county or the adjacent counties for the suppression of riots or tumults, every Officer and Volunteer shall, for the purpose of this Act, be deemed on actual military service.”

Actual military service was defined by a subsequent clause, as follows:—

“Such actual military service being defined by Clause 23, that ‘Officers and Volunteers shall be subject to the Mutiny Act, and shall also be entitled to the benefits thereof in all respects as the officers and soldiers of Her Majesty’s army for the time being are, and as if the Volunteer force belonged to and formed part of Her Majesty’s army, subject only to this variation, that a court martial shall be composed of Officers of the Volunteer force only.’”

If, therefore, the Bill had passed in its original form, Volunteers would have been liable to be called out by the lord-lieutenant, with the sanction of the Home Secretary, for the suppression of disturbances. They might, indeed, have pleased themselves whether they responded or not; but if they came out they were to be under military discipline, and in exactly the same position as regular soldiers. A Motion, however, was brought forward by his hon. Friend the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), and there was a general feeling in the House that it would be unwise and inexpedient to rely upon or employ Volunteers in aid of the civil power. The clause was accordingly struck out. He was aware that a very large proportion of the present members of the force were enrolled prior to the passing of the Bill, and that they were, therefore, originally under the old Yeomanry Act, and might have been called out by the lord-lieutenant without the sanction of the Home Secretary; but he believed the great majority of them were ignorant of that liability, and joined the force under the belief that they would not be called upon for such a purpose. The movement, indeed, was solely intended for the protection of the country against any external danger, and it would not have attained the point which it reached within a year or two if there had been any thought of employing it in aid of the civil power. Lord Herbert, in a circular letter which he had addressed in 1861 to the lords-lieutenant of counties, had used these words—

“I have also learnt that, in some cases, Volunteer corps have been called out in aid of the civil power on the occurrence of local disturbances, and I have therefore to point out to you, that, as the Volunteer force is not intended to be employed in this manner, it is inexpedient to assemble it on any such occasion.”

So strong, indeed, was the impression that the Volunteers could not be so employed, that the hon. and gallant Member for Beverley (Sir Henry Edwards), speaking on the second reading of the Bill on the 14th of May, 1863, expressed his gratification at its being contemplated to make an alteration and to put them in the same position as the Yeomanry. The hon. and gallant Colonel, on the second reading of the Volunteer Bill, said—

“Up to the present moment the services of the Volunteer corps were only available in the event of invasion; but he was happy to learn that it was contemplated in the Bill before the House to place them on the same footing as the Yeomanry Cavalry. As far as he could understand, they would in future be equally liable with the Yeomanry to be assembled for duty by the Commander-in-Chief, at the request of the lord-lieutenant, in support of the civil power in the suppression of riots.”—[3 Hansard, clxx. 1700.]

That was the impression of the Volunteers and the condition on which the force was framed. What had happened recently at Chester had, however, altered the state of the case. He was one of those who thought the affair at Chester a most serious business. In the language of the noble Lord (Lord Naas), it was as mysterious as it was unaccountable. The action of the Volunteers there had been characterized by promptitude, energy, and courage, and every Volunteer in the kingdom must feel proud that they had so well responded to the call made upon them. Major Humberston who had formerly been a Member of that House, and who was in command of the Chester Volunteers, had acted with coolness as well as energy. It appeared from his report to the lord-lieutenant that between five and six o’clock on the morning of Monday, February 11, he was informed of an intended attempt by Fenians to seize the arms at Chester Castle. The first thing he did was to remove the Volunteer arms to Chester Castle. A little later, being informed that from 80 to 100 Fenians had arrived at Chester station, he summoned the Volunteers, and in about two hours 150 had assembled. He did not arm them, and a telegram was sent to the Home Office to inquire how far the Volunteers were authorized to act. The reply received from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was as follows:—

“Volunteers ought not to be employed in their military capacity in quelling disturbances; but in point of law they would be justified in acting as individuals in aid of the civil power, and in a serious emergency they might use their arms if necessary.”

In the meantime the Volunteers had been sworn in as special constables. On the arrival of the telegram from the Home Office, Major Humberston armed them, and they remained under arms all night at the Castle. He wished the House to consider the position in which this telegram had placed the whole Volunteer force. They might be called upon by the magistrates to act, but not under military discipline or under the orders of their officers, although they might meet in uniform, with power to use the Government arms. They were in the position of an armed force assembling at the instigation rather than under the orders of the magistrates, and using their arms at their own discretion. This was a state of things not without danger to the peace of the country, and unfair to the Volunteers themselves. Let the House consider what might be the result. The Mayor of Chester and Major Humberston both acted with coolness and discretion, and no harm was done. But elsewhere there might be a frightened magistrate, who might call out a body of Volunteers. Any one of them might fire his rifle, and there might be a battle in the streets before any officers or soldiers of Her Majesty's army would be engaged. If a body of Volunteers should fire in a premature manner upon a crowd in one of our large towns, the so-called massacre of Peterloo might be as nothing in comparison. The law, as laid down by the right hon. Gentleman, had excited a good deal of anxiety among the Volunteer force, and the matter had been discussed in “another place.” The Under Secretary of State (the Earl of Belmore) said—

“As civilians acting as special constables, Volunteers may be called upon to aid the civil power in quelling disturbances, and in cases of emergency there would be no objection to their using their arms.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 372.]

On the other hand, Lord Malmesbury, who had had much experience as a Volunteer officer, expressed an opinion almost precisely the opposite. He said, that he believed the Volunteers were liable to be sworn in as special constables, and, “when so sworn in, would naturally be armed as special constables usually were armed.” Lord Malmesbury added—

“I, as a Volunteer officer, should refuse to give up the Government arms at the request of a magistrate.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 377.]

This, also, was the opinion of Earl De Grey and Ripon, who, in a letter to The Times, said—

“The law clearly confers no power of calling out Volunteer corps to aid in the suppression of riots. In such cases Volunteers can only act as private individuals; they may be sworn in as special constables, but only in the same manner as any other persons, and with the same duties and liabilities; but since the passing of the Volunteer Act of 1863 it has never, as I believe, been understood hitherto that Volunteers so sworn in were to be armed with their Government rifles and ammunition, and to be employed, as might then be the case, rather as troops than as special constables.”

The subject had also been discussed by the chief legal authorities in the other House, where opinions were equally contradicting. Lord St. Leonards, one of the highest authorities in the country, and an ex-Lord Chancellor, expressing one view, while the present Lord Chancellor expressed another. The Volunteers were thus unable to know what they were to do. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman had communicated with the Law Advisers of the Crown; but this was a matter for the Executive rather than for the Law Officers. The House might anticipate that the law laid down would be similar to that explained by Lord Mansfield in the Lord George Gordon riots—that the magistrates might call upon any man, soldier, or civilian to assist in keeping the peace, and more than this, that any man who saw the peace broken might help to keep it, and act as he thought best for that purpose. If, however, death should ensue, he was responsible to the laws of his country for the exercise of his discretion. It was very unfair to tempt the Volunteers to use their discretion and not to guarantee them against the consequences. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in his Chester telegram, said that in a serious emergency the Volunteers “might use their arms if necessary.” But suppose they should use their arms, and it should turn out that it was not necessary, they would then be responsible to the civil power, and they might be tried for their lives. The Duke of Cambridge, in the debate to which he had referred, stated that the officer in command of the few regular troops at Chester was placed in a most awkward position. He did not know, the Duke added, whether if he had availed himself of the assistance of the Volunteers he might not have committed an illegal act. If death had ensued he might have made himself amenable to the laws of his country, and might have been tried for his life. Captain Evans, who commanded the Artillery Volunteers at Chester, had written a letter to The Times, in which he stated—

“If the Volunteers were there as civilians, which is not only Mr. Walpole’s, but doubtless, the dry legal view of the matter, then their mustering in a body with arms, involved the somewhat formidable principle that the inhabitants of a place, threatened as Chester was on Monday last, may assemble, either collectively (though, as simple civilians, under no responsible command) or individually, and use their firearms against rioters or invaders at their own discretion. It would not be difficult to show the alarming consequences which such a licence might involve, unless a very clear line indeed were drawn by law to distinguish the precise emergency in which firearms were or were not lawfully available in the hands of civilians.”

He added—

“Although the Volunteers would all most readily accept a ‘special’ retainer in plain clothes, they will, I am sure, be excused if they feel some repugnance at being utilized as special constables in uniform, and armed with rifles and carbines which they dare not fire without the risk of outstepping the law.”

He trusted that the Government would come to the decision that exact regulations ought to be issued by the Home Office to the magistracy, and by the War Office to the officers of Volunteers, containing information on the following questions:—First, how Volunteers were to protect their arms? He imagined that upon this point the law would be clear, and that Volunteer officers might protect their arms in the same way that every private gentleman might protect his house. If this was the law it ought to be clearly laid down. The next question was whether, as the law stood, they might act in their military capacity in quelling disturbances? He supposed that they could not. Another important question which the Government would have to answer was this—Should the Volunteers as individuals act in uniform, and should they use the Government arms? He himself thought the answer to that question ought to be clearly in the negative. If they encouraged the Volunteers, not in a military capacity, not under discipline, and acting just as they pleased, at their own discretion to use firearms against their fellow-citizens, the most lamentable consequences might ensue. A further important question was this—Should the law be altered in any way so as to enable them to act in a military capacity, and under discipline, in the same manner as the Yeomanry now acted and as the Volunteers themselves might have acted up to 1863? He hoped the Government would seriously consider before they brought in a Bill for any such purpose. At a recent meeting of almost all the commanding officers of the various London Volunteer corps, a resolution, moved by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), was passed, to the following effect:—

“That it is desirable that the legal position of Volunteers, in the matter of suppressing riots and tumults, should be clearly defined, for the guidance alike of civil authorities and Volunteers; and, while learning with satisfaction that those subjects are engaging the attention of the Government, it is further the opinion of this meeting that it would not be desirable to renew the provision of the old Volunteer Act, under which Volunteers were liable to be called out for the suppression of riots and tumults.”

But the following paragraph was added to the Resolution on the motion of the noble Lord the Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor):—

“But that on any great emergency or raid, supposed, upon good information, to be fomented by foreign or external influence, and to affect Her Majesty’s Supremacy, and in all cases of any threatened attack upon armouries or magazines, Volunteers may be called upon to act in their military capacity.”

The first objection to that declaration was its vagueness, and if a Bill was framed to meet the case, it must be upon the terms of the Bill of 1863, empowering the lord-lieutenant to call out the Volunteers. He supposed the words, “fomented by external influences,” referred to some such movement as that which lately took place at Chester. He presumed that if there were any real danger in England all the Volunteers, like everybody else, must help the civil power; but it would be most unwise to anticipate such an emergency by making provision for it by Act of Parliament. The Volunteers ought to be used as the very last resort in such a case. They ought first to use the police, the special constables, and the regular troops of Her Majesty; they ought even first to use the Yeomanry, and for this reason—that much more serious consequences would ensue from the fire of a company of Volunteers with Enfield rifles than from the action of the Yeomanry Cavalry. If any great emergency arose it would be the duty of the Government to come to Parliament, and pass a Bill with the greatest expedition enabling them to make use of the Volunteers. He thought the Government must take on themselves the responsibility of such an emergency, and if they found that the bringing in of a Bill was necessary for meeting it the House would probably pass it with due expedition. He believed the Volunteer movement had done great good. It had put an end to the panics which arose from a sense of a weakness in the country. There was much talk about an army of reserve; but they must look on the Volunteer force as their reserve. Working men and, indeed, men of all classes and political opinions were brought together by, and joined in, the Volunteer movement. But if once such a Bill as he had referred to were passed, instead of a national movement it would become a class movement; many would leave it because of their class and of their political opinions, and, what was still more dangerous, many might remain in it because of their class and of their political opinions. Thus the force would be ruined as a means of national defence.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS: In consequence of the quotation just made by the hon. Member for Bradford, from a speech of his delivered in 1863, when the late Secretary at War introduced his Bill for the regulation of the Volunteer Force, he begged to observe that, in common with many others who sat on the same side of the House, he had gathered the impression that the noble Lord was feeling the pulse of the House as to whether the Volunteers should be permanently placed on the same footing with the Yeomanry Cavalry, and for the future be liable to be called out in support of the civil power to quell riots and disturbances in the country. Finding, however, on subsequent explanation, that he had misconstrued the noble Lord's meaning, he took the first opportunity of communicating his mistake to the House.

EARL GROSVENOR said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) that the most melancholy results might accrue from the employment of the Volunteer force under ordinary circumstances. But he could not help feeling that but for the presence of the Volunteers lately at Chester the most melancholy results might have ensued, and he had no doubt it was very much owing to their action on that occasion that a disaster was prevented. The military force in the Castle was very weak at the time; it was only one company, though another came in the middle of the day on Monday, and another arrived later. The Volunteers, however numbering 300 men, were on the spot, and that, he must say, affected materially the plots of the Fenians. He understood the hon. Member for Bradford to say it would have been better to have called out the Yeomanry; but that could not have been done so easily or so expeditiously. The Serjeant Major was away on business in the country, and difficulties might have occurred before they got the troop together which would not probably have been till Tuesday, or twenty-four hours after the danger arose. He would read to the House a letter from Major Humberston, the Volunteer officer concerned, and lately a Member of that House, who had behaved in the manner which might have been expected from him. That gentleman said—

“Dear Lord Grosvenor,—I send you a copy of the letter I wrote to the lord-lieutenant, which details the proceedings of the Volunteers on the 11th of February. When first I decided to call out the Volunteers nothing was said about their acting as special constables. I told the magistrates that I considered an attack upon the Castle would be levying war upon the Queen, and therefore that we should be justified in acting. I never felt any doubt that if we were to meet armed Fenians the Volunteers must act with their arms; but I did not parade them with arms during the day, as the arms were at hand in the Castle, and I thought it better not to make any unnecessary display. I believe considerable objection was felt by the Volunteers—indeed, some objection was expressed, to being sworn in as special constables; but the magistrates having made the request, and no reply then having been received by them from Mr. Walpole whether the Volunteers might act, I thought it might be misinterpreted, and would be setting a bad example if the Volunteers refused. I therefore asked the Volunteers to be sworn in, and they at once complied. There was a good deal of discussion on their being sworn in whether they should act in uniform and in military formation or in plain clothes; and it was agreed they should re-assemble in uniform. My intention throughout was they should act with arms unless the most stringent prohibitory orders were received from head-quarters. We therefore never decided how we should act in case we had to act as special constables with staves. On our re-assembling and marching up to the Castle at seven o'clock the arms were immediately delivered out to the Volunteers. No ball-cartridge was served out, but I had three kegs of ammunition placed ready, and would have served out ten rounds to each man without a moment's delay. I spoke to the Volunteers at our general parade last night, and the conclusion I came to is that Parliament must not convert Volunteers into policemen; that Volunteers must not be called out to quell ordinary disturbances; that they might be called out to quell extraordinary disturbances (such as the Fenians at Chester) if such extraordinary disturbances can be defined."

Great credit was due to the Volunteers for the manner in which they acted under Major Humberston; because, though the Fenians came by railway from all parts of the country, and the homes of the Volunteers were very much at their mercy, the latter, instead of remaining to defend their homes, assembled at Chester Castle and were ready to defend the public property of the country. When the Bill was brought in in 1863 the general feeling was that the Volunteers should not be called out under circumstances of ordinary riot; but it was not then foreseen that such an emergency might arise as a Fenian invasion of a quiet town in England. The question was discussed the other day at a meeting of the commanding officers of Volunteers in the metropolis, when the resolution which the hon. Member for Bradford had read to the House was proposed, and was carried, he thought, unanimously, or nearly so, together with the addition which he himself had the honour to move. There might be some difficulty in embodying that addition in an Act of Parliament; but the House would, he thought, agree with him in the opinion that it was deserving of consideration. If the Volunteers had not been prepared to act at Chester great loss of life would in all probability have taken place. He, under those circumstances, hoped that the Government would direct their attention to the subject, and, if they found that the law required amendment, that they would not fail to make a proposal to the House with a view to its alteration.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, the question which had been raised was one which was of the utmost importance, not only to the public, but to the Volunteer force itself. It was of importance to the Volunteer force; because when they undertook to defend their country against invasion they little thought, he believed, that in cases of civil disturbance they would be called upon to act against their fellow-citizens. Upon the decision which was arrived at on that point the stability of the Force, in his opinion, in a great measure depended. He quite concurred with the noble Lord who had just spoken, that the Volunteers, when their services were put in requisition at Chester, showed a determination to do their duty, on which reliance might be placed by the country, whenever their assistance was needed. He would say further, that no body of men would more faithfully defend their country. The real point at issue, however, was whether it was desirable that they should in ordinary times be called upon to act in their military capacity; and he maintained that it would be a fatal mistake to require them to take up arms except in case of invasion. It could not be too distinctly understood that a Volunteer was a Volunteer merely for that purpose. That for all other purposes he was a simple civilian, and that he was not in times of riot to turn out with his arms or in uniform. He might, of course, turn out as other civilians did, and act as a special constable, whenever the necessity for doing so arose. The Volunteers, indeed, might defend the Government arms placed in their armoury as any other property might be defended. If there were any doubt on the matter it would be well to introduce a Bill to that effect. But it was the sole occasion, save that of invasion, in which they ought to be at liberty to act as a military force. Entertaining those views, he would urge on his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department the expediency of bringing in a Bill defining the limits within which the Volunteers might act, so that there should be no doubt about the matter for the future. He quite admitted that the resolution as proposed by the noble Lord might in many cases operate wisely; but then it was vague and indefinite, and might, under ordinary circumstances, be productive of very great perplexity. It would be most unfortunate if the Volunteer force did not clearly understand their position, respecting which there ought to exist no doubt or difficulty whatever.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, my noble Friend the Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor) having alluded to what took place in the discussion on the Volunteer movement in 1863 during the time I was Secretary of State, I wish for a moment to refer to the course which was on that occasion adopted by the late Government. In preparing the Bill upon the subject my noble Friend, who was then at the head of the War Department (Earl De Grey), had before him the law as it stood with regard to the Yeomanry and Volunteers, which allowed those forces to be called out at the discretion of the lord-lieutenant of the county. The Government having considered the matter, proposed that the law should for the future be assimilated to the existing law, with this additional provision—that the Volunteers should never be called out to suppress any riotous proceedings except with the sanction of the Secretary of State. We did not then contemplate that any local authority, on such a sudden emergency as that which arose the other day at Chester, should summon them to its aid; but it was proposed that the lord-lieutenant might make a statement to the Government of the facts in any particular case in which serious disturbance was apprehended, and that the Volunteers might then, with the assent of the Secretary of State, if he thought fit to give it, be required to lend their aid in quelling the disturbance. It was further provided that if the Volunteers served under arms they should serve upon the same conditions as any other military force, and should be subject to the orders of their commanding officer and the provisions of the Mutiny Act. In the discussion, however, which took place on the subject the feeling of the House was clearly expressed as to the inexpediency of at all calling out a force so constituted as an armed military force in cases of internal riot, being of opinion that its services should be available solely to resist foreign invasion. The Government acquiesced in that opinion; the clause containing the provisions which I have mentioned was expunged, and the law as to the liability of Volunteers as such to be called out in aid of the local authorities in the suppression of riots was left clear and distinct, the principle being established that neither with nor without the assent of the Secretary of State were they to be made available for that purpose. The Volunteers, however, were still left liable to all those obligations which exist in the case of other subjects of Her Majesty. They remained liable to be called upon by the local authority to serve as special constables in aid of the ordinary police force. Then came the question whether in the fulfilment of those obligations they were to assume a semi-military character, and to appear in uniform, carrying their arms? The emergency which arose at Chester was no doubt a very serious one, and I do not blame the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) for the orders which he issued on that occasion. I must at the same time say that I think it would, as a general rule, be clearly wrong that the Volunteers should be required to act as special constables under conditions different from those enforced in the case of their fellow-citizens. It would, in my opinion, be extremely undesirable to leave it to any local authority to determine whether they ought to carry arms with them to use at their own discretion, while they were not liable to the ordinary control to which soldiers are subjected. With regard to the protection of armouries, he did not see that the law required alteration. As was pointed out by the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Barttelot), the Volunteers might, like any other persons, resist lawless attack on a place like Chester Castle, containing their own arms or other military stores, using the Volunteer arms or any other arms for the purpose. I cannot, under these circumstances, see that the law requires any amendment. It appears to me to be clear that the omission of the clause to which I have already alluded in 1863 indicated distinctly the intention of Parliament that there should be no power to call out the Volunteers to put down a riot. There is the less necessity for giving that power, because of the rapid manner in which troops can now be moved from one part of the country to another. Besides, we have a force which has been, I think, referred to by the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel)—the force of pensioners, consisting of old soldiers accustomed to military discipline, who may, with the sanction of the Secretary of State, be called upon to act, as has been often done, in aid of the civil force without any of the inconvenience likely to arise from the employment of the Volunteers. I trust, therefore, my right hon. Friend opposite will be able to issue instructions which will remove all doubt on the subject, and prevent any possible inconvenience from the want of a clear understanding of the law in regard to it.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, before I refer to the subject brought under our notice, I wish to state that since this discussion commenced I have received another telegram with respect to the state of affairs in Ireland which I think it right that I should communicate to the House at once. It is as follows:—

“Accounts since morning have come in stating that in the counties of Clare and Limerick a great number of farm-houses have been entered in the dark for the last two days, and the arms taken by small parties. Uneasiness in the South has not subsided."

[An hon. MEMBER: At what hour was that telegram sent?] The hour is not given. With regard to the question which has been put to me to-night by the hon. Member for Bradford, I may remark that in his own observations, as well as in the observations of the other hon. Gentlemen who have addressed the House, not even excluding my right hon. Friend who has just sat down, there is a misapprehension in reference to the employment and the movements of the Volunteers at Chester which ought to be at once removed. My hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Colonel Barttelot) especially has proceeded on the assumption that the Volunteers were required to act and did act on that occasion in a manner not contemplated by the law of the land. There is a mistake in supposing that such was the case, which will be made apparent at once by the statement that on that occasion there was no employment of Volunteers as a Volunteer force in their military character. With respect to that part of the hon. Member's question, which points to the uncertainty of the position of the Volunteers, there is only uncertainty in it in the same way as there is uncertainty with respect to special constables; so far as I am aware, there is no other uncertainty in the law. Allow me to explain the matter as briefly as I can. We have to consider three things—first, the circumstances under which the Volunteers appeared at Chester and were prepared to resist, in aid of the civil power, any movement against the castle; secondly, the general law of the land applicable to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects in such a case; and thirdly, the peculiar application of that law to Volunteers. With respect to the first point, the facts of the case are simple. There is no doubt that this was not a riot in the ordinary sense of the word. I need not say that a riot is totally distinct from insurrection. The facts show that it was an intended insurrection against the town of Chester, and that the felonious intention was entertained of taking Chester Castle. There was therefore something more than an ordinary riot contemplated. There was an insurrectionary movement, which had to be met as such, and the question is, what force the civil power may bring to bear in resisting a movement of that character? The general law with respect to such a case has been laid down clearly and distinctly, not only by the older, but by the more modern authorities. Take the case of Lord George Gordon's riots, which came before the Lord Chief Justice Mansfield, and the equally important case of the Bristol riots, tried before Chief Justice Tindal. The law, as laid down by those two learned Judges, is now so clearly, distinctly, and definitely settled, that no uncertainty can exist. I will read a few passages from the expositions of the law given by those Judges, and in accordance with those passages you must apply the law to Volunteers, acting, not in their military capacity, but as subjects of the Queen. Lord Mansfield said—

"It appears most clearly to me, that not only every man may legally interfere to suppress a riot, much more prevent acts of felony, treason, and rebellion, in his private capacity, but he is bound to do it as an act of duty; and if called upon by a magistrate, is punishable in case of refusal. What any single individual may lawfully do, so may any number assembled for a lawful purpose, which the suppression of riots, tumults, and insurrections certainly is. . . . A private man, if he sees a person committing an unlawful act, more particularly an act amounting to a violent breach of the peace, felony, or treason, may apprehend the offender, and in his attempt to apprehend him may use force to compel him, not to submit to him, but to the law. What a private man may do a magistrate or peace officer may clearly undertake, and according to the necessity of the case, arising from the danger to be apprehended, any number of men assembled or called together for the purpose are justified to perform. This doctrine I take to be clear and indisputable, with all the possible consequences which can flow from it, and to be the true foundation for calling in of the military power to assist in quelling the late riots."—[Hansard, Parl. History, xxi. 695.]

These words were uttered by Lord Mansfield in the House of Lords. On the trial, Lord Mansfield said—

"The common law and several statutes have invested justices of the peace with great powers to quell riots, because, if not suppressed, they tend to endanger the constitution of the country; and as they may assemble all the King's subjects, it is clear they may call in the soldiers, who are subjects, and may act as such; but this should be done with great caution. It is well understood that the magistrates may call in the military. It would be a strange doctrine if, in an insurrection rising to a rebellion, every subject had not the power to act when they possess the power in a case of a mere breach of the peace."

Chief Justice Tindal confirmed these opinions, and expressed himself in a manner which ought to be generally well known and understood, because it puts the law with respect to the subject in the clearest light. He said—

"And while I am stating the obligation imposed by the law on every subject of the realm, I wish to observe that the law acknowledges no distinction in this respect between the soldier and the private individual. The soldier is still a citizen, lying under the same obligation and invested with the same authority to preserve the peace of the King as any other subject. If the one is bound to attend the call of the civil magistrate, so also is the other; if the one may interfere for that purpose, when the occasion demands it, without the requisition of the magistrate, so may the other too; if the one may employ arms for that purpose when arms are necessary, the soldier may do the same. Undoubtedly, the same exercise of discretion which requires the private subject to act in subordination to and in aid of the magistrate, rather than upon his own authority, before recourse is had to arms, ought to operate in a still stronger degree with a military force.

... And here I most distinctly observe, that it is not left to the choice or will of the subject, as some have erroneously supposed, to attend or not to the call of the magistrate as they think proper; but every man is bound, when called upon, under pain of fine and imprisonment, to yield a ready and implicit obedience to the call of the magistrate, and to do his utmost to assist him to suppress any tumultuous assembly."

Now, let the House observe that, by the general law of the land, it is the duty of every subject of the Crown, in the event of an insurrectionary movement, to aid the civil power, when called upon to do so, by such means as are within his reach. But, in applying the case to the position of the Volunteers, you unquestionably cannot consider them in the same light as a military body, bound to come out at the command of the civil authority; but you must consider them with reference to the Acts applicable to them, and in the same light as any other subjects of the Crown, so bound, but not serving in a military capacity. Besides the regular army there are four services of a quasi-military character: The Pensioners, the Yeomanry, the Militia, and the Volunteers. With respect to the Pensioners, they are bound by statute to aid the civil power in case of an insurrectionary movement. The Yeomanry, by the terms and conditions of their service, and the Militia, which may be embodied, are also bound, under certain circumstances, to aid the civil power in case of insurrection or rebellion. With respect to the Volunteers, it is unquestionably the case that, by statute, they cannot be called on and compelled to serve in their military capacity, because such are not the terms on which they entered upon that particular service. That being so, they are in the situation of any other subject of the Crown, who may be called on by the magistrates or civil authorities, when there is danger of tumult, riot, or felony. It was under these circumstances, then, and having reference to this, that I adverted to the state of the law, when I transmitted that succinct telegram sent to Chester in the middle of the day; but, succinct as that telegram is, nothing can be clearer than that telegram, and every one of its parts is strictly in accordance with the law. The first part stated that the Volunteers ought not to act in their military capacity. That was so stated, because the statute would not require them to come out in that character. The second part of the telegram declared that, in the event of disturbance, they would be justified in aiding the civil power in their individual capacity. That is strictly law. It is just what they can do and just what any subject of the Crown is bound to do, and what they must be prepared to do in the event of a dangerous insurrectionary movement. The third part of the telegram stated that, in the case of serious emergency, they would be justified in using their arms. So, I have no doubt, any other special constables would be, just in the same way as they would have been justified in 1831, and also in 1848, in case of need. But then comes the general question—ought they to be so employed? I have no doubt on that point. I can see no reason why Volunteers, acting as individuals, may not offer their services to the civil authorities, nor can I see any reason whatever why the civil authorities may not call on them in their individual capacity, just in the same manner as on other persons, to aid the civil power in the event of an emergency. Then comes the question—if they can volunteer their services in aid of the civil power, and if the civil authorities can require them to act as special constables, when tumult or felony is apprehended as likely to take place, ought they to act as an organized body, and so, more or less, appear in their military capacity? On this question in point of law I believe there is no doubt also. The Volunteers come out in their individual character, and coming out in that character they may be employed by the civil magistrate to quell civil disturbance in the manner most effective for the purpose. Since they have been accustomed to act and co-operate with each other, I can see no reason myself why, volunteering to aid the civil power, they may not place themselves side by side with their companions in resisting an aggression amounting to an insurrectionary movement.

Then arises the question whether they can use their arms? To that I reply that they can do so, but only in the way, and in no other way, that other subjects of the Crown are justified in using arms in case of emergency. I see no reason in law, or on grounds of policy, why the Volunteers should not, in an extreme case, be justified in using their arms. Let it not be supposed for a single moment that I would have them use their arms in the case of an ordinary riot. But I would still less be disposed to deprive the civil authority, in the case of a serious insurrectionary movement, of the opportunity of availing themselves of the Volunteers, not in their military character, or as an organized body, but as subjects of the Crown at the disposal of the responsible civil authorities for the purpose of resisting any insurrectionary movement. This I believe to be the exact state of the law. They cannot be compelled to come out in their military capacity. But they may be called upon, or they may volunteer their services, like other subjects of the Crown, and so long as they only act as any other subjects of the Crown, no objection can be urged to their acting in any case of emergency. The hon. Member (Mr. W. E. Forster) asks whether that state of the law is so certain that some instructions ought not to be given to guide the civil and military authorities with reference to the use of the Volunteers? I have taken the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, and I believe I have stated nothing which will not turn out to be the law according to that opinion; but it is a matter of so much importance, and so much uncertainty appears to exist upon it, that I do think instructions ought to be carefully drawn up, and sent both to the civil and military authorities, defining as nearly as can be defined the circumstances under which the civil authorities may call upon military aid in any case, whether with regard to the regular military force or the other bodies which bear more or less a military character. At the same time I ought to state, in consequence of the observations of the hon. Member, that he will find it an utter impossibility to define and describe every case beforehand, in which the military may be brought out to assist the civil power. Some latitude must be left, and it can only be left to the civil and military authorities that are called on to act at the time, according to the circumstances of the particular case. I believe it will be utterly impossible, and it would be very unwise, to attempt by any iron-bound rule to state every case in which that action might or might not be required. One other observation. A question was addressed to me by the hon. Member for Bradford, as to whether I contemplated any alteration in the law. I contemplate none. I should be extremely sorry that the Volunteer force should ever be required to act as a general rule in cases of civil disturbance. That was not the purpose for which the Volunteer force was called into existence. At the same time, I must guard myself from saying that there are no cases in which the Volunteers may not usefully, of their own accord, and in cases of emergency even in co-operation with each other, act together in aid of the civil power, just as other subjects of the Crown may when such emergency occurs. I hope I have now adverted to all the points touched by the hon. Member for Bradford. The Mayor of Chester was authorized to call upon the Volunteers to prepare themselves for any emergency that might arise; having done that, the discretion would be left to them—and a very serious discretion for them to exercise—to determine the particular case in which they would be required to use their arms. The case in which they would be so required would be any insurrection amounting to an overt act of treason, and in such a case resistance on the part of the Volunteers, as well as on the part of any subject of the Crown, would be justified in point of law, and would be required on their part as good subjects to suppress the insurrection.

MR. BRIGHT: The impression on my mind, after hearing the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, is, that he has not made the subject more clear than it was before. If I were to put his answer into a few words he seems to have said: The Volunteers may; and may not. This is the first time I have said a word in the House of Commons on the subject of the Volunteers; but I recollect very well when the force was first organized that it was one of the statements made expressly to the public, and so understood by the public, that this force would not, under any circumstances—which we then could ever conceive—be likely to be called upon to suppress internal tumults. It has been in all times hitherto possible to keep the peace, first by the general good sense of the nation; if that fails, by the police, by special constables, and by the regular military force. At this time the police is more numerous, better organized, and more efficient throughout the country than at any former period. Special constables are not less likely to act than at any former period. A given number of the troops may be made more efficient now than in past times, for they can be moved more rapidly across the country. Therefore, if there was no necessity for any other force before the Volunteers were formed, there can be no need now that Volunteers should be called out for purposes of this nature. [Mr. WALPOLE: They were not so called out.] We are discussing whether they may be called out. There is one very strong reason why they should not be thus employed, because as a general rule they would be employed against their neighbours. And I hold that when you come to apply force that is intended to be used if necessary with fatal effect, it is much better that that force should come through the regular army than through your neighbours who are armed. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to one-half of his speech, and leave the other to have no effect. I think the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey), with regard to what took place when the force was organized, seems to embody the opinion that prevails generally through the country, and that the declaration was at that time made to quiet some doubts on the part of the people and to prevent the force from being unpopular. The noble Lord (Earl Grosvenor) referred to what took place in the ancient city he represents, or rather to what did not take place. I should like to ask the Government and the Home Secretary if there has been any inquiry into what took place at Chester. I should consider it a painful and dangerous state of things if ten or twelve hundred persons should come from towns in Lancashire and Yorkshire to attempt to take and sack Chester Castle. Judging from the newspapers it does not appear that any of the men—said to be strangers—who were in Chester on that day were found to be in possession of arms. I have not heard that any one had a musket or a revolver. The answer given to that is, they did not think it necessary to take arms, because they expected to find them in Chester Castle. It is the first time I have heard that a castle in which troops are stationed was to be attacked by men who went there without arms, expecting to be supplied within. Speaking from what I have seen in the papers, and especially from what I have seen in a Liverpool paper, I find it is asserted positively that out of the whole number of those strangers in Chester only a portion, and that not the largest portion, of them were Irishmen. If it be true that of those engaged in this Fenian plot at Chester not one-half were Irishmen, it would seem that a portion of the English population in the North of England were infected with this disloyalty and have been led into treasonable practices of this nature. I confess I do not believe it. I have not been able to observe in the part of the country I live in any symptom of it. But if we are to believe in this insurrectionary movement at Chester as a real thing—that only one-half of those engaged in it are Irish, and that the other half is English—it would seem that discontent and treasonable intentions have spread amongst some portion of the English population. I suppose the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary believes the whole of the Chester story. I do not believe it. But if I were the Home Secretary, and believed it, I would send some person to Chester on the part of the Government, to find out if it be true. The Government can easily find out if it be true. In Ireland they get information from all parts of that country, because there is no insurrectionary movement that has not amongst its supporters some men who are traitors to the cause. I recollect Earl Russell saying some years ago that, during the Chartist movement, they had no occasion to employ spies at the Home Office, having more information than they required. I believe that now, as during the Chartist agitation, if there were a Fenian movement of an insurrectionary character in Chester, it would be possible for Government, by sending some judicious person to that district, to ascertain how it originated and the purposes of the men who went to Chester that day. It is very important we should know the fact. Stated as it is by the noble Lord—believed as it is by many Members of this House—it is one of the most unpleasant things that has happened at a most particular time; and it is the duty of the Government to search it to the bottom in order that they may know if there exists a dangerous condition of things based upon insurrectionary intentions. I hope with regard to the particular matter which my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford has introduced, that the House will adhere rigidly to the opinion that was generally held at the time the Volunteer force was formed, and which has been expressed to-night by the right hon.

EARL GROSVENOR: I wish, Sir, to be allowed a single word of explanation. No considerable number of arms was found. But on the morning following the Monday on which these people came to Chester great quantities of ball cartridges were found, not only in the town, but outside. Some of this ammunition was fished out of the ponds and canals. There were some arms found also, but I am not able to say what quantity.

COLONEL LOYD LINDSAY said, after the discussion that had taken place he could not help congratulating himself that he had not been called upon to act as a Volunteer officer in a case of emergency such as had been alluded to, because he felt that he could have had no definite instructions to act upon. He had listened attentively to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole), and he felt that he had really received no information as to what Volunteers ought to do under the circumstances. With regard to the observations that had just fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham, he was afraid military men would not receive instructions from him on that point with the same reverence they might on other subjects. It was contended that when Volunteers were called out as special constables their military and volunteer capacity should be superseded; but he could not agree to such a proposition. If a man acquired, after patient training and instruction, certain habits, these could not be suppressed at a moment's notice. They might as well expect a man who tumbled into the water to suppress his knowledge of swimming, or a prize-fighter, who suddenly got into a row, to suppress the scientific knowledge he had acquired of how to use his fists. The same remark applied to the Volunteers. They having acquired a knowledge of military movements, and certain of the capabilities of the soldier, it was impossible to expect them, on short notice, to suppress those qualifications. Nor, if Volunteers could suppress their military character, did he think it desirable that they should, for his sympathies were altogether with the peaceful portion of Her Majesty's subjects, and not with those roughs who might be disposed to break the peace, perhaps at the instigation of foreigners. Supposing a riot occurred in a town, the magistrate would at once proceed to call out the young men, and to swear them in as special constables; but these young men were for the most part Volunteers, and as they were well known to each other, had been drilled together under proper officers, and were practically acquainted with military duties, they would necessarily act as a military force, march as soldiers, and act in concert under their commanders. Going a step further, the right hon. Gentleman said it could easily be imagined that an emergency might arise which would justify a magistrate arming these young special constables, who also happened to be Volunteers. So that then, almost unintentionally, they would have armed Volunteers called out to assist the civil power. That being the case, was it to be expected that these men would not act together? They were not called out as Volunteers, but, being armed in their capacity of special constables, were they to suppress their acquirement of acting together? He thought it would be a most dangerous thing to allow Volunteers, as such, to go forth armed with their own arms unless they were under proper command and control. Training and discipline did a great deal. The military, for instance, were often called out to suppress riots; but even under the strongest provocation they invariably acted with the greatest forbearance. The same remark applied to the police. Now it was not because these bodies of men were any better, or were possessed of more kindly dispositions than other people, that they thus acted with moderation; but because they were under discipline. They were accustomed to act together and to obey commands. And so would it be in the case of the Volunteers if they also acted under military discipline. It was accordingly absolutely necessary, if they were called out, and if the magistrates saw fit to arm them with rifles, that they should be under command. If, therefore, the magistrates had the power to call them out as special constables and to arm them—[Cries of "No, no!"—]he had always understood that the legal authorities were of opinion that it was one of the privileges of Englishmen that every man in this country had a right in his own defence, and, if the emergency were sufficiently great, to carry arms. ["Yes!"] Well, was the right to be taken away from a man merely because he was a Volunteer? The Volunteers, then, had the same right as other Englishmen to carry and to use arms. Moreover, it was to be remembered that in many cases the arms which the Volunteers carried did not belong to the Government, but were their own. If, therefore, these arms were in their possession when called out they could certainly use them. But if they were to be allowed to use them the men must be placed under command, or calamities of the wildest and worst character would be occurring. Precise instructions should be forthwith issued to Volunteer officers. What occurred at Chester was a proof of the necessity of this. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) did not believe that what had occurred at Chester was so serious as was stated. But he was not there to see. The noble Lord the Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor) was there, and he reported that affairs had been very serious. The House could therefore easily decide who was the more likely to be the better informed on the point. He (Colonel Loyd Lindsay) ventured to submit to the Government that some such instruction as the following, if issued to Volunteers, would enable them easily to decide what course of action to pursue in cases of difficulty :—

“Volunteers are under precisely the same obligations as other private persons to suppress riots by every means in their power ; and when properly constituted as special constables it is their duty to act so as to preserve the peace. Volunteers when so acting should be armed precisely as other special constables with staves. But should circumstances be of so grave a character as to warrant magistrates arming them with arms, in no case should Government arms be used by them except the men are under the command of the officers to whose care the arms are intrusted.”

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE— MINISTERIAL ARRANGEMENTS.

QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON: The more this subject of the employment of Volunteers by the civil powers is discussed, the more confused it becomes. The real question is not one that specially relates to the Volunteers. Having taken a part in the discussions of the Bill under which the Volunteers were established, I can say that the House arrived at the conclusion that there should be no special legislation with respect to the employment of the Volunteers. The law takes no cognizance of Volunteers for the preservation of the peace, and all we have to say to them is that they should perform the duties of loyal subjects. But what is the use of discussing the duty of loyal subjects? It would be discussing the whole law of England. Before I sit down I wish to ask a question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. A few days ago, when the right hon. Gentleman informed the House of the painful disruption of Her Majesty's Government in their endeavour to agree upon a Bill for Parliamentary Reform, he also stated that, at the latest, to-night he would be able to tell us that Her Majesty's Government had been re-constructed, and that the re-constructed Government would, at furthest on the 18th instant, bring in a Bill upon Reform. Since then rumour has been very busy, and we have heard many versions of the endeavours of Lord Derby to re-construct his Administration. We have been kept in the greatest state of anxiety, because Gentlemen on this side of the House anticipate a pleasure which may not be shared in by Gentlemen opposite—of seeing a Reform Bill introduced at no distant day; and we dread lest we should be disappointed by any unfortunate failure of the attempts of the head of the Government to re-construct his Administration. To-night our anxiety has been somewhat appeased by the Motions that have been made for new writs; but still we have not received the full information which the House of Commons always expects to have from the Leader of the House when such a great change takes place in the constitution of the Government of the day as we have recently witnessed. I therefore hope the right hon. Gentleman will now be able to inform us that he is a Member of a complete Administration, and that he will be able to give us an assurance that the promise he held out to us will be fulfilled—that on the 18th instant we shall see a Reform Bill introduced, large and comprehensive in its character, and simple in its provisions, which shall commend itself to the forbearance of the Opposition, and to the respect and enlightened public opinion of the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, in answer to the inquiry of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I have the satisfaction to state that the Government is at present complete. I anticipated on Monday that it would be, and I hope by the end of the next week it will be completely represented in both Houses of Parliament. The writs that have been moved to-night have sufficiently intimated to the House the arrangements that have been made with regard to the House of Commons. In the other House of Parliament the Queen has been graciously pleased to confer the seals of Secretary of State for the Colonies upon the Duke of Buckingham. The Duke of Marlborough has been appointed Lord President of the Council, and the Duke of Richmond has accepted the office of President of the Board of Trade. Under these circumstances, I have great pleasure in stating that I have no doubt I shall be able to fulfil the engagement I made that I would, on the 18th instant, introduce a Bill on Parliamentary Reform.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES said, that the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) stated that it was useless to discuss what were the duties of a loyal citizen in that House; but the hon. Gentleman should remember that he was not himself a Volunteer officer, and that Volunteer officers asked a practical question, requiring an answer. He came down to the House that evening in the hope that he should hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary what would be his duty and what his responsibility in such an event as that which took place at Chester; but he must confess that he felt then in a more hazy state than when he entered the House. He was told that he could not be called out as a Volunteer, but that he might be called out as a special constable, and as such have arms put into his hands. He was also told that other men with whom he had been in the habit of acting as Volunteers might be called out in their uniforms, and have arms put into their hands; but he did not know whether he, as a Volunteer officer, should be in command of these men under the Mutiny Act. These were serious questions, and he himself should have to consider very carefully whether he could remain a member of the force. As a practical matter for the Home Secretary to consider before issuing his instructions, he could say, from intimations he had received, that unless the law was stated definitely, and they could understand whether they were to act as special constables in uniform, with their arms, under the command of the officers usually commanding them, he should have, in his own corps, the resignation of almost half of the members. The Volunteers required to know, in one way or the other, what was their duty. He agreed with the

hon. and gallant Member for Sussex, and the hon. Member for Bradford, that, as far as their armouries went, they would be justified in acting in military formation in order to defend the arms given to them; but in all other cases of civil tumult it ought to be emphatically laid down that they should go out as special constables with staves, and staves only.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he thought it should be clearly understood that the Volunteers had the right to defend their own arms. The recent attempts at insurrection had been directed against armouries, with the view of getting possession of arms; and it would therefore be as well clearly to make known to the commanders of Volunteers that they could defend their own arms, if they were attacked, with all their military skill and appliances.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, it is unnecessary to enter upon any very lengthened statement. I apprehend the law to be clear that the Volunteers cannot be called upon as a military body to assist the civil authorities for any purpose. That is a point at the one extreme which is clear. A point at the other extreme which I hold to be equally clear is, that the Volunteers are not released, in cases of riot or insurrection, from the duties that fall upon every subject of the Crown. Between these two extremes, of course, a great variety of circumstances may arise, as suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Thomas Hughes)—circumstances relating to particular cases, which it is not practicable for any one to give an opinion upon until they arise. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton) truly said it was vain to argue what are the duties of loyal citizens in every emergency that may from time to time arise. Of course, in determining the duties of any individual, or class of individuals, you must take into consideration the circumstances of the individual and the circumstances of the class to which he belongs. That which on any given occasion may be the duty of one, may not be the duty of another. It is impossible by anticipation to say what shall or shall not be done upon any particular occasion by particular persons or classes of persons. But of this I am satisfied, that it is vain for any useful purpose to think of any legislation beyond what we have. We have it established that the Volunteers cannot be called upon as a military body by the civil authorities for any purpose. On the other hand, it is equally well established that they are not released from the discharge of their duties as citizens. What must define duty in each case is the necessity of the occasion. That is the only test by which any of us can arrive at the conclusion of what is proper to be done. We can arrive at our decision by no legal machinery. Unlawful riot must be suppressed, and not allowed to spread, and the requisite degree of force must be resorted to for the purpose. We must all decide what is our duty by applying our judgment to each occasion as and when it arises, subject to responsibility to the law for a proper discharge of the duty. There is no other way of solving the difficulty. Of course, after an event has happened, it is easy to describe the circumstances, and it is very easy to give an opinion upon it; but to ask the Government, or the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, or any human being whatever, to describe by anticipation events and contingencies which may possibly arise, in order to found a law upon them, is simply impossible. The action to be taken must necessarily depend upon the character of the occasion. You may have cases of unlawful assembling, ordinary riot, felonious riot, insurrection, and rebellion. Where either the first or second of these only occurred, it would be wrong, in the first instance, in ordinary cases to call upon any but the police. A judicious magistrate, if he found a larger force than he first employed necessary, would then call out the special constables, preferring perhaps, in the first instance, those who were not Volunteers; and in the event of still further assistance being required, he would call upon the Volunteers to act as special constables, and would arm them with staves as the other special constables. If, however, a felonious riot broke out—if, to give one out of many instances that might be suggested, the town were in flames and the population intoxicated—the magistrate would be entitled to resort to all the means in his power, and to employ every force he could summon to his aid. I speak with reference to such occasions as the riots of 1780; but I hope it will not be supposed that I look upon the recurrence of such things as probable. I believe it to be highly improbable; but to define the law so strictly as to limit the power of those who are responsible for the preservation of order in any case which may possibly arise would be most unwise. I trust, therefore, that the House will not be disposed to pass any measure for limiting or defining with particularity the duties of any particular class of Her Majesty's subjects. That general directions may be usefully given I admit, but it is vain to define what course shall be adopted in every emergency. There must necessarily be cases in which difficulties will arise. Every one who holds a position of responsibility must be prepared to meet difficulties; and I am quite sure that the hon. and learned, and, if he will allow me to call him so, the gallant Member for Lambeth (Mr. Thomas Hughes), will not be the man to shrink from his duty because difficulties may arise in the discharge of it.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I do not rise to prolong this discussion, but merely to ask a question which I hope some Member of the Government will be able to answer, and which may do something to allay the uneasiness which evidently pervades the minds of the Volunteers. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) will undertake, before issuing them, to lay the regulations he proposes on the table of the House. Notwithstanding what the right hon. Gentleman said as to misapprehension in the opinions of various speakers, I am afraid his own speech was not so plain as to show us the precise nature of the instructions he suggests. The impression which the right hon. Gentleman left was, that a Volunteer does not as such cease to be a citizen, and, that although he cannot be called upon quod Volunteer in aid of the civil power, he may come out in aid of the civil power just as any other citizen may. What, however, the hon. and learned Gentleman who last spoke appears in common with other Members to overlook is that you have by law placed the Volunteer in a position which is not simply that of an ordinary citizen. Not only has the State drilled him at its own expense, but it has placed in his hands arms which are its and not his property. It appears to me, therefore, that it ought to be clearly defined what position an officer who is responsible to the State, not only as the commander of the force, but as the custodian of those arms will occupy, if the Volunteers are under any circumstances to be called out for the repression of disturbances. It might be the opinion of the magistrates and of the Volunteers themselves that an emergency had arisen which justifies them in coming out in aid of the civil power; but it might be the opinion of the officer responsible for the custody of the Government arms that it was not his duty to place those arms in the hands of the Volunteers. Are the Government of opinion that the officer ought, on the demand of the magistrate, to deliver up the charge of those arms, although it might be contrary to his own opinion? It seems to me that there are only two courses for the Government to adopt in order to make this question plain. They might strictly forbid the issue to Volunteers of the Government arms under any circumstances of this nature, reserving to themselves the power, in cases of emergency, to issue arms. Or, holding the opinion that Volunteers might, under certain circumstances, come out and possibly be armed, the Government might propose a clause something like the clause which stood in our Bill; thereby insuring that armed forces of men drilled and armed with weapons the property of the Government should not be allowed to act, except under military discipline and under the command of proper officers.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he thought the commanding officers of Volunteers had a right to ask the Government to frame some definite instructions to lords-lieutenant, so that Volunteers in difficult circumstances might know how to act. He could assure the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) that very numerous bodies of Fenians came over from Ireland, both by way of Holyhead and Liverpool, for some days before the outbreak at Chester. Most of them were Irish, but many of them were Irish-Americans. After the outbreak at Chester they straggled away by hundreds to Holyhead and passed over to Ireland by the packets, but, on their arrival at Dublin, were arrested. From information he had received he believed that the plot was concocted by the Fenian leaders in Ireland.

MR. AKROYD said, that his view of his duties as a commander of Volunteers had been in no degree cleared up by the explanations of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary and the Attorney General. One remark made by the Attorney General seemed to him, as a Volunteer officer, the height of absurdity—that Volunteers might be called out in uniform, but must be armed with constables' staves. [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I did not use the word uniform.] No doubt, they were liable to be called upon to act in their private capacity; but he (Mr. Akroyd) wished to guard against the supposition that they were liable to be called out, except in their private capacity.

If that were clearly understood it would get rid of considerable misunderstanding. If the Volunteers were called out as a corps at all, he should like to know under whose orders they would be placed, and whose would be the responsibility if they used their arms. The rifle with which they were armed was the very worst weapon that could be used in case of internal tumult. No one could say how far it would carry, or whom it would reach. The arms were usually placed in the armoury of the corps, but there were many cases where they were placed in the orderly room, where there was no protection and no one to guard them against a sudden assault. This was a matter well worthy the attention of the War and the Home Offices.

SIR HEDWORTH WILLIAMSON said, he wished to ask, whether the Government would lay their new regulations on the table before they were published?

LORD ELCHO said, he had heard several brother commanding officers of Volunteers express an opinion of the great doubt and uncertainty of the position in which this question had been left by the debate of to-night. It appeared to him that the Attorney General had placed the question so far in a clear light, when he said that there was no power under the existing Act to call out the Volunteers quâ Volunteers; that they were simply citizens, and like any other citizens, liable to be called out where occasion required by the proper authority. He apprehended that those who called them out on their own responsibility would arm them, according to the emergency, not as Volunteers, but as individuals. Clearly, if the emergency were so great that individual citizens might be armed with deadly weapons, then Volunteers, acting together as individuals, could not be deprived of that power of acting as a body which their constitution gave them. A very strong and unanimous feeling was expressed at the late meeting of Volunteer officers that the old law should not be re-enacted, and that Volunteers quâ Volunteers should not be liable to be called out. There was also a feeling not less unanimous, that occasions might arise when, as at Chester, it might be greatly to the advantage of the State that it should have a body of men who, on an emergency affecting Her Majesty's Supremacy, might be called upon to aid the civil power. The hon. Member for Birmingham had drawn a wrong distinction between the circumstances of the present time and those which existed when the force was re-established. The hon. Member said there was no question at the latter period of employing the Volunteers in suppressing tumult and riots. But this was not a case of tumult, but of treason—not a case of riot, but of rebellion; and although the hon. Member and a portion of the press might throw ridicule on what had occurred at Chester, yet he believed it to have been an attempt at treasonable insurrection against Her Majesty. In such a case he would rather take the opinion of the local authorities, who were actors in the events, than the opinion of the hon. Member for Birmingham. The inquiry recommended by the hon. Member would be utterly needless, because it could not be doubted from the information received by the Government that this was a plot, an organized treasonable conspiracy against Her Majesty's Supremacy, and an attempt to gain possession of arms belonging to Her Majesty in Chester Castle. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) would draw up short instructions showing whether Volunteers were to act on such occasions as citizens or soldiers.

SEARCH OF PASSENGERS' BAGGAGE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE, in rising to move a Resolution in favour of the suspension of the search of baggage of passengers arriving from France during the period of the French Exhibition, said, it was his intention to take the decision of the House upon it, as it proposed to get rid of a grievance which was wantonly inflicted on a large number of Her Majesty's subjects. That grievance arose from what he ventured to call a red-tape prejudice. Ever since the time of the last French Exhibition, there was a growing feeling in the country against the wanton search among passengers' luggage for non-existing articles, and for articles with regard to which Customs duties did not exist, which produced so much trouble and vexation to persons travelling between Folkestone, Dover, and France. Upon this subject 124 Members of the Upper House, and 318 Members of the House of Commons, presented themselves in solemn deputation a few weeks since to the Treasury. They submitted their case to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he received them with that dignified courtesy which was inherent in his nature. He heard their case, shook his head, and sent them off with a Papal non-possumus. All they had then to do was to throw themselves upon the House, and show how futile were the reasons of that venerable Board of Customs which instructed the Treasury. On this question he would read a short opinion as to this search of luggage—an opinion which, on account of its brevity, should be the text of his remarks. That opinion was to the effect that after all the allowances to be made the system of examination must always be productive of inconvenience and vexation to the public, and could only be justified by imperious necessity. The name subscribing that opinion was the justly respected one of George Ward Hunt, and it was contained in a letter to the Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) and Lord Harris, the chairmen of the two companies most affected. A paper had been circulated that morning containing two learned discourses from the Board of Customs, and a second series of learned discussions in the form of letters from the Treasury repeating the text of the former. These documents, while entering fully and with great accuracy into the whole system of the balance of trade between England and France, and stating what was the price of tobacco and spirits, and how much had been exported and imported; had yet to make the confession that there were only two articles at present liable in any appreciable extent to any Customs duty—namely, spirits and tobacco. But the Board of Customs had omitted from that statement all reference to the mode and machinery of smuggling. The Board were wrong in supposing that the remonstrants asked for unlimited leave and licence to carry all or any baggage or packages between France and England. They asked for no such preposterous privilege. They only asked to be allowed to carry without examination that which was clearly and obviously passengers' luggage—portmantous, trunks, and bags, which they required; that in respect of merchandize—that is to say, of all packages which proved themselves by their shape and construction not to be passengers' luggage—all the existing regulations might continue in force. They asked for a limited relief for a limited class of goods, and they asked it from about the 1st of April onwards down to the period of the close of the Exhibition. They could not force the French Government; but judging the concessions by France in 1855, it was probable that any liberal step on our part would be met in a corresponding spirit. He wished the House to consider what a heavy and bulky article spirits were, and to look at the difficulties in the way of their being surreptitiously brought over to this country. They must be brought by a passenger, who had to pay £4 or £2 for his ticket. A passenger could only bring over 56 lb. weight of luggage from Paris without extra charge, and it was preposterous to suppose that, under these conditions, there could be any smuggling of spirits sufficient to affect the revenue within the limits of the under-weight. Cheap and nasty spirits could be obtained in England as cheap and nasty as in France. An Englishman drunk his gin as a Frenchman did his absinthe. Cognac of a superior quality was an article of luxury for limited consumption at gentlemen's tables, and therefore not likely to be smuggled; but there was scarcely any appreciable difference in price between ordinary English and French brandy. A certain liquor called Betts's British brandy, costing 18s. a gallon, was about as palatable or unpalatable, as gentlemen might think, as French brandy of a similar quality at 21s. Now, then, this fluid was, as every one knew, bulky and weighty—so, also, was every vessel in which it could be stored without fear of breaking or spilling. He had himself that day weighed the bottle in which brandy was usually put, and found it to be 1 lb. 10 oz., while, were it put in pipkins the vessels containing the liquid would still be very heavy. Here he could offer a wrinkle to the Treasury. Let them just arrange for the railways porters to be only a very little more rough than they usually were, and he would undertake that with no further trouble to the Customs Department any amount of brandy smuggled in bottles would come out a very disagreeable mess of smashed glass. Surveillance, if not of a very vexatious kind, was not objected to, and so smuggling was carried on by passengers there would be no difficulty in detecting it by means of a police system, exercised, not by companies of Mr. Pollaky's inquiry officers, as the Treasury seemed to suppose, but by their own Customs officers; with such arrangements it was preposterous to suppose that in portmanteaus and paper parcels brandy could be smuggled to any appreciable extent. If a gentleman smuggler contemplated such a thing as bringing over six dozen of Cognac, weighing 280 lb., he would have to pay, not only the cost of his ticket, but 1s. 6d. for every extra 10 lb. beyond the 56 lb. allowed him—the 1s. 6d. being the excess charged on the South Eastern, and the London, Chatham, and Dover lines. It was absurd to suppose that half-a-dozen persons would club together to bring over this spurious article. Now as to tobacco, cigars were doubtless a much lighter ware; but it must be remembered that in France tobacco was an article of Government manufacture, and it was not the right of anybody to open a tobacco shop, or charge his own price, for this was treated as a very strict monopoly and privilege, and was usually granted to officers' widows, in lieu of a pension. Of course, Madame la Capitaine is too great a lady to exercise the privilege except by deputy. But she makes the deputy pay high. He had the particulars of one bureau de tabac in the Rue de Dunkirk, Paris, where the man who kept it had to pay £160 a year as royalty to the lady besides the landlord's rent. And yet, owing to the monopoly, it was only at such shops that tobacco could be got at all. What possible room was there, he asked, for possible smuggling under such conditions? The selling price of tobacco in France was about 4s. per lb. He really believed that his hon. Friend the Secretary for the Treasury (Mr. Hunt), with that ingenuous generosity which distinguished his every thought and action, almost fancied that the gentleman smuggler was so upright that every article produced by him might be supposed to be imported from the country from which he professed to have come, instead of being the production of British labour. His hon. Friend would possibly suppose that the sailor-looking man who might meet him at Margate or Ramsgate, and who, with the "tip" of a "knowing wink," would offer cigars for sale with the implication that they were "really good cigars," and had been brought from France, was a veritable smuggler, though in some better informed quarters there might be a suspicion that the article was of home manufacture, and the smuggler a person who was sinning not against the revenue, but only against truth. If a gentleman was silly enough to bring over a bottle of brandy which he felt a pride in putting upon his table as "stolen waters," or if a lady brought over a bottle of scent which Rimmel could make here at the same price, he (Mr. Beresford Hope) did not think that their folly would produce an appreciable diminution in the revenue. As to the traffic between the two countries, this was expected to be a very crowded and turbulent year ; and therefore it was utterly fallacious to suppose that the figures which had been put forth by the Treasury as the average of time employed in the search of each passenger's luggage, could furnish any test of the trouble and time to be occupied in searching passengers' luggage during the period of the Paris Exhibition. Besides, the amount of inconvenience incurred could not be calculated by any arithmetical test, mixed up as it was with the disturbing element of sea sickness. In a word, this search was likely to become a gigantic evil, and he called upon the Government to apply a remedy ; but the Government met them with cut-and-dried figures, though he believed it was a mere chimerical evil that they were seeking to put down. He hoped that the prayer of nearly half the Members of that House, and of more than 100 Members of the other House, would be granted, and that every facility would be given for expediting the search of passengers' luggage during the continuance of the Paris Exhibition. He would now beg to move the Resolution of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as the Customs Revenue is now derived from an exceedingly small number of articles, the prices of most of which in London and Paris are equal, this House considers that no appreciable injury would be inflicted upon the income of the Country were the present practice of the search of the baggage of travellers at Dover, Folkestone, New-haven, and in London suspended during the period of the French Exhibition of 1867,"—(Mr. Beresford Hope.)

—instead thereof.

MR. HUNT said, his hon. Friend accused Her Majesty's Government of being harsh towards those persons who were anxious to visit the French Exhibition during the coming year. If this were done out of wantonness, the terms would not be too severe. But the Government had to consider what was their duty in dealing with the very influential deputation which waited some time ago upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which set forth the desires of 300 Members of that House and 100 Members of the Upper House. He was not surprised that that number of Peers and Commoners signed the Memorial, and it would have been no matter of surprise to him if the number had been larger. What they very reasonably wished was that, if the Government could do it without loss to the revenue, the very desirable boon which was asked should be granted. The duty of the Government, however, was to ascertain whether there was any risk or not to the revenue. It was not from any "red-tapeism" that the Government had been prevented from granting the request. The papers which had been presented showed that the Government had considered the question with great care and minuteness, and he hoped it would be seen that it was not consistent with their duty for the Government to allow of the right of search being done away with. They were told that the French Government were prepared to meet them half-way, but statements subsequently made did not lend a warrant to that belief, but rather led to one of a contrary character ; for though the French Government were ready to give every facility consistent with the right of search, they had refused to abandon it. He would ask whether it was England or France that was most interested in promoting this traffic ? If even those whose desire and whose interest it was to bring foreigners to their capital would not abandon their rights, was it reasonable to suppose that this country which was not so much interested should be the first to abandon them ? His hon. Friend had gone into the question of the weight of the articles, and if smugglers took such a clumsy mode of proceeding as that indicated by his hon. Friend there would be little risk run, but unfortunately some persons were as ingenious in defrauding the revenue as his hon. Friend was in preparing arguments for the House. In the opinion of authorities at the Custom House, who were the best judges in such a question, there would be a great deal of petty smuggling going on among a certain class of travellers, not for the wilful purpose of defrauding the revenue, but for the amusement of the thing. That, however, was not the main reason which influenced the Government. Further than that, they had no doubt that during the seven months during which the Exhibition was to continue there would be, were this application granted, an organized system of smuggling spirits and tobacco. He had requested to be furnished with calculations of the proceeds of a single journey, if a traveller were to bring the weight of luggage which he was entitled to have registered between Dover and Calais, or Folkestone and Boulogne, in contraband goods. A traveller from this country to Paris during the Exhibition would be allowed to have without extra payment 56 lb. of luggage, and also to take with him in the carriage a portmanteau or bag weighing 40 lb., making together 96 lb. of luggage. Deducting the weight of the packages holding the luggage, the weight of the contents would be 80 lb. The present Customs tariff of this country consisted of a very small number of articles, but on those the duty was very high, affording an inducement to unscrupulous persons to smuggle. The Customs duty on spirits amounted to £4,000,000, the duty on tobacco to £6,500,000, and, of course, it would be obvious that it was obligatory on the Government to take precautions that the revenue should not suffer by the smuggling into this country of foreign spirits and tobacco. As the hon. Member had said, the manufacture and sale of tobacco, or the giving of licenses, was a Government monopoly in France, but it so happened that there was a deputed agent of the French Government in this country; and the first class of cigars, which in Paris were sold retail for £1 5s. the pound of 100 cigars, were sold by the agent in London at £2 1s. 8d., showing a profit on their sale in London of 16s. 8d. Suppose that a traveller brought over 80 pounds weight there would be a profit of £66 3s. 4d. on a single venture. Then take the case of small common cigars, 150 to the pound; these were 8s. 4d. per pound in Paris and 11s. 6d. in London, showing a profit of 3s. 2d.; on these a profit might be made on the single journey of £19. The price of manufactured tobacco was 5s. per pound in Paris and 9s. per pound in London, so that the profit on a single journey might be £16. A person had been sent out to Paris to make purchases at retail shops, and 5s. per pound was found to be the average price there of the tobacco in ordinary use; the same steps were taken in London, and striking the average, the price per lb. was found to be 9s. With respect to spirits, suppose that 10 gallons of brandy were brought over in the luggage, as might well be, the price in Paris would be 7s. 1d. per gallon, while in London it would be £1 10s. showing a profit of £1 2s. 11d. per gallon, or of £11 9s. 2d. on the ten gallons. Such was the profit upon spirits, while, as he had shown, the profit upon good cigars would be £66 3s. 4d., upon common cigars £19, and upon manufactured tobacco £16 on a single venture. His hon. Friend said that they must deduct the expense of the journey. That would be insignificant in proportion, but allow for that. Suppose that 84 journeys could be made during the seven months, the profit on the best cigars would be £5,390; on common cigars £1,428; and on manufactured tobacco £1,176; while the profit on the spirits would be £794. After reading these figures he thought the House would see that it was rather a serious question that the Government had been called upon to consider. It might be said that any single person going backwards and forwards so frequently would be discovered, but unscrupulous persons would without difficulty secure agents to carry out by different routes their policy of fraud. He hoped, then, that the House would think the Government justified in declining to accede to the proposal made to them. The Government were ready to do whatever might be in their power to meet the increased traffic by providing additional hands at the different stations of arrival, and they would also take the greatest care in their selection, so that all unavoidable trouble might be prevented. But delay was likely to occur elsewhere than with the Government, and if the railway companies would, by a little judicious expenditure, extend their accommodation, very great facilities would be given to travellers who were called upon to have their luggage searched. Bearing in mind the large increase of traffic which certain of the railway companies would command, he thought this might fairly be expected of them. If they would do their part, the Government would render all the aid that could be expected from them, and so travellers might secure the minimum of disadvantage.

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped that after the clear statement of his hon. Friend who had just sat down the House would not agree to the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman. The preamble of that Resolution either had some connection with the Resolution or not; if it had not, it ought to be struck out; if it had, it stated what was not founded in fact, for it affirmed that there need be no apprehension of smuggling from any difference in the price of articles in Paris as compared with London; but some of the figures which his hon. Friend had laid before the House on this subject were incontrovertible, and they showed that on tobacco of precisely the same quality there was a difference of between 4s. and 5s. a pound between London and Paris, while the difference in spirits was from 5s. to 7s. per gallon. If, then, there were no restrictions put upon the travellers in the way of searching their baggage the revenue would suffer considerably. He therefore trusted, after the Ministers responsible for collecting the revenue had stated in their place that they could not consent to the suspension proposed, the House would pause before passing a Resolution of this kind. At the same time, he had a suggestion to propose to the Government, and to those who came down to support this Resolution, as to steps which might be taken by which the inconvenience of search would be greatly diminished, while the revenue would also be protected. Calculations had been made as to the exact amount of delay caused by the searching baggage at the London termini of the railways. It was very true, as stated in the Customs report, that the mere act of search did not occupy many minutes; but the preparations for that search greatly affected the arrangements of the companies for the delivery of luggage. On one occasion he remembered having been kept more than half an hour, not in consequence of the time employed in the search itself, but in consequence of the company being compelled to take out every article of luggage and place it on the table before the search commenced. What he proposed was this. In the salle de bagage at Paris it was necessary that all luggage should be received several minutes before the starting of every train. It appeared to him that by an arrangement with the French Government an officer of the British Government might be stationed in the salle de bagage, who should see all the luggage as brought in, and on observing any parcel that appeared suspicious, or that ought to be searched, he might mark it, so as to keep it under surveillance during transit, and with a view to its examination on arrival in London, the remainder being allowed to go free. All that was now done was to examine about one package in ten, selecting the most suspicious; and he thought the arrangement he suggested would be equally effective and more expeditious. He did not make this suggestion on any mean authority—he made it on the very highest authority on such questions, and he was enabled to say that the arrangement was exactly similar to one which had been agreed to between Holland and Prussia, and which, though now superseded, had been found perfectly satisfactory both to the Customs authorities and the railways. If the Government would take that suggestion into consideration, he hoped those who had brought forward this Resolution would withdraw it. If not, he should vote with his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Hunt.)

MR. WATKIN said, he hoped the practical suggestion which had just been made by the hon. Member would meet with due attention from the Government. It was no new suggestion; for it had been pressed upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the interview already referred to, so that the Government could not say they were taken by surprise. Let him now say a word or two in answer to what he might call the hobgoblin argument of the Secretary for the Treasury. He regretted that the hon. Gentleman had given the weight of his authority to these calculations, which were really of no value whatever. They rested on a comparison of things which were not equal. He compared the wholesale prices in one case to the retail prices in the other. If hon. Gentlemen would go into the tea-room they would find samples of these articles the smuggling of which was so much dreaded, all labelled and the prices marked, and they would find from these that it was the exception where the retail prices of these articles were cheaper in Paris than in London. But how had the House been treated with regard to these papers, which were filled with calculations and statements? The most important paper was prepared as early as the 9th of February, by the Custom House authorities, but it was only yesterday issued to the House, so that no opportunity was allowed to answer the memorandum, which might easily have been done. But the question rested on higher grounds than the mere difference of retail prices. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury came to the House with calculations to show the enormous trade to be done in smuggling cigars and tobacco, by which £5,000 a year, he said, could be made. The hon. Gentleman based his calculation, not on the mere difference of duty, assuming the cost and quality to be the same—say 7s. per lb.—but he said that the difference of selling price was 16s. 6d.; and, assuming that every one could sell as much as he liked at that price, he said £5,000 was to be made. Now, as to spirits, they might be cheaper or dearer in Paris, as the case might be. Let them take what the poor man drank in Paris, and it would be found somewhat higher in price than what the poor man drank in London. Taking spirits of the very best and finest quality, they were to some extent cheaper in Paris than in London. But were the people who travelled across to be considered smugglers or not? In several places in the Customs documents Her Majesty's subjects had been abused by the persons in authority as being so base and vile that nothing but the intervention of Custom House officers could make them honest. The law generally treated every man as honest till he became delinquent. Here every lady and gentleman was assumed to be delinquent in advance. Surely it was even more important to protect the coinage than the Customs. The coinage was protected by the ordinary law and the ordinary police. If he went into questions of artificial gold, he might go on to show that a man in that line of business might make £50,000 instead of £5,000 a year. Coinage was more easy than smuggling and more profitable, and inflicted greater injury on the State, but men were not stopped to inquire whether they had base shillings in their pockets. The system of prevention was known not to be perfect, and sometimes crime was committed. And why? Because the thing could not be entirely stopped without dealing unfairly with the liberty of the subject. It was known that, as a rule, the people of this and other countries were honest. They ran a certain risk of danger rather than inflict the inconvenience and loss which an espionage like that of the Custom House would occasion. If it was a fact that the people who travelled for pleasure were not smugglers, what was the reason, when the number of articles on which duty was payable had been reduced from 360 to something like a dozen, of which spirits and tobacco were the only two where smuggling was feared, that some system could not be adopted which, without injuring the revenue, would not inconvenience the travelling public? Why could not the revenue be protected in the same way as base coinage was guarded against? He would ask the Government whether they really thought the thousands of people who would go to Paris this year would go for the purpose of smuggling and not for pleasure, and whether, this being the 8th of March, and the Exhibition being announced to open on the 1st of April, there would be time, even if the Resolution passed, for any number of persons to organize systematic smuggling?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I wish to make one or two remarks upon the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin.) My hon. Friend has stated with great force and clearness the case of which he is, very naturally, under the circumstances, the advocate. This is a matter in which I take a great interest, as I think it involves a question of importance in relation to the connection between this House and the Executive Government. My hon. Friend says that it would be impossible to organize a system of smuggling in the time allowed, or to take advantage of facilities which are only to last for six months. But I wish to point out to the House that, as far as I can form an opinion, the system which we observe during the Exhibition we must be prepared to continue after the Exhibition. It would be totally impossible to draw a distinction between the period of the Exhibition and the period following. If there would be serious injury to the revenue, we ought not to give facilities; if there would be no serious injury, we ought to continue them. Then, as to the price of articles in London and Paris, my hon. Friend puts a list which he recommends for our consideration against the prices produced by the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hunt.) I have no doubt that my hon. Friend's prices have been brought forward in perfect good faith, but who is responsible for their presentation? Supposing it turned out, after all these facilities had been given, that damage arose to the revenue; we could not call upon those who had placed the specimens in the tea-room and make them responsible. On the other hand, the Government comes down to this House, being bound to take securities for the due collection of the revenue, bound to obtain the most ample and accurate calculation as to the effect of these relaxations, and to take security that the revenue should receive no damage. The credit of the Government is involved, as well as their duty to the House of Commons, in the accuracy of the information which they lay before us. It does appear to me that the statement of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury is open to criticism as regards the amount of profits. I have no doubt that a strict calculation would considerably reduce that amount; but I have no doubt, on the other hand, after every fair deduction had been made, a margin would remain sufficient to show a very high probability of such profits as would justify the apprehension which he entertains. But then my hon. Friend says, "Why not protect the revenue as you protect the coinage?" But, does not my hon. Friend know that in the protection of the coinage every member of the community is the ally of the Government? The Government does not need to depend on its own officers alone; it is the interest of A, B, C, and D, and of every human being, except the coiner himself, to protect it. But the revenue from our Customs meets with very little sympathy on the part of the community, and must depend upon its own officers for its protection. To talk of the smallness of the number of articles upon which the duty is levied is quite irrelevant; it is the amount of duty that is the question. Here is a matter of some £11,000,000, one-half of our Customs duty—I do not mean that all this money is in question, but the interests of the revenue are in question and the interests of justice, because we owe it to the traders in those articles, upon which we levy high duties, to defend them to the best of our power against illicit competition. But though the case made out by the Government is a strong one, the main consideration is this: The question raised by the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent (Mr. B. Hope) is, Who are the guardians of the public revenue? Are we to hold the Government responsible year after year for the faithful collection of the public revenue, and for the suppression of contraband trade? Or is this House to take the duty into its own hands of directly superintending the revenue? If you say, "We will take charge of it," then you ought to appoint a Committee of your own, and place it in direct communication with those Departments with whom the Government has immediate relations on the subject, so as to enable you to efficiently discharge the duty. But in our present arrangements, we have no intimate knowledge on the subject. We have, indeed, knowledge of a vague and general character, which no doubt furnished the materials of a most interesting speech to my hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Beresford Hope), who was so shocked with the conduct of the Government in this matter that he transferred himself to this side of the House, where no doubt, if he remains, he will be exceedingly welcome. But the responsibility of the Government must remain there. I, for one, am not prepared to assume it. I hope the hon. Gentlemen will not take it for granted that it is the remains of old official habit which induce me to play what they may think the part of an obstructor; because, in the first place, the whole course of modern administration has been steadily directed towards the relaxation of every official rule that could interfere with private comfort; and, in the second place, I look with sanguine expectation to the reply which I trust the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give to the question put to him by my hon. Friend (Mr. Childers.) I am far from thinking that we have yet arrived at the ne plus ultra of concession. There is much, as I have already intimated, in the documents on the table in which I do not agree; and I especially dissent from one remark made by the Customs authorities, that the Customs search does not restrict or discourage travelling. Every restriction must discourage travelling, and as such it ought to be reduced to its minimum. I think a very practicable mode of diminishing the inconvenience has been pointed out by my hon. Friend. It may require communications between the two Governments. At other times it would probably have been impracticable; but the spirit of modern legislation tends to promote and encourage these facilities. I hope some plan will be devised, by means of arrangements between the two Governments, such as at other times would be found impracticable, but which in our modern relations may be safely carried out.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, with regard to the suggestion which has been thrown out by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), of course, anything emanating from such a quarter will be received by us with the deference to which it is entitled. Schemes of a similar character have occurred to the Government, and have been mentioned in some quarters, but have not yet been received in a manner which gives me at this moment any very encouraging hope that we may succeed in an arrangement at all satisfactory. The identical plan of the hon. Gentleman has certainly not been considered, but it shall be. With every wish to remove difficulty out of the way of Her Majesty's subjects, I cannot at the present moment make any engagement which should at all influence the decision of the House, which ought to be arrived at on principles quite distinct. I do not think the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Watkin) has any ground of complaint with respect to the conduct of the Government in this matter. He complained of the papers not being produced. But the hon. Gentleman was aware of the existence of those papers, and, according to Parliamentary practice, he might have moved for them if he required them, and they would have been produced. What we did was to produce the papers when notice was given. With regard to the general argument of the hon. Member for Stockport, I must say now what I had the pleasure of saying to him under a more private roof, that the general tone of his objections really go altogether against the whole system of levying duties and searching baggage, and we are not quite in a position to agree with him. I listened with much amusement to the quaint rhetoric of my hon. Friend (Mr. Beresford Hope) who represents the interests of the Potteries. He did full justice to his case and his clients; but his case is not a good one, and his clients are somewhat unreasonable. There has been every disposition on the part of the Government to comply with the wishes of their fellow-countrymen on this question as far as possible. No doubt it would be very agreeable to the Government if they could entirely study the convenience of travellers to the Exhibition without reference to any other consideration. But that is not possible; and I think the statements which have been made by the Secretary to the Treasury this evening must have produced a due effect upon the House. They really have not been impugned by the tea-room criticisms and the tea-room illustrations of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Stockport must remember that in the matter of the calculations with which he favoured me in another place he really founded his arguments, as regards brandy, upon an error in assuming that the pure alcohol of the French brandy was similar to our proof strength in England, because I believe, as he himself now admits, there is a difference of 70 per cent between the two articles. If we are to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion upon this matter we must first of all study perfect accuracy. I am sure it is the inclination, and I cannot doubt that it is the duty, of the Government to do all they can to meet the wishes of those who propose to visit the Paris Exhibition, and, if they possibly can, to prevent them from being subjected to the inconvenience which necessarily results from the interference of Custom House officers. But the real question before the House is a simple one—is the House of Commons prepared to support Her Majesty's Government in their attempt to defend the revenue of the country? This is really the only consideration on which we ought to decide.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, the question of copyright should not be forgotten. Numerous cheap editions of our best authors were re-produced on the Continent as fast as they appeared here. At present heavy penalties attached to their importation; but if the request of the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent were acceded to, the authors and publishers of this country would be defrauded of their rights. If for no other reason the Motion should be rejected.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he would accept what had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a promise to do whatever was possible for intending visitors to the Paris Exhibition, and therefore would beg to withdraw his Motion.

ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GREGORY said, he would set before the House in a very few minutes the origin, object, and present position of the Royal Irish Academy, together with the claims which it possessed on the liberality of Parliament. It was founded by charter in 1786, for the promotion of science, polite literature, and antiquities; but as polite literature was now-a-days a robust plant, and quite able to stand alone, the Academy devoted itself exclusively to science and antiquities. Since its foundation up to the present time it has numbered among its members almost every resident Irishman distinguished in science, archæology, and general literature. It has illustrated the history and the physical phenomena of Ireland by works of originality and research, and by the acquisition of an admirable special library. In the twentieth volume of the Transactions of the Academy came out the famous treatise of Dr. Petrie which settled the question of the round towers of Ireland. It has additionally illustrated the history of Ireland
